

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

ORDERS OF COURT.

Tuesday, May 4, 1852.

WHEREAS, under and by virtue of an Act passed in the thirty-sixth year of the reign of His Majesty King George the Third, c. 52, intituled "An Act for repealing certain Duties on Legacies and Shares of Personal Estates, and for granting other Duties thereon in certain Cases," and of an Act passed in the thirty-seventh year of the reign of his said Majesty, c. 135, to explain and amend the said Act, it is enacted, that monies paid in under the first-recited Act into the Bank of England, with the privity of the Accountant General of the High Court of Chancery, when paid in, be laid out by the said Accountant General, without any formal request for that purpose, in the purchase of Bank 3l. per cent. annuities. By virtue of the powers contained in the last-mentioned of the said Acts, and of all other powers enabling him in that behalf, the Right Honourable EDWARD BURTENSHAW LORD ST. LEONARDS, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, DOETH HEREBY ORDER AND DIRECT that the Accountant General be at liberty, unless he shall have received, on behalf of some party claiming to be entitled, notice in writing of an intended application to the Court for otherwise disposing of the fund, from time to time, to lay out and invest the dividends on such stock, when so purchased, and all accumulations thereon, as the same shall accrue due, in the purchase of like Bank 3l. per cent. annuities, without any formal request for that purpose, and place the stock purchased with such dividends to the said several matters and accounts to which the original sums of stock respectively stand; and the Accountant General is to declare the trust thereof when purchased, subject to the order of this Court; and for the purposes aforesaid, the Accountant General is to draw on the Bank, according to the forms prescribed by the Act of Parliament and the General Rules and Orders of this Court in that case made and provided.

ST. LEONARDS, C.

Friday, May 7, 1852.

THE Right Honourable EDWARD BURTENSHAW LORD ST. LEONARDS, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, with the assistance of the Right Honourable SIR JOHN ROMILLY, Knight, Master of the Rolls, DOETH HEREBY, in pursuance of an Act of Parliament passed in the tenth and eleventh year of the reign of Her present Majesty, intituled "An Act for better securing Trust Funds, and for the Relief of Trustees," and in pursuance and execution of all other powers enabling him in that behalf, ORDER AND DIRECT in manner following, that is to say:—

Where any trustee desiring to pay money or transfer stock or securities into the name of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, under the said Act, is, under a General Order of the said Court, dated the tenth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, directed to file an affidavit entitled in the matter of the Act and of the trust, setting forth certain matters and things in the said Order of Court specified and declared, in future, such affidavit, in every case where the parties deem it unnecessary to have the money or the dividends or interest of stock or securities invested in the mean time, shall further contain a statement to that effect; and if the affidavit shall contain no such statement, the Accountant-General shall be at liberty to invest, as soon as conveniently may be, the said cash in Bank 3l. per cent. annuities, in the matter of the particular trust; or in cases of dividends or interest on stock or securities transferred, such dividends or interest in the like stock, and all accumulations of the dividends of the stock in which such cash shall be invested, and of the dividends or interest on such stock or securities as aforesaid, from time to time, in the like matter, without any special order made by the Court in that behalf, and without any formal request for that purpose. And the Accountant General is to declare the trust thereof when purchased, subject to the order of this Court. And for the purposes aforesaid, the Accountant General is to draw on the Bank, according to the form prescribed by the Act of Parliament and the General Rules and Orders of this Court in that case made and provided.

Provided always, that if, at any time, a request in writing, by or on behalf of any party claiming to be entitled, that such investment be discontinued, shall be left with the Accountant General, he shall be at liberty to cease making any further investment in the matter of the particular trust until the Court shall have made some order in that behalf.

ST. LEONARDS, C.

JOHN ROMILLY, M.R.

Saturday, August 7, 1852.

THE Right Honourable EDWARD BURTENSHAW LORD ST. LEONARDS, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, by and with the advice and assistance of the Right Honourable Sir JOHN ROMILLY, Master of the Rolls, the Right Honourable the Lord Justice Sir JAMES LEWIS KNIGHT BRUCE, the Right Honourable the Lord Justice LORD CRANWORTH, the Right Honourable the Vice Chancellor Sir GEORGE JAMES TURNER, the Honourable the Vice Chancellor Sir RICHARD TORIN KINDERSLEY, and the Honourable the Vice Chancellor Sir JAMES PARKER, DOTH HEREBY, in pursuance of an Act of Parliament passed in the fifteenth and sixteenth years of Her present Majesty, intituled "An Act to amend the Practice and Course of Proceeding in the High Court of Chancery," and in pursuance and execution of all other powers enabling him in that behalf, ORDER AND DIRECT:—

That all and every the Orders, Rules, and Directions hereinafter set forth shall henceforth be, and for all purposes be deemed and taken to be, General Orders and Rules of the High Court of Chancery, viz.

Printing.

I.—Bills and claims are to be printed on writing royal paper, quarto, in pica type, leaded; and the copy to be filed is to be interleaved with paper of the same description.

II.—No costs are to be allowed, either as between party and party, or as between solicitor and client, for any written bill or written copy of a bill, filed under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. s. 6, or for any written copy thereof, served upon any defendant thereto, or for any written brief of such bill, unless the Court shall, in disposing of the costs of the cause, direct the allowance thereof.

III.—The Clerks of Records and Writs shall, at the expiration of fourteen days from the filing of any written bill or written copy of a bill, take off the files of the Court, without further order, the bill or copy so filed, unless a printed copy thereof shall in the mean time have been filed, and the plaintiff in the suit, or his solicitor, who shall personally have undertaken to file such printed copy, shall pay to the defendant

all the costs incurred by him in the suit, such costs to be taxed by the Taxing Master, without further order, upon production to him of the certificate of the Clerk of Records and Writs, that a printed copy of the bill has not been filed pursuant to such undertaking, and to be recoverable in like manner as costs ordered to be paid by a party in a suit to another party in a suit are now recoverable.

IV.—In lieu of the fees now payable to solicitors for instructions for bills, for engrossing bills and claims, for copies of bills and claims, for abbreviating bills and making a brief thereof, solicitors shall be entitled to charge, and be allowed in suits commenced after these Orders come into operation, the fees specified in Schedule (A.) to these Orders.

V.—The payment to be made by the defendant to the plaintiff for printed copies of the bill or claim shall be at the rate of one half-penny per folio.

VI.—No defendant shall be at liberty to demand from the plaintiff more than ten printed copies of his bill or claim.

Amendment of Bills and Claims.

VII.—Where, according to the present practice of the Court, an amendment of a bill or claim may be made without a new engrossment thereof, a bill or claim may be amended by written alterations in the printed bill of complaint or claim so to be filed, and by additions on the paper to be interleaved therewith, according to the directions of Order I.

VIII.—The practice of amending a defendant's copy of the bill shall with respect to the amendment of bills filed after these Orders come into operation, be abolished.

IX.—A copy of an amended bill or claim, whether upon an amendment by a reprint, or by such alterations and additions as mentioned in Order VII., is to be served upon the defendant or his solicitor; and such copy may be partly printed and partly written, if the amendment is not made by a reprint; but in every case the copy to be served is to be stamped with the proper stamp by one of the Clerks of Records and Writs, indicating the filing of such amended bill or claim, and the date of the filing thereof.

X.—In all cases where, according to the present practice of the Court, a subpoena to appear to and to answer an amended bill may be served upon the solicitor of a defendant, service upon the defendant's solicitor of a copy of an amended bill, whether wholly printed, or partly printed and partly written, shall be good service on the defendant.

XI.—Where a defendant has appeared in person to any bill, service at the address for service of such defendant of a copy of an amended bill, whether wholly printed, or partly printed and partly written, shall be good service on the defendant.

Limitation of preceding Orders.

XII.—None of the preceding Orders shall apply to bills or claims filed before these Orders come into operation, though afterwards amended; and the existing practice of the Court is to continue in force, with reference to the amendment of such bills and claims.

XIII.—The existing practice of the Court with reference to issuing and serving writs of subpoena to appear to and answer bills and writs of summons on claims is also to continue in force with respect to bills and claims filed before these Orders come into operation.

Form of Bill.

XIV.—Bill may be in a form similar to the form set out in Schedule (B.) to these Orders, with such variations as the nature and circumstances of each particular case may require.

Interrogatories.

XV.—The interrogatories for the examination of the defendant to a bill may be in a form similar to the form set out in Schedule (C.) to these Orders, with such variations as the nature and circumstances of each particular case may require.

XVI.—In cases in which the plaintiff requires an answer to any bill from any defendant or defendants thereto, the interrogatories for the examination of such defendant or defendants are to be filed within eight days after the time limited for the appearance of such defendant or defendants.

XVII.—If the defendant appear in person, or by his own solicitor, within the time limited for that purpose by the rules of the Court, the plaintiff is, within eight days after the time allowed for such appearance, to deliver to the defendant or defendants so required to answer, or to his or their solicitor or solicitors, a copy of the interrogatories so filed as aforesaid, or of such of them as the particular defendant or defendants shall be required to answer. And the copy so to be delivered is to be examined with the original, and the number of folios counted by the Clerks of Records and Writs, who, on finding that such copy is duly stamped and properly written, are to mark the same as an office copy.

XVIII.—If any defendant to a suit commenced by bill do not appear in person, or by his own solicitor, within the time allowed for that purpose by the rules of the Court, and the plaintiff has filed interrogatories for his examination, the plaintiff may deliver a copy of such interrogatories so examined and marked as aforesaid, to the defendant, at any time after the time allowed to such defendant to appear and before his appearance in person or by his own solicitor; or the plaintiff may deliver a copy of such interrogatories so examined and marked as aforesaid, to the defendant or his solicitor, after the appearance of such defendant in person or by his own solicitor, but within eight days after such appearance.

XIX.—A defendant required to answer a bill must put in his plea, answer, or demurrer thereto, not demurring alone, within fourteen days from the delivery to him or his solicitor of a copy of the interrogatories which he is required to answer; but the Court shall have full power to enlarge the time, from time to time, upon application being made to the Court for that purpose.

XX.—After the time allowed by Order XVI. for filing interrogatories for the examination of any defendant, no interrogatories are to be filed for the examination of such defendant, without special leave of the Court, to be applied for upon notice of motion.

Form of Answer.

XXI.—Answers may be in a form similar to the form set out in Schedule (D.) to these Orders, with such variations as the nature and circumstances of each particular case may require.

Motion for Decree.

XXII.—One month's notice is to be given by the plaintiff to the defendant or defendants, of the motion for a decree or decretal order.

XXIII.—The affidavits to be used in support of such motion are to be filed before the service of such notice, and a list of such affidavits is to be set forth at the foot of such notice.

XXIV.—The defendant, within fourteen days after service of such notice, is to file his affidavits in answer, and to furnish the plaintiff or his solicitor with a list thereof.

XXV.—Within seven days after the expiration of such fourteen days the plaintiff is to file his affidavits in reply, which affidavits shall be confined to matters strictly in reply, and he is to furnish the defendant or his solicitor with a list thereof; and except so far as these affidavits are in reply, they are not to be regarded by the Court, unless upon the hearing of the motion the Court shall give leave to the defendant to answer them, and in that case the costs of such affidavits, and of the further affidavits consequent upon them, shall be paid by the plaintiff, unless the Court shall otherwise order.

XXVI.—No further evidence on either side is to be used upon such motion for a decree or decretal order, without leave of the Court.

XXVII.—Every notice of motion for a decree or decretal order is to be entered with the Registrar, who is to make out a list of such motions, and the same are to be heard according to such list, unless the Court shall make order to the contrary.

XXVIII.—Where a defendant shall not have been required to answer and shall not have answered the plaintiff's bill, so that under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. s. 26, he is to be considered as having traversed the case made by the bill, issue is nevertheless to be joined by filing a replication in the form or to the effect of the replication now in use.

Dismissal for want of Prosecution.

XXIX.—A defendant to a suit commenced by bill, who shall not have been required to answer the bill, and shall not have answered the same, shall be at liberty to apply for an order to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution, at any time after the expiration of three months from the time of his appearance, unless a motion for a decree or decretal order shall have been set down in the mean time, or the cause shall have been set down to be heard; and the Court may, upon such application, if it shall think fit, make an order dismissing the bill, or make such other order or impose such terms as may appear just and reasonable.

Impertinence.

XXX.—The application to be made for the costs of any impertinent matter introduced into any bill, answer, or other proceeding, is to be made at the time when the Court disposes of the costs of the cause or matter, and not at any other time.

Evidence.

XXXI.—The time within which the plaintiff in any suit commenced by bill is to give the defendant notice of the mode in which he desires that the evidence to be adduced in the cause shall be taken, is to be seven days after issue joined therein; and if the plaintiff shall not, within such time, give any such notice, or if the plaintiff shall give such notice, and shall therein desire the evidence to be adduced upon affidavit, the plaintiff and defendant respectively shall be at liberty to verify their respective cases by affidavit, unless the defendant, or some or one of the defendants if more than one, shall, within fourteen days after the expiration of the said period of seven days, give notice to the plaintiff, or his solicitor, that he or they desire the evidence to be oral.

XXXII.—The evidence on both sides in any cause to be used at the hearing thereof, whether taken orally (and including the cross-examination and re-examination of any witness or witnesses) or taken upon affidavit, is to be closed within nine weeks after issue joined therein, except that any witness who has made an affidavit intended to be used by any party to such cause at the hearing thereof shall be subject to cross-examination within one month after the expiration of such period of nine weeks.

XXXIII.—No affidavit filed before issue joined in any cause shall be received or receivable at the hearing thereof, unless within one month after issue joined notice in writing shall have been given by the party intending to use the same, to the opposite party of his intention in that behalf.

XXXIV.—Any party desiring to cross-examine a witness who has made an affidavit in any cause intended to be used at the hearing thereof, shall give forty-eight hours' notice to the party on whose behalf such affidavit was filed, or to the party intending to use the same, of the time and place of such intended cross-examination, in order that such party may, if he shall think fit, be present at such cross-examination.

XXXV.—The re-examination of any such witness is immediately to follow his cross-examination, and is not to be delayed to a future period.

XXXVI.—Any party in any cause or matter requiring the attendance of any witness before an Examiner, for the purpose of his being examined or cross-examined, with a view to his evidences being used upon any claim, motion, petition, or other proceeding before the Court, not being the hearing of a cause, shall give to the opposite party or parties forty-eight hours' notice at least of his intention to examine such witness, and of the time and place of such examination, unless the Court shall in any case think fit to dispense with such notice.

XXXVII.—And where it is desired to cross-examine any party, whether a party to the cause or matter or not, who has made an affidavit to be used, or which shall be used on any claim, motion, petition, or other proceeding before the Court, not being the hearing of a cause, the party desiring so to cross-examine such deponent shall give such notice to the opposite party as is required by Order XXXIV. with reference to the cross-examination of a witness who has made an affidavit to be used on the hearing of a cause.

XXXVIII.—All the above Orders with reference to the examination, cross-examination, and re-examination of witnesses, shall extend and be applicable to evidence taken in any cause subsequently to the hearing thereof.

XXXIX.—In suits in which issue shall have been joined when these Orders come into operation, the evidence to be used at the hearing of the cause shall be taken according to the existing practice of the Court, unless the parties shall consent, or the Court shall order, that the same shall be taken in the mode prescribed by the Act 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, and these Orders.

Adding to Decree.

XL.—The time within which a party served with notice of a decree under section 42. of the above Act may apply to the Court to add to the decree, is to be one month after such service.

XLI.—A memorandum of the service upon any person or persons of notice of the decree in any suit under the said section, rule 8, is to be entered in the office of the Clerks of Records and Writs upon due proof by affidavit of such service.

Summons.

XLII.—The summons to be obtained under section 45. of the above Act may be in a form similar to the form set forth in Schedule (E.) to these Orders, with such variations as the circumstances of the case may require.

Revivor and Supplement.

XLIII.—Any party under no disability, or under the disability of coverture, who may be served with an order to revive any suit, or to carry on the proceedings therein, may apply to the Court to discharge such order within twelve days after such service; and any party being under any disability, other than coverture, who may be so served, may apply to the Court to discharge such order within twelve days after the appointment of a guardian or guardians ad litem for such party; and until such period of twelve days shall have expired such order shall have no force or effect as against such last-mentioned party.

New Facts or Circumstances.

XLIV.—If the plaintiff in any cause which is not in such a state as to allow of an amendment being made in the bill shall desire to state or put in issue any facts or circumstances which may have occurred after the institution of the suit, he may state the same, and put the same in issue by filing in the Record and Writ Clerks' office a statement, either written or printed, to be annexed to the bill; and such proceedings by way of answer, evidence, and otherwise, are to be had and taken upon the statement so filed, as if the same were embodied in a supplemental bill: provided always, that the Court may make any order which it shall think fit for accelerating the proceedings thereunder, or proceedings therein, in any manner which may appear just and practicable.

Injunction.

XLV.—No injunction for stay of proceedings at law is to be granted as of course for default of appearance or answer to the bill.

Power of Court.

XLVI.—The power of the Court to enlarge or abridge the time for doing any act or taking any proceedings in any cause or matter, upon such, if any, terms as the justice of the case requires, is unaffected by these Orders.

Commencement of Orders.

XLVII.—These Orders shall take effect and come into operation on the 2nd of November 1862.

Interpretation.

XLVIII.—In these Orders the following words have the several meanings hereby assigned to them, over and above their several ordinary meanings, unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction; viz.:

1. Words importing the singular number include the plural number, and words importing the plural number include the singular number.
2. Words importing the masculine gender include females.
3. The word "bill" includes "information."
4. The word "party" includes a body politic or corporate.
5. The word "affidavit" includes "affirmation."

Bill of Complaint.

To the Right Honourable EDWARD BURTON-SHAW Baron St. LEONARDS, of Slaughtam, in the County of Sussex, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain.

Humbly complaining, sheweth unto his Lordship, John Lee, of Bedford Square, in the county of Middlesex, Esq., the above-named plaintiff, as follows:—

1.—The defendant James Styles, being seised in fee simple of a farm called Blackacre, in the parish of A. in the county of B., with the appurtenances, did, by an indenture dated the 1st of May 1850, and made between the defendant James Styles of the one part, and the plaintiff of the other part, grant and convey the said farm with the appurtenances unto, and to the use of, the plaintiff, his heirs, and assigns, subject to a proviso for redemption thereof, in case the defendant James Styles, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, should on the 1st of May 1851, pay to the plaintiff, his executors, administrators, or assigns the sum of 5,000*l.*, with interest thereon, at the rate of 5*l.* per centum per annum, as by the said indenture will appear.

2.—The whole of the said sum of 5,000*l.*, together with interest thereon at the rate aforesaid, is now due to the plaintiff.

3.—The defendant, Henry Jones, claims to have some charge upon the farm and premises comprised in the said indenture of mortgage of the 1st of May 1850, which charge is subsequent to the plaintiff's said mortgage.

4.—The plaintiff has frequently applied to the defendants, James Styles and Henry Jones, and required them either to pay the said debt, or else to release the equity of redemption of the premises, but they have refused so to do.

5.—The defendants, James Styles and Henry Jones, pretend that there are some other mortgages, charges or incumbrances affecting the premises, but they refuse to discover the particulars thereof.

6.—There are divers valuable oak, elm, and other timber, and timber-like trees growing and standing on the farm and lands comprised in the said indenture of mortgage of the 1st of May 1850, which trees and timber are a material part of the plaintiff's said security; and if the same or any of them were felled and taken away, the said mortgaged premises would be an insufficient security to the plaintiff for the money due thereon.

7.—The defendant James Styles, who is in possession of the said farm, has marked for felling a large quantity of the said oak and elm trees and other timber, and he has by hand-bills, published on the 2nd of December instant, announced the same for sale, and he threatens and intends forthwith to cut down and dispose of a considerable quantity of the said trees and timber on the said farm.

Prayer.

The plaintiff prays as follows:—

1.—That an account may be taken of what is due for principal and interest on the said mortgage.

2.—That the defendants, James Styles and Henry Jones, may be decreed to pay to the plaintiff the amount which shall be so found due, together with his costs of this suit, by a short day to be appointed for that purpose, or, in default thereof, that the defendants James Styles and Henry Jones, and all persons claiming under them, may be absolutely foreclosed of all right and equity of redemption in or to the said mortgaged premises.

3.—That the defendant James Styles may be restrained by the injunction of this honourable Court from felling, cutting, or disposing of any of the timber or timber-like trees now standing or growing in or upon the said farm and premises comprised in the said indenture of mortgage, or any part thereof.

4.—That the plaintiff may have such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require.

Names of defendants.

The defendants to this bill of complaint are,
James Styles,
Henry Jones,

Y. Y.,

Interrogatories for the examination of the above-named defendants in answer to the plaintiff's bill of complaint.

1.—Does not the defendant Henry Jones claim to have some charge upon the farm and premises comprised in the indenture of mortgage of the 1st of May 1850, in the plaintiff's bill mentioned?

2.—What are the particulars of such charge, if any, the date, nature and short effect of the security, and what is due thereon?

3.—Are there or is there any other mortgages or mortgage, charges or charge, incumbrances or incumbrance, in any and what manner affecting the aforesaid premises, or any part thereof?

4.—Set forth the particulars of such mortgages or mortgage, charges or charge, incumbrances or incumbrance; the date, nature, and short effect of the security; what is now due thereon; and who is or are entitled thereto respectively; and when and by whom, and in what manner, every such mortgage, charge, or incumbrance was created.

The defendant James Styles is required to answer all these interrogatories.

The defendant Henry Jones is required to answer the interrogatories numbered 1 and 2.

The Answer of James Styles, one of the above-named Defendants to the Bill of Complaint of the above-named Plaintiff.

In answer to the said bill, I, James Styles, say as follows:—

1.—I believe that the defendant, Henry Jones, does claim to have a charge upon the farm and premises comprised in the indenture of mortgage of the 1st of May 1850, in the plaintiff's bill mentioned.

2.—Such charge was created by an indenture dated the 1st of November 1850, made between myself of the one part, and the said defendant Henry Jones of the other part, whereby I granted and conveyed the said farm and premises, subject to the mortgage made by the said indenture of the 1st of May 1850, unto the defendant Henry Jones for securing the sum of 2,000*l.* and interest at the rate of 5*l.* per centum per annum, and the amount due thereon is the said sum of 2,000*l.*, with interest thereon, from the date of such mortgage.

3.—To the best of my knowledge, remembrance, and belief there is not any other mortgage, charge, or incumbrance affecting the aforesaid premises.

G. J. TURNER, Vice Chancellor, or,

RICHD. T. KINDERSLEY, Vice Chancellor, or,

JAMES PARKER, Vice Chancellor.

NOTE.—If the above-named William Jackson does not attend either in person or by his solicitor, at the time and place above mentioned, such order will be made in his absence as the Judge may think just and expedient.

This summons was taken out by A. and B., of Lincoln's Inn, in the county of Middlesex solicitors for the above-named Joseph Wilson.

Saturday, August 7, 1852.

THE Right Honourable EDWARD BURTENSHAW LORD ST. LEONARDS, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, by and with the advice and assistance of the Right Honourable Sir JOHN ROMILLY, Master of the Rolls, the Right Honourable the Lord Justice Sir JAMES LEWIS KNIGHT BRUCE, the Right Honourable the Lord Justice LORD CRANWORTH, the Right Honourable the Vice Chancellor Sir GEORGE JAMES TURNER, the Honourable the Vice Chancellor Sir RICHARD TORIN KINDERSLEY, and the Honourable the Vice Chancellor Sir JAMES PARKER, DOth HEREBY, in pursuance and execution of all powers enabling him in that behalf, ORDER AND DIRECT :—

That all and every the Orders, Rules, and Directions hereinafter set forth shall henceforth be, and for all purposes be deemed and taken to be, General Orders and Rules of the High Court of Chancery, viz. :—

I.—That no appeal from any Decree, Order, or Dismission, or any re-hearing of the case on which such Decree, Order or Dismission is founded, shall be allowed, unless the same is set down for hearing, and the requisite notice thereof duly served, within five years from the date of any such Decree, Order, or dismission respectively.

II.—That all Decrees and Orders, and all Dismissions, pronounced or made in any cause, claim or matter in this Court which shall be enrolled, shall be so enrolled within six calendar months after the same shall be so pronounced or made respectively, and not at any time after without special leave of the Court, such leave to be obtained in manner next hereinafter mentioned.

III.—In case any party is desirous to enrol a Decree, or Order, or Dismission after the expiration of six calendar months from the time the same shall have been made, he shall obtain an order for that purpose, and which order, unless made by consent of the adverse party, or on motion and notice to all the parties, shall be a conditional order in the first instance, but shall become absolute without further order, unless cause is shewn against it within twenty-eight days after service of the order.

IV.—That where a caveat is entered with the proper officer to stay the signing of the docket of the enrolment of any Decree, Order, or Dismission, such caveat shall be prosecuted with effect within twenty-eight days after the docket of such Decree, Order, or Dismission shall be left to be signed with the proper officer by the party who entered the same, otherwise such caveat shall be of no force; and the docket of such Decree, Order, or Dismission may immediately after the expiration of the said twenty-eight days be presented to be signed, as if no such caveat had been entered.

V.—That no enrolment of any Decree, Order, or Dismission shall be allowed after the expiration of five years from the date thereof.

VI.—That the Lord Chancellor, either sitting alone, or with the Lords Justices, or either of them, shall be at liberty, where it shall appear to him under the peculiar circumstances of the case to be just and expedient, to enlarge the periods hereinbefore appointed for a re-hearing, or an appeal, or for an enrolment.

VII.—That these Orders shall take effect on and from the twenty-eighth day of October next.

Saturday, October 16, 1852.

THE Right Honourable EDWARD BURTONSHAW LORD ST. LEONARDS, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, by and with the advice and assistance of the Right Honourable Sir JOHN ROMILLY, Master of the Rolls, the Right Honourable the Vice Chancellor Sir GEORGE JAMES TURNER, and the Honourable the Vice Chancellor Sir RICHARD TORIN KINDERSLEY, DOETH HEREBY, in pursuance of an Act of Parliament passed in the fifteenth and sixteenth years of Her present Majesty, intituled "An Act to abolish the Office of Master in Ordinary of the High Court of Chancery, and to make provision for the more speedy and efficient despatch of Business in the said Court," and in pursuance and execution of all other powers enabling him in that behalf, ORDER AND DIRECT :—

That all and every the Orders, Rules, and Directions hereinafter set forth shall henceforth be, and for all purposes be deemed and taken to be, General Orders and Rules of the High Court of Chancery, viz. :—

Summons.

I.—The summons for the purpose of proceedings before the Master of the Rolls and Vice Chancellors respectively at Chambers, whether originating in chambers or not, may be in a form similar to the form set forth in Schedule (A) to these Orders, with such variations as the circumstances of the case may require.

II.—The summons to be issued under section 30. of the Act of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80. may be in a form similar to the form set forth in Schedule (B) to these Orders, with such variations as the circumstances of the case may require.

III.—A seal is forthwith to be provided for the chambers of the Master of the Rolls and each of the Vice Chancellors, and summonses are to be prepared by the parties, and sealed by one of the clerks, at the chambers of the Judge from whose chambers they are issued, and a copy of such summons is to be left at the Judge's chambers by the party obtaining such summons.

IV.—In cases of applications under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. s. 45. applications for guardianship and maintenance of infants, originating in chambers, and of all other applications originating in chambers, a duplicate of the summons is to be filed in the Record and Writ Office, and in cases where service is required, the copies served are to be stamped in the manner provided by section 46. of the Act of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86.

V.—In cases where proceedings originate in chambers, the original summons is to be served seven clear days before the return thereof. All other summonses, not being summonses referred to in Order II., are to be served two clear days before the return thereof.

VI.—In cases where proceedings originate in chambers, and where from any cause the summons may not have been served upon any party seven clear days before the return thereof, an indorsement may be made upon the summons, and upon a copy thereof stamped for service, appointing a new time for the parties not before served to attend at the chambers of the Judge, and such indorsements are to be sealed at the Judge's chambers, and the service of the copy so indorsed and sealed, is to have the same force and effect as the service of an original summons and where any party has been served before such indorsement, the hearing thereof may upon the return of the summons be adjourned to the new time so appointed.

Appearances.

VII.—In all cases where proceedings originate in chambers, the parties served are before they are heard in chambers to enter appearances in the Record and Writ Office, and give notice there.

Orders and Directions, applicable to all Cases, whether originating in Chambers or not.

VIII.—In all cases in which by any Order any accounts are directed to be taken, or inquiries to be made, each direction shall be numbered, so that as far as may be each distinct account and inquiry may be designated by a number, and such Order may be in the form set forth in Schedule (C) to these Orders, with such variations as the circumstances of the case may require.

IX.—Where an order is made directing an account of debts, claims, or liabilities, or an inquiry for next-of-kin or other unascertained persons, unless otherwise ordered, all persons who do not come in and prove their claims within the time which may be fixed for that purpose by advertisement, are to be excluded from the benefit of the order.

X.—Where an order is made directing an account of the debts of a deceased person, unless otherwise ordered, interest is to be computed on such debts as to such of them as carry interest after the rate they respectively carry, and as to all others after the rate of 44. per cent. per annum, from the date of the order.

XI.—Where an order is made directing an account of legacies, unless otherwise ordered, interest is to be computed on such legacies after the rate of 44. per cent. per annum, from the end of one year after the deceased's death, unless any other time of payment or rate of interest is directed by the will, and in that case according to the will.

XII.—Where an order is made directing any property to be sold, unless otherwise ordered, the same is to be sold with the approbation of the Judge to whose Court the cause or matter is attached, to the best purchaser that can be got for the same, to be allowed by such Judge, and all proper parties are to join therein as such Judge shall direct.

XIII.—Where an order is made directing a receiver to be appointed, unless otherwise ordered, the person to be appointed is first to give security, to be allowed by the Judge to whose Court the cause is attached, and taken before an officer or agent of the court in the country, if there shall be occasion, duly to account for what he shall receive on account of the rents and profits, for the receipt of which he is to be appointed, at such periods as such Judge shall appoint, and to account for and pay the same as the Court shall direct, or as the case may be, to be answerable for what he shall receive in respect of the personal estate, for the getting in and collection of which he is to be appointed, and to account for and pay the same as the Court shall direct; and the person so to be appointed is to be allowed a proper salary for his care and pains in receiving such rents and profits, or, as the case may be, to have an allowance made to him in respect of his collecting such personal estate.

XIV.—The General Orders of the Court with respect to receivers shall, mutatis mutandis, apply to receivers appointed under orders made after these Rules and Regulations come into operation.

XV.—Recognizances which have been heretofore given to the Master of the Rolls and the Senior Master in Ordinary are hereafter to be given to the Master of the Rolls and the Senior Vice-Chancellor for the time being.

Proceedings in Chambers.

XVI.—In all cases where matters, in respect of which summonses have been issued, are not disposed of upon the return of the summons, the parties are to attend from time to time without further summons, at such time or times as may be appointed for the consideration or further consideration of the matter.

XVII.—In all cases of proceedings in chambers under any order, the solicitor prosecuting the same shall leave a copy of such order at the Judge's chambers, and shall certify the same to be a true copy of the order as passed and entered.

XVIII.—Upon a copy of the order being left, a summons is to be issued to proceed with the accounts or inquiries directed, and upon the return of such summons, the Judge is to be satisfied by proper evidence that all necessary parties have been served with notice of the order, and thereupon directions are to be given as to the manner in which each of the accounts and inquiries is to be prosecuted, the evidence to be adduced in support thereof, the parties who are to attend on the several accounts and inquiries, and the time within which each proceeding is to be taken; and a day or days may be appointed for the further attendance of the parties, and all such directions may afterwards be varied or added to as may be found necessary.

XIX.—If, upon the hearing of the summons, it shall appear to the Judge that by reason of absence, or for any other sufficient cause, the service of notice of the order upon any party cannot be made, or ought to be dispensed with, the Judge may, if he shall think fit, wholly dispense with such service, or may, at his discretion, order any substituted service, or notice by advertisement or otherwise, in lieu of such service.

XX.—If, in the prosecution of the order, it shall appear to the Judge that it would be expedient that further accounts should be taken or further inquiries made, he may order the same to be taken or made accordingly, or if desired by any party may direct the same to be considered in open court.

XXI.—At the time any summons or appointment is obtained, an entry thereof is to be made in a book, called "The Summons and Appointment Book," stating the date on which the summons is issued or appointment made, the name of the cause or matter, and by what party, and, shortly, for what purpose, such summons or appointment is obtained, and at what time returnable.

XXII.—Lists of matters appointed for each day are to be made out and affixed outside the doors of the chambers of the respective Judges, and, subject to any special direction, such matters are to be heard in the order in which they appear in such List.

XXIII.—The course of proceeding in chambers is ordinarily to be the same as the course of proceeding in Court upon motions. No states of facts, charges, or discharges are to be brought in. But when directed, copies, abstracts, or extracts of or from accounts, deeds, or other documents, and pedigrees and concise statements, are to be supplied for the use of the Judge and his Chief Clerk, and, where so directed, copies are to be handed over to the other parties. But no copies to be made of deeds or documents where the originals can be brought in, without special direction.

XXIV.—The party intending to use any affidavit on any proceeding in chambers is to give notice to the other parties concerned of his intention in that behalf.

XXV.—The practice of the Court with respect to evidence before the hearing, when applied to evidence to be taken before an Examiner in any cause subsequently to the hearing, is to be subject to any special directions which may be given in any particular case.

XXVI.—Where a Chief Clerk is directed by the Judge to examine any witness, the practice and mode of proceeding is to be the same as in the case of the examination of witnesses before the Examiner, subject to any special directions which may be given in any particular case.

XXVII.—The original examinations and depositions of parties and witnesses taken by or before the Chief Clerk, authenticated by his signature, are to be transmitted by him to the Record and Writ Office, to be there filed, and any party to the suit or proceeding may have a copy thereof, or of any part or portion thereof, upon payment of the proper fee.

XXVIII.—All orders made in chambers, and drawn up by the Chief Clerks or Registrars are to be entered in the same manner and in the same office as orders made in open Court are entered.

XXIX.—Where any account is directed to be taken, the accounting party is, unless the Judge shall otherwise direct, to make out his account and verify the same by affidavit. The items on each side of the account are to be numbered consecutively, and the account is to be referred to by the affidavit as an exhibit, and to be left in the Judge's chambers.

XXX.—Any party seeking to charge any accounting party beyond what he has by his account admitted to have received is to give notice thereof to the accounting party, stating, so far as he is able, the amount sought to be charged, and the particulars thereof, in a short and succinct manner.

XXXI.—Upon a Receiver's account being left in the Judge's chambers to be passed, a summons to proceed thereon is to be taken out; and the account, when passed, is to be entered by the solicitor of the Receiver in books in the same manner as heretofore; but the affidavit verifying the account so passed is to refer to it as an exhibit, and not to be annexed to it.

XXXII.—When a receivership has been completed, the book containing the accounts is to be deposited in the Record and Writ Office.

XXXIII.—Where advertisements are required for any purpose, a peremptory and only one is to be issued, unless for any special reason it may be thought necessary to issue a second advertisement or further advertisements; and any advertisement may be repeated as many times and in such papers as may be directed.

XXXIV.—The advertisements are to be prepared by the solicitor, and submitted to the Chief Clerk for approval, and, when approved, are to be signed by him, and such signature is to be sufficient authority to the printer of the Gazette to insert same.

XXXV.—Advertisements for creditors or other claimants are to fix a time for the creditors or claimants to come in and prove their claims, and to appoint a day for the hearing and adjudicating thereon, and may be in a form similar to the form set forth in Schedule (D) to these Orders, with such variations as the circumstances of the case may require.

XXXVI.—Claimants coming in pursuant to advertisement are to enter their claims at the chambers of the Judge in the "Summons and Appointment Book," for the day appointed for hearing by the advertisement, and are to give notice thereof and of the affidavit filed to the solicitors in the cause, within the time specified in the advertisement for bringing in claims.

XXXVII.—The claimants filing affidavits are not to be required to take office copies; but the party prosecuting the cause or matter is to take office copies, and produce the same at the hearing, unless otherwise ordered in chambers.

XXXVIII.—If on the day appointed for hearing the claims, there are any not then disposed of, an adjournment day for hearing such claims is to be fixed; and where further evidence is to be adduced, a time may be named within which the evidence on both sides is to be closed, and directions may be given as to the mode in which such evidence is to be adduced.

XXXIX.—Any claimant who has not before entered his claim, may be heard on such adjournment day, provided he enters his claim and files his affidavit four clear days prior to such day, and no certificate of debts or claims shall in the mean time have been made.

XL.—Creditors claiming debts not exceeding 5*l*. need not attend on the day of hearing, unless required to do so by notice from some party.

XLI.—After the time fixed by the advertisement, no claims are to be received except as before provided, in case of an adjournment, unless the Judge at chambers shall think fit to give special leave, upon application made by summons, and then upon such terms and conditions as to costs and otherwise as the Judge shall think fit.

XLII.—A list of all claims allowed shall, when required by the Judge, be made out and left in the Judge's chambers by the party prosecuting the order.

XLIII.—In cases where the Court directs any computation of interest, or the apportionment of any fund, which is to be acted upon by the Accountant-General or other person, without any further order from the Court, the order to be made by the Court may direct such computation or apportionment to be made by one of the Chief Clerks attached to the Court of such Judge, and may direct the certificate thereof, signed by such Chief Clerk, to be acted upon accordingly, without the same being signed and adopted by the Judge.

XLIV.—Where an account has been directed, the certificate or report is to state the result of such account, and not set the same out by way of schedule, but is to refer to the account verified by the affidavit filed, and to specify by the numbers attached to the items in the account, which, if any, of such items have been disallowed or varied, and to state what additions, if any, have been made by way of surcharge. In any case in which the account verified by the affidavit has been so altered that it is necessary to have a fair transcript of the account as altered, such transcript may be required to be made by the solicitor prosecuting the order, and is then to be referred to by the certificate or report. The accounts and the transcripts, if any, referred to by certificates or reports, are to be filed therewith, but no copies thereof are to be required to be taken by any party.

XLV.—The certificates or reports to be made by the Chief Clerk to the Judge are not, except the special circumstances of the case shall render it necessary, to set out the order, or any documents, or evidence, or reasons, but are to refer to the order, documents, and evidence, or particular paragraphs thereof, so that it may appear upon what the result stated in any such certificate or report is founded.

XLVI.—The certificate of the Chief Clerk to the Judge may be in a form similar to the form set forth in Schedule (E) to these Orders, with such variations as the circumstances of the case may require, and when prepared and settled, it is to be transcribed by the solicitor prosecuting the proceedings, in such form and within such time as the Chief Clerk shall require, and is then to be signed by the Chief Clerk at an adjournment to be made for that purpose. But where, from the nature of the case, the certificate can be drawn and copied in chambers whilst the parties are present before the Chief Clerk, the same shall be then completed and signed by him without any adjournment.

XLVII.—The time within which any party is to be at liberty to take the opinion of the Judge upon any proceeding which shall have been concluded, but as to which the certificate or report of a Chief Clerk shall not have been signed and adopted by the Judge, is to be four clear days after the certificate or report shall have been signed by the Chief Clerk.

XLVIII.—Any party desiring to take the opinion of the Judge, as mentioned in the last preceding rule, is within four clear days after the certificate or report shall have been signed by the Chief Clerk, to obtain a summons for such purpose.

XLIX.—At the expiration of four clear days after the certificate or report shall have been signed by the Chief Clerk, if no party has in the mean time obtained a summons to take the opinion of the Judge thereon, the Chief Clerk is to submit the certificate or report to the Judge for his approval, and the Judge may thereupon, if he approve the same, sign such certificate or report in testimony of his adoption thereof as follows:—"Approved, this day of "

L.—The certificate or report, when signed by the Judge, with the accounts, if any, to be filed therewith, is to be transmitted by the Chief Clerk to the Report Office, to be there filed.

LI.—The time within which an application may be made by summons or motion to discharge or vary any certificate or report which has been signed and adopted by the Judge sitting in chambers, is to be eight clear days after the filing of such certificate or report.

LII.—Certificates of the Chief Clerk made as mentioned in Rule XLIII., and not required to be signed and adopted by the Judge, are to be transmitted and filed in the same manner as those signed and adopted by the Judge.

LIII.—The Orders XLVII., XLVIII., XLIX., and LI., are not to apply to certificates on passing Receiver's accounts. Such certificates may be approved and signed by the Judge without delay, and upon being so signed are to be filed and forthwith acted upon.

LIV.—A register is to be kept of all proceedings in the Judge's chambers, with proper dates, so that all the proceedings in each cause or matter may appear consecutively and in chronological order, with a short statement of the questions or points decided or ruled at any hearing.

LV.—Parties attending any proceeding in chambers, without having obtained the previous leave of the Judge to attend the same, are not to be allowed any costs of such attendance, unless by special order of the Court.

LVI.—The costs of counsel attending the Judge in chambers are not in any case to be allowed, unless the Judge certifies it to be a proper case for counsel to attend.

Deposit of Deeds.

LVII.—Where any deeds or other documents are ordered to be left or deposited, the same are to be left or deposited in the Record and Writ Office, and are to be subject to such directions as may be given for the production thereof.

Power of Judge.

LVIII.—Powers and authorities given to the Masters in Ordinary of the Court of Chancery by any General Order or Orders of the Court, may be exercised by the Judge sitting in chambers.

LIX.—The power of the Court and of the Judge sitting in chambers to enlarge or abridge the time for doing any act or taking any proceeding, and to give any special direction as to the course of proceeding in any cause or matter, is unaffected by these Orders.

Commencement of Orders.

LX.—These Orders shall take effect and come into operation from and after the 1st day of Michaelmas Term, 1852.

Interpretation.

LXI.—In these Orders the following words have the several meanings hereby assigned to them, over and above their several ordinary meanings, unless there be something in the subject, or context, repugnant to such construction; viz. :—

1. Words importing the singular number include the plural number, and words importing the plural number include the singular number.
2. Words importing the masculine gender include females.
3. The word "party," includes a body politic or corporate.
4. The word "affidavit," includes affirmation.
5. The word "Order," includes decree and decretal order.
6. The word "Receiver" includes consignee and manager.

RICHARD T. KINDERSLEY, V.C.

Monday, October 25, 1852.

THE Right Honourable EDWARD BURTENSHAW LORD ST. LEONARDS, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, DOth HEREBY, in pursuance of an Act of Parliament passed in the fifteenth and sixteenth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, intituled "An Act for the Relief of the Suitors of the High Court of Chancery," and in pursuance and execution of all other powers enabling him in that behalf, ORDER AND DIRECT that all and every the Orders, Rules, and Directions hereinafter set forth shall henceforth be, and for all purposes be deemed and taken to be, "General Orders and Rules of the High Court of Chancery," viz. :—

I.—In lieu of copies of pleadings and other proceedings in the Court of Chancery, and of the documents relating thereto, being made and delivered by officers of the court at the office in which they are filed or left, copies of such pleadings, proceedings, and documents (save as hereinafter excepted), are to be made, delivered, charged, and paid for according to the following regulations :—

1. The following copies are exempted from this Order, that is to say, office copies of proceedings filed in the Report Office; office copies of answers, pleas, and demurrers; office copies of depositions of witnesses, and examination of parties to be made for and taken by the party on whose behalf such depositions and examinations have been taken; office copies of affidavits to be made for and taken by the party filing the same; and office copies of affidavits to be taken under Order XXXVII. of 16th October, 1852.

2. The party or his solicitor requiring any copy, save as hereinbefore excepted, is to make a written application to be delivered to the party by whom the copy is to be furnished, or his solicitor, with an undertaking to pay the proper charges.

3. Upon such requisition being made with such undertaking as aforesaid, copies of such pleadings, proceedings, or documents, are to be made by the party or his solicitor filing or leaving the same, or who under the first rule may have taken office copies thereof.

4. The copies are to be ready to be delivered at the expiration of forty-eight hours after the delivery of such request and undertaking, or within such other time as the Court may in any case direct, and are to be delivered accordingly upon demand and payment of the proper charges.

5. The charges for all such copies are to be at the rate of 4*d.* per folio.

6. Copies of bills of costs are to be made side for side, so as to correspond with the bills of costs left in the office.

7. The folios of all copies are to be numbered consecutively in the margin thereof, and the name and address of the party or solicitor, by whom the same is made, is to be indorsed thereon in like manner as upon the proceedings in the court; and such party or solicitor is to be answerable for the same being true copies of the original, or of an office copy of the original pleadings, proceeding, or document of which it purports to be a copy, as the case may be.

8. In cases of ex parte applications for injunctions, or writs of ne exeat regno, the party making such application is to deliver copies of the affidavits upon which it is granted, upon payment of the proper charges immediately upon the receipt of such written request and undertaking as aforesaid, or within such time as may be specified in such request, or may have been directed by the Court.

9. Any party or solicitor who has taken any office copy mentioned in Rule 2, is to produce the same in court, or at the Judge's chambers, when required for the purpose of the proceedings to which the same relate.

II.—That all office copies, and copies to be furnished by parties or their solicitors, shall be written on paper of a convenient size, with a sufficient margin, and in a neat and legible manner, similar to that which is usually adopted by law stationers; and in the case of copies to be furnished by parties or their solicitors, unless so written, the parties or solicitors furnishing them shall not be entitled to be paid for the same.

III.—That in case any solicitor who shall be required to furnish any such copy as aforesaid shall either refuse, or for two clear days from the time when the application for such copy shall have been made shall neglect, to furnish the same, the person by whom such application shall be made shall be at liberty to procure a copy from the office in which the original shall have been filed, in the same way as if no such application had been made to the solicitor, and in such case no costs shall be due or payable to the solicitor so making default in respect of the copy or copies so applied for.

IV.—That in case any solicitor by whom any such copy ought to be furnished shall neglect to do so for such two clear days as aforesaid, or for one clear day, an addition of two clear days or one clear day, as the case may be, shall be made to the period within which any proceeding which may have to be taken after obtaining such copy ought to be so taken, so that the person requiring such copy may be as little prejudiced as possible by such neglect as aforesaid.

V.—That the Taxing Master shall not allow any costs in respect of any copy so taken as aforesaid, unless the same shall appear to him to have been requisite, and to have been made with due care both as regards the contents and the writing thereof.

VI.—That from and after the first day of November next, all the fees now payable in relation to such proceedings in the said court as are mentioned in the first part of the first Schedule hereinafter contained shall be abolished; and the fees specified in the second part of such Schedule shall be payable, and the same (save as provided by the seventh of these Orders) shall be collected, not in money, but by means of stamps denoting the amount of such fees, stamped or affixed, at the expense of the parties liable to pay the fees, on or to the vellum, parchment, or paper on which the proceedings in respect whereof such fees are payable are written, or printed, or which may be otherwise used in reference to such proceeding.

And where any of the fees specified in the second part of the said first Schedule shall be payable in respect of any matter or thing to be done by any officer, or in any office of the court, and it shall not have been customary to use any written or printed document or paper in reference to such matter or thing, whereon the stamp could be affixed, the party or his solicitor requiring such matter or thing to be so done, shall make application for the same, by a short note or memorandum in writing, and a stamp denoting the amount of the fee so payable shall be stamped on, or affixed to, such note or memorandum.

VII.—That in all cases where the costs are directed to be paid out of a fund in court, the fees of taxation shall not be payable by means of stamps, but shall be carried over by the Accountant General to the credit of the Suits' Fee Fund; and, to that intent, the Taxing Master shall in such cases certify the amount of such fees.

VIII.—That from and after the 28th October, 1852, the brokerage which shall or may from time to time be received by the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery shall be paid by him, on the first day of every month, or as soon after as conveniently may be, into the Bank of England, to be there placed to his credit as such Accountant General, to the account entitled "The Suits' Fee Fund Account."

IX.—That, subject to the superintendence and direction of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, with the approbation of the Lord Chancellor, the first, second, and third clerks in each division of the Accountant General's office, shall, from and after the said 28th day of October, 1852, and until other order or provision shall be made in that behalf, continue to perform the acts or duties hitherto performed by such clerks, and which are mentioned in the said second Schedule, in addition to the duties prescribed by Act of Parliament as heretofore; and such fees as are specified in the second Schedule hereto shall be paid for such acts as aforesaid, to be accounted for in like manner as the other fees now received in the office of the said Accountant General, and to be collected by means of stamps in like manner as provided by Order VI.; and from and after the said 28th day of October, 1852, no other person shall perform such acts or duties.

And in order to enable the Lord Chancellor, with the consent of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, from time to time to fix the amount of the yearly salaries to be paid to such clerks, the Accountant General shall every six months make a return to the Lord Chancellor of the amount received during the preceding six months in respect of such fees.

The FIRST SCHEDULE to which the foregoing Orders refer.

Will—Construction—Legacies and Annuities—Priority.

*A testator gave all his property to trustees in trust to pay his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and to invest the residue in the funds, and out of the interest and dividends to pay certain annuities to his daughter and other persons, and after payment thereof to pay the remainder of the interest and dividends to his wife for life: and after her decease, in case his daughter should have no child, to pay to his daughter a further annuity during her life; but if his daughter should have a child living at the decease of his wife, or born afterwards, her annuities should cease, and his trustees were to raise 20,000*l.* out of his trust estate, and hold it in trust for his daughter for life, and after her death for her children; and if the children should die under twenty-one, that it should sink into his residuary estate thereafter disposed of; and he further directed that after the decease of his wife, his trustees should pay the sum of 5,000*l., part of his residuary estate, to such person as his wife should appoint by will, and he gave his wife *power to dispose of 1,000*l.* either by gift in her lifetime or by will to her three co-trustees. The estate was insufficient to pay the annuities and sums of 5,000*l.* and 1,000*l.* in full:—Held, reversing the decision of the Court below, that the annuities and legacies must abate proportionably, and that the annuitants were not entitled to have their annuities made up out of the corpus of the estate.*

The will of Thomas Creswick, dated the 5th of December 1834, after a bequest to his wife, Sarah Creswick, of his household furniture, &c. and of the sum of 1,000*l.* to be paid to her immediately after his decease, was as follows:—"I give, devise and bequeath to the said Sarah Creswick and to my nephews, T. C. Huddleston, W. Jackson and P. Jackson, all my freehold, copyhold and leasehold messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments whatsoever and wheresoever, and all the rest and residue of my goods, chattels, stock in trade, monies, securities, securities for money, money in the public stocks or funds, debts, effects and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever, to hold the same to the said Sarah Creswick, T. C. Huddleston, W. Jackson and P. Jackson, their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, upon trust that the said Sarah Creswick, T. C. Huddleston,

W. Jackson and P. Jackson or the survivors or survivor of them, &c., do and shall, with all convenient speed after my death, sell and dispose of my freehold, copyhold and leasehold messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments, stock in trade and other parts of my said personal estate, and collect and get in all my outstanding debts, and convert the whole of my said trust estate, except monies in the public or government stocks or funds, into ready money, and stand possessed of the money arising from such sale and collection as aforesaid, upon trust to pay all my just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses; and, after such payment, upon trust to invest the residue of the said money arising from such sale and collection in their own names, or in the names or name of the survivors or survivor of them, on government stocks, funds and securities, and stand possessed of the stocks, funds and securities whereon the same shall be invested, upon trust, out of the interest or dividends arising therefrom, and other income arising from my said trust estate, to pay unto my daughter Mary Ann Miller, one annuity or yearly sum of 500*l.* during her life, without any deduction for legacy duty or other deductions whatsoever, by equal half-yearly payments, to and for her own proper use and benefit, and with which her said present or any future husband, with whom she may hereafter intermarry, shall not intermeddle or have anything to do, &c., and her receipt, although covert, shall be the only good and sufficient discharge to my said trustees, from time to time, for such annuity: and upon further trust, out of the said interest or dividends, to pay unto my brother, William Creswick, one annuity or yearly sum of 100*l.* without any deduction for legacy duty, or any other deduction whatsoever, during his life; and from and after the decease of my said brother, upon trust to pay to my nephew, Thomas Creswick, the blind son of my said brother, one annuity of 50*l.* during his life, without any deduction for legacy duty or any deduction whatsoever; and, after payment of the said several annuities, upon trust to pay the remainder of the interest or dividends arising from such investment, and the rents and profits of any part of my said freehold, copyhold or leasehold hereditaments, which shall be unsold, and let on lease as hereinafter provided, and the interest of any money which shall be lent upon security as hereinafter mentioned unto my said wife, Sarah Creswick, or permit and suffer her to receive the same during her life, and also the said annuities, in case any or either of them shall cease to be longer payable to the said annuitants, any or either of them, in her lifetime, to and for her own proper use and benefit: and, after the decease of my said wife, and during the lifetime of my said daughter, Mary Ann Miller, and if she, the said Mary Ann Miller, shall have no child or children living at the time of the decease of my said wife, upon trust to pay to the said Mary Ann Miller a further annuity of 500*l.* during her life, to and for her own sole and separate use, in the same manner and with the same restriction on her present or any future husband as is hereinbefore contained respecting the first mentioned annuity of 500*l.* payable to her; but if my said daughter shall have any child or children, living at the time of the decease of my said wife, by her said present or any future husband, or if my said daughter shall have any child or children at any time after the decease of my said wife, then, from and after the birth of such child or children, the said two several annuities of 500*l.* each shall cease and be no longer paid or payable to my said daughter, but I will and direct that the said T. C. Huddleston, W. Jackson and P. Jackson, or the trustees or trustee for the time being, shall by the sale of so much of the stocks, funds or securities upon which my said trust estate shall then be invested, as will be sufficient, raise the sum of 20,000*l.*, and, after the same shall be raised as aforesaid, upon trust forthwith to invest the same in some or one of the public or government stocks or funds, in their own names, or in the names or in the name of the trustees or trustee for the time being, and after such investment shall stand possessed of such stocks, funds or securities, upon trust to pay the interest or dividends arising therefrom unto my said daughter, Mary Ann Miller, during her life, to and for her own sole and separate use, and with the like restrictions respecting her said present or any future husband as are hereinbefore mentioned and expressed concerning the said annuities to be paid to her for life, in case she my said daughter shall have no child or children; and from and after the decease of my said daughter, upon trust for all and every the children of my said daughter, Mary Ann Miller, if more than one, to be divided between them, share and share alike, at their respective ages of twenty-one years; and in case there shall be but one child of my said daughter who shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years, then upon trust for such only child, &c.; and in case all my said daughter's children shall happen to die before they shall attain the age of twenty-one years, I will and direct that the said 20,000*l.*, or the stocks, funds or securities upon which the same shall be invested, shall sink into and become part of my residuary estate hereinafter disposed of; and upon further trust that the said T. C. Huddleston, W. Jackson and P. Jackson, or the trustees or trustee for the time being, do and shall after the decease of my said wife, pay the sum of 5,000*l.*, part of my residuary estate, unto such person or persons, in such parts and proportions and at such time and times as my said wife, Sarah Creswick, shall by her last will and testament appoint in writing, give and bequeath, or direct and appoint the same to be paid unto; and, subject to the trusts of this my will, I give and bequeath the residue of my trust estate unto my said nephews, T. C. Huddleston, W. Jackson and P. Jackson, and my nieces Emma Huddleston, Ann G. Jackson, and Sarah M. Jackson, equally to be divided between them, share and share alike, when and as the same or any part thereof shall become divisible by the deaths of the said annuitants or otherwise; it being my will that after the payment of the said sum of 5,000*l.*, of which my said wife is to have the disposal by her will as aforesaid, the said 1,000*l.* of which she is to have the disposal either by gift in her lifetime or by her will to my said trustees, T. C. Huddleston, W. Jackson and P. Jackson, or such part thereof as she shall so dispose of by her said will, and reserving sufficient of my said trust estate to raise and pay the said annuities given to my said daughter, or the said 20,000*l.* directed to be held for her, and her children or child in the event of her having any children or child, at any time hereafter, and the said annuity of 100*l.* given to my said brother William Creswick for life, and after his decease of the annuity of 50*l.* given to his son Thomas Creswick during his life, my said residuary estate may be divided between my said residuary legatees at any time after the decease of my said wife, as they, the said T. C. Huddleston, W. Jackson and P. Jackson, or the trustees or trustee for the time being, shall think proper. And as it is my wish to spare my said wife all the care and trouble possible in the management of my affairs, I have appointed my said three nephews to be executors and trustees with her, hoping and expecting they will be active and render every assistance in their power for the settling and arranging my affairs. And to enable my said wife to make them some compensation out of my said trust estate for such care and trouble, I do hereby will and direct that my said wife shall have power to dispose of 1,000*l.*, part of my said trust estate, or such part or parts thereof, either by gift in her lifetime, or bequests by her will, to her said three co-trustees, T. C. Huddleston, W. Jackson and P. Jackson, in such proportions as she, my said wife, shall think fit; and my said trustees are by this my will directed and empowered to pay and dispose of the said 1,000*l.*, or such part or parts thereof as my said wife shall direct, either in her lifetime or after her decease, to the said T. C. Huddleston, W. Jackson and P. Jackson, or any or either of them."

The testator died in September 1840, and his widow retained her legacy of 1,000*l.*, and made valid appointments of the 5,000*l.*, and of 800*l.* part of the 1,000*l.* which she had power to dispose of under the will. The testator's daughter, Mary Ann Miller, the plaintiff in the cause, never had a child; and, at the time of filing the bill, arrears to the amount of 4,567*l.* were due to her in respect of her two annuities of 500*l.* each; and the sums of 5,000*l.* and 800*l.* remained unpaid. The assets being insufficient to pay the legacies and annuities in full, the question raised on the cause coming on for further directions was, whether the annuities and legacies ought to abate proportionably; or whether the annuities ought to be paid in priority, and, if necessary, out of the corpus of the estate.

The Vice Chancellor of England held that the two annuities of 500*l.* each given to the testator's daughter, and the annuities of 100*l.* and 50*l.* given to the brother and nephew, had priority; and that the arrears, if necessary, ought to be paid out of the corpus of the estate; and that the sum of 800*l.*, part of the sum of 1,000*l.*, ought to be paid in the next place in priority to the legacy or sum of 5,000*l.*

The executors and the persons entitled to the legacy of 5,000*l.* appealed against this decree.

Nov. 5, 1851.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.

—This is an appeal from an order of the Vice Chancellor of England, made on the 2nd of August 1849, by which it was declared that certain annuities bequeathed by the will of Thomas Creswick were entitled to priority over the legacies given by his said will, and payment of certain arrears due in respect of such annuities was directed to be made out of the corpus of the estate. Thomas Creswick by his will, dated in 1834, bequeathed, &c.—[His Lordship here stated the will and the facts of the case.]—The estate being deficient, two questions arise on the will: first, whether the annuities bequeathed thereby to his daughter and brother and nephew have any priority over the legacy of 5,000*l.* and the second legacy of 1,000*l.*, of which the wife was to have the power of disposing, or whether those annuities must abate respectively. Second, whether so much of those annuities as the income of the estate is insufficient to pay is chargeable upon the corpus? With regard to the first question, I am of opinion that the annuities had no priority.

The rule is, that in case of a deficiency all the annuities and legacies abate rateably. This rule is, indeed, subject to exceptions, for there are cases in which some annuities or legacies are to be paid in priority to others. But it is settled that the onus lies on the party, seeking priority, to make out that such priority was intended by the testator; and the proof of this must be clear and conclusive. The reason is that a testator, in the absence of clear and conclusive proof, must be deemed to have considered, that his estate would be sufficient, and consequently not to have thought it necessary to provide against a deficiency, by giving a priority, in case of a deficiency, to some of the objects of his bounty. It is true that the testator does in many cases, contemplate the possibility of a deficiency, and provides against it; but I think it may be safely affirmed, that, in the absence of all indication to the contrary, it is generally to be assumed, that the testator considers that his estate may be sufficient to answer the purposes to which he has devoted it, and consequently makes no provision against a deficiency; and such being the general rule, the Court would not be right in saying, without clear and conclusive reason, that he intended to provide against an event, which in general it is not to be supposed that he ever contemplated. In Brown v. Brown, Lord Langdale observes, "The onus is upon those who contend for a priority to shew that the testator meant to give a preference to a particular legatee;" and in Thwaites v. Foreman, Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce makes these observations:—"Primá facie all bequests stand on an equal footing, and it lies upon those who assert the contrary to prove it. It is not sufficient that the words of the will should leave the question in doubt. They must positively and clearly establish that it was the intention of the testator that the bequests should not stand upon an equal footing. Now, in considering whether such was the intention of this testator, we must recollect that words that are merely introductory cannot generally by themselves be held to direct any order of payment; we should also bear in mind an opposite observation of Sir John Leach, (I think contained in Beeston v. Booth,) that unless the testator tells you himself that he believes his assets to be insufficient, you must attribute to him the notion that he has assets sufficient to satisfy all the bequests that he makes, and if you attribute that notion to him, you cannot well infer that he intended to make provision for an order of payment applicable only to the case of the assets being insufficient." Now, to apply these principles to the present case, I conceive that the annuitants have failed in adducing clear and conclusive proofs of an intended priority. It seems to me to be so plain that no such proof has been or can be furnished from the language of this will, that it appears quite unnecessary to comment on particular points of it, although there are expressions which furnish matter of argument in favour of priority, but which are much too ambiguous to be relied on, in support of a preference, which for the reasons I have mentioned, is antecedently improbable, when those ambiguous expressions can be fully satisfied by another and more probable construction. If the words in Beeston v. Booth and Thwaites v. Foreman did not import a priority, much less can the words used in the will. The words "after payment," may merely refer to the order of payment to be made on the supposition that there was a sufficiency of assets to pay all the legacies, and do not necessarily or clearly import a preference in the event of a deficiency of assets; they are merely introductory to what follows, importing no more than would have been implied without them. And I may add, that the order in which the different bequests stand in the first part of the will, even if it were material, is altered when they are all referred to in a subsequent part of the will.

As to the cases in which a priority has been allowed, I may observe that Brown v. Brown was a perfectly clear case of priority, inasmuch that, as observed by Lord Langdale, there would have been no way in which effect could have been given to the words used by the testator but by giving a priority to the second legatee. In Boyd v. Buckle, the circumstances and language were so different, and the judgment so short and so entirely limited in its application to the particular words there used, that it can afford no assistance in the decision of the present case. There is only one case calculated to suggest any doubt; I allude to Lewin v. Lewin. There a testator gave an annuity of 120*l.* to his wife for life, and directed his executors to purchase, if they could, the said annuity of 120*l.* in government securities, of ninety-nine years or some other longer term, or if they could not do that, to purchase lands of 200*l.* a-year value, to be settled in such a way that the said annuity should be to his wife free from taxes, with remainders over. He also directed, that if he should have any child living at his death, his executors should out of the profits of the residue of his estate pay to his wife 30*l.* per annum for the maintenance of such child, and he gave legacies to some collateral relations and friends; and all the residue of his estate he directed to be put out to the best advantage for his children at his death; and Lord Hardwicke held that the annuity should not abate. He remarked "This is a very strong case to shew that this annuity and the fund for it, was intended by the testator to be preferred to all the other legacies in the will. It is not suggested that either the wife or children have any other provision, and when a man is so situated as he was, and (as appears from other words in the will,) having a prospect of more children, and no provision, by settlement or otherwise, under which his wife or children could claim, it was natural for him, in making a disposition of his estate, so to give it that their provision should be in the first place, and not to abide by the contingency of his estate producing more or less at the time of his death, and of sharing in proportion with others, strangers in blood, though friends to him or collateral relations, to whom he had given legacies; it was natural he should not intend they should abide by that event, though that is the general rule of law." "It is said there are cases wherein the Court has gone a great way to level legatees and make them abate in proportion, as in Brown v. Allen (1). I do not remember the state of that case; and there may be a difference in the state of it; for if the testator says 'imprimis,' or 'in the first place I give such a legacy,' that amounts only to the order in which he expresses his gifts in the will; to nothing more. But if he had said 'to be paid in the first place,' and it had been in that case a provision for a wife, I should have doubted of that determination, and should have inclined to think it was a declaration of his intent that that provision for his wife should come out of the personal estate, and be paid in the first place, because there is ground for that from the preference to a wife and children unprovided for. If, indeed, in that will they all stood in equal degree, it was sufficient ground for the Court not to presume a preference; but if it was a provision for a wife or child, unprovided, that is different."

The question in the present case is between a brother and a child on the one hand, and the appointees of the wife, who are the nieces of the testator, on the other. But it is plain from the words which I have quoted, that Lord Hardwicke regarded the circumstance of mere relationship, where viewed as a reason for priority, as not being itself a sufficient ground, but as constituting an auxiliary reason for allowing such priority, where the words used in the will favour the notion of a priority to a sufficient degree. I do not think, however, that the words used in this will are sufficient to establish a preference, even in conjunction with the circumstances of filial relationship; but I confess I do not attach much weight to that circumstance. And in Blower v. Morret (2) Lord Hardwicke speaks of that circumstance in terms which seem to shew, that subsequently to the adjudication of the question in Lewin v. Lewin, he had somewhat altered his views as to the degree of consideration which was due to the circumstance of filial relationship in the determination of questions of priority; for, in the case of Blower v. Morret, he speaks of the fact of near relationship in these very qualified terms: "There is, to be sure, some colour and reason that a man, giving a legacy or provision for his wife, may have an intent to prefer her, because it is a duty he owes to nature; and so of children; whereas the others are out of mere voluntary bounty or favour." And in the same case he said that the governing reason in Lewin v. Lewin was that the testator had constituted two residues of his estate; the first to be computed after taking out the money for the purchase of the annuity to his wife; the other to be computed after taking out the money left to the pecuniary legatees.

If we must speculate on the presumable intention of the testator, I do not consider it by any means clear that the testator must be presumed to have intended a preference of his child, which might operate to the exclusion of others, for whom he had manifested an intention to make some provision. If the testator has thought fit to provide for other persons besides his children and his wife,—if he has not made them the exclusive objects of his bounty, in the case of the property being sufficient, he might never have intended them to be the exclusive objects of that bounty, even in the event of a deficiency. He may have intended that the others should share with them in the latter case as well as in the former, and in the same proportion. And I can imagine many cases in which to give priority on the ground of propinquity would be to do what, in all probability, would be most foreign to the intention of a testator. Take, for example, the common instance of a legacy of a large sum to a child, and another legacy of a smaller sum to an aged relation, or another legacy of a still smaller sum to a friend in poverty or to an old servant. By giving priority to the child's legacy, the other might lose his or her legacy altogether, and yet in most cases this would be utterly repugnant to what it may fairly be presumed the testator would have intended, had he known that there would have been a deficiency of assets. Where the words are ambiguous, I certainly think it is allowable to consider what is the presumable intention of the testator, not, indeed, what the testator would have intended had he known that there would be a deficiency of assets, but what it may fairly be presumed he did intend to accomplish by the words used in the will. But, for the reasons which I have given, it cannot be fairly presumed that the testator intended to give a priority to his daughter from the circumstance of the filial relationship, in conjunction with the ambiguous expressions which occur in this will.

With reference to the opinion which I have formed, that those expressions are too ambiguous to be at all relied on, there is an apposite passage in Lord Hardwicke's judgment, in Blower v. Morret, where he says, "In most cases the Court has disclaimed the laying weight on particular words, as the saying 'imprimis,' or 'in the first place,' or a direction for the time of payment. All these are always disclaimed, and that upon just and solid reason, because if the Court was, upon such grounds, to give a preference to one pecuniary legatee, there would be no end of it, considering the variety of expression and the incorrectness with which wills are frequently drawn."

With regard to the second question, I think the annuities are not payable out of the corpus. As to the annuity to the brother, and the first annuity of 500*l.* to the daughter, the testator has expressly directed that they are to be paid out of the interest and dividends of his trust estate. And with respect to the second annuity of 500*l.* to the daughter, the words "in the same manner" appear to me to mean that the second annuity is to be payable out of the "interest and dividends" of the trust estate, "without any deduction for legacy duty, or other deduction whatsoever, by equal half-yearly payments." To hold that they relate to the words by which the first annuity is given to the daughter's separate use, and by which her husband is expressly excluded, would be unnecessarily to construe them as mere surplusage. But independently of the words "in the same manner," the second annuity would be payable in the same way as the first. In support of this, I may observe that in Crowder v. Clowes, Sir R. P. Arden, Master of the Rolls, observed "Lord Thurlow has determined that substituted and added legacies shall be raised out of the same fund and subject to the same conditions." To say that the bequest of the second annuity of 500*l.* explains the bequest of the first annuity of 500*l.* is to make the more ambiguous and indefinite expressions explain the more clear and definite, and in fact it is to make the second bequest explain the first bequest, although the testator has himself shewn, in express terms, that the second bequest was to be explained by the first; or, in other words, it is to reverse the natural and proper order of things. No argument can be drawn from the substitution of the 20,000*l.*, as the daughter is only to have the interest or dividends; and, indeed, to hold that the annuities are chargeable on the corpus, might have had the effect of taking away the provision for the children.

For these reasons, the decision of the Vice Chancellor must be reversed.

Will—Construction—Persona designata—Second Husband.

A testatrix gave the interest of certain money in the funds to her daughter Mary for life, and after her decease the capital to be divided between the husbands of her daughters and her son, or such of them as might be living at the decease of her daughter Mary. One of the daughters married a second husband, after the death of the testatrix, who was living at the death of the tenant for life:—Held, that the testatrix meant to designate the particular husbands living at the time she made her will, and that the second husband was not entitled to a share of the trust fund.

This petition was presented by W. Darnborough, and it stated that Ann Bryan, by her will, dated the 16th of May 1808, after giving various legacies, continued in the following words: "I will and direct that the interest arising from the stock remaining in my name in the Bank of England be received and paid half-yearly to my daughter Mary, the wife of William Dudley, during her life and for her own use, by my executor, his heirs or assigns, and that her receipt only for the same be his or their discharge. I also will and direct, notwithstanding what is directed in the preceding clause, that should my executors think proper to sell the principal of the said stock out of the Bank, and purchase an annuity with the proceeds of the said stock for the life of my said daughter Mary, to be received by him and paid to her receipt only, I do hereby authorize and empower him so to do, but should he not so dispose of the said stock, then I give and bequeath, after the decease of my said daughter Mary, the whole of the said stock to be equally divided between the husbands of my said daughters and my son, or to such of them as may be living at the time of my decease. And I do hereby appoint my son, John Bryan, whole and sole executor of this my will and testament."

The petition then stated that the testatrix died in March 1809, and the will was duly proved by her son John Bryan. That at the time of her death the only stock remaining in her name was the sum of 372*l.* 16*s.*, 3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities. That at the time of her death the testatrix left, her surviving, the said John Bryan, her son, and her three daughters, Ann, the wife of James Winson, and the said James Winson, Harriet, the wife of the petitioner, William Darnborough, and the petitioner, and Mary, the wife of W. Dudley, and the said W. Dudley. That the said J. Winson died in February 1829, and the said W. Dudley died in May 1849. That the said J. Bryan died in June 1824. That the said Ann Winson intermarried with Joseph Strutt in July 1829, and afterwards died in March 1850. That the said Mary Dudley did not marry again, but died in April 1850. That at the time of the death of the said Mary Dudley, the petitioner and the said J. Strutt were the only husbands of the daughters of the testatrix, Ann Bryan, who were then alive and who survived the said Mary Dudley; and the petitioner submitted that he thereby became entitled to the whole of the said trust fund, the said J. Strutt having intermarried with the said Ann Winson long after the death of the testatrix. That the said J. Strutt died shortly after the death of Mary Dudley, and on the 14th of May 1850, having made his will, and appointed J. Chamberlain and R. Chamberlain his executors, who duly proved his will and became his legal personal representatives.

The petition, which was presented by the said W. Darnborough, prayed a declaration that, under the circumstances, he was entitled to the whole of the said trust fund.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. E. F. Smith, in support of the petition, contended that the testatrix, by the expression, "the husbands of her daughters," meant only those husbands who were living at the time she made her will, and that Mr. Strutt, the second husband of one of her daughters, was not entitled to any share in the trust fund.—The following cases were cited—

Garratt v. Niblock, 1 Russ. & M. 629.
Parker v. Marchant, 1 You. & C. C.C.
 290; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.)
 Chanc. 223, and 12 Law J. Rep.
 (N.S.) Chanc. 385.

Mr. Grenside, for the representatives of J. Strutt, contended that the testatrix meant to designate any person standing in the conjugal relation to her daughters at the death of Mary Dudley.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. — I cannot say I think the case of Garratt v. Niblock governs this case necessarily, because there was an express indication that the testator had in view a particular individual: if he meant any wife he would not have said "his beloved wife." The expressions "my wife" and "my beloved wife" are certainly not synonymous. The question here is, whether the testatrix meant a class of persons or certain individuals. She has used no expression to indicate which she intended. She says "to be divided between the husbands of my daughters and my son, or to such of them as may be living at the death of my daughter Mary." Now, it appears that the testatrix had before mentioned her son John, and that she had but one son; therefore I think it clear that in using the expression "my son" she meant to designate her son John, and not any son she might have or might be living at her decease. Now, the husbands of her daughters, whom the testatrix knew as well as her son John, would naturally be objects of her bounty; and as she designates her son as an individual and not a class, I think the same construction ought to apply throughout the clause, that is, that all the husbands mentioned by the expression, "the husbands of my daughters," meant the individuals whom she knew as the then husbands. I am therefore of opinion that Mr. Darnborough, the petitioner, the only husband of those living at the death of the testatrix who survived Mary Dudley, the tenant for life, is entitled to the whole fund, to the exclusion of Mr. Strutt. I think, however, that this was a fair question, arising from the language of the testatrix; and therefore that both parties should have their costs.

Revivor—Administration Suit—Legatee.

A bill was filed by certain persons, as plaintiffs, for the administration of the personal estate of a testator, and the usual decree for accounts was taken, the Master's report was made, and a decree was made on further directions. The suit having been neglected, the Master committed the prosecution of the decree to a party who had been found by the report to be a legatee. The suit afterwards abated by the marriage of one of the female plaintiffs. The plaintiffs having declined to take any proceedings to revive, the legatee filed a bill of revivor. A demurrer to this bill by the plaintiffs in the original suit, was allowed.

NEW SERIES, XXI.—CHANC.

A bill was filed, by James and Elizabeth Forsyth and their children against W. Chard and E. Chard, the executors of J. C. Forsyth, deceased, for the administration of his estate. The usual decree for accounts and inquiries was made in this suit, the Master made his report, and there was a decree made on further directions.

The Master, by his report, had found that Elizabeth Williams was a legatee of the testator. The suit being neglected, the Master, under the 56th Order of the 3rd of April 1828 (1), gave the prosecution of the decree to E. Williams. After this, one of the female plaintiffs married, which caused an abatement of the suit. E. Williams, having applied to the plaintiffs to revive the suit, and they having declined to do so, filed a bill of revivor.

To this bill the plaintiffs in the original suit demurred. The demurrer now came on to be heard.

Mr. Cairns, for the demurrer.

Mr. Glasse, for the bill.

The following authorities were cited:—

Houlditch v. the Marquis of Donegall,

1 Sim. & S. 491; s. c. 2 Law J.

Rep. Chanc. 53.

Whitehead v. North, Cr. & Ph. 78.

PARKER, V.C. — This is a demurrer to a bill of revivor in a suit for the administration of a testator's estate. After the decree on further directions the suit abated by the marriage of a female plaintiff. E. Williams, the plaintiff in this bill of revivor, was a pecuniary legatee, and found so by the Master, so that she had a substantial interest in the suit. The prosecution of the suit having been neglected, the Master recommended the further prosecution to be committed to her. The abatement having occurred, E. Williams applied to the plaintiffs in the original suit to revive, and they having refused to do so, she filed the present bill of revivor in her own name. To this bill the plaintiffs in the original suit demurred. It has been admitted that there is no precedent for such a bill. On principle I think that this bill cannot be sustained. The object of the bill is beyond the office of a bill of revivor. Lord Redesdale, at p. 69. of his Treatise on Pleading, (4th edit.) says, "Wherever a suit abates by death, and the interest of the person whose death has caused the abatement is transmitted to that representative which the law gives or ascertains, as an heir-at-law, executor or administrator, so that the title cannot be disputed, at least in the Court of Chancery, but the person in whom the title is vested is alone to be ascertained, the suit may be continued by bill of revivor merely. If a suit abates by marriage of a female plaintiff, and no act is done to affect the rights of the party but the marriage, no title can be disputed; the person of the husband is the sole fact to be ascertained, and therefore the suit may be continued in this case likewise by bill of revivor merely." The present plaintiff fills no such character as is mentioned in this passage. The Master had committed to her the further prosecution of the decree, and this enabled her to prosecute it in the plaintiffs' name. She seeks, however, by this bill, to prosecute the suit in her own name, and this is an object beyond revivor. The Master's order is confined to proceedings in his own office, and the present plaintiff cannot revive the suit without the adjudication of the Court—Whitehead v. North.

I have been referred to a passage in Lord Redesdale's Treatise on Pleading, (p. 79,) where he says, "In the case of a bill by creditors on behalf of themselves and other creditors, any creditor is entitled to revive." The difference, however, is obvious between a creditor, on whose behalf the original suit was instituted, and the present plaintiff, who was in no sense a party to the original suit—Dixon v. Wyatt and Houl-ditch v. the Marquis of Donegall. I consider, that any order to revive made on this bill will be an abortive proceeding, and the demurrer must be allowed.

GORE v. HARRIS.

Solicitor and Client—Privileged Communications.

A party assigned his property for the benefit of his creditors, one of whom filed a bill to set aside the deed, and insisted that a particular clause inserted in it had been concealed from him. The assignor, in his answer, stated that the creditor had known of the insertion of the clause, and in support of his case proposed to examine the solicitor of the creditor, as to what took place on a certain interview between the solicitor and the assignor with reference to the deed. The solicitor demurred to the interrogatory on the ground that it inquired respecting matters which he only knew from confidential communications made to him by or in his agency for his client while he was acting as his solicitor. The demurrer was overruled.

Mr. Saunders, by deed, assigned all his property to trustees for the benefit of his creditors. A bill was filed by a creditor against Saunders and others to set aside this deed, one of the grounds being that Mr. Saunders had furnished the plaintiff with a copy of the deed which did not contain a clause, subsequently inserted, by which considerable benefits were given to a Mr. Harris. The defendant Saunders in his answer stated that this clause had been inserted with the knowledge of the plaintiff.

The case is reported on the question of parties in 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 74.

In support of his case the defendant Saunders proposed to examine a Mr. Goode, the plaintiff's solicitor, as to an interview which took place between him and Saunders with reference to the deed. Mr. Goode demurred on the ground that the interrogatory inquired respecting matters upon which he had only obtained information by means of confidential communications made to him by, or in the course of his agency for, his client during the period he was acting for him in this cause as his solicitor. This demurrer now came on to be argued.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. Moxon, in support of the demurrer, cited Greenough v. Gaskill (1).

Mr. Wigram and Mr. Shapter, for Mr. Goode, cited—

Desborough v. Rawlins, 3 Myl. & Cr. 515; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 171.

Spenceley v. Schulenburg, 7 East, 357.
Parkhurst v. Lowten, 2 Swanst. 194.

PARKER, V.C.—In this case the defendant Saunders proposed to examine Goode as a witness. Goode was a solicitor and concerned, in that character, for one of the plaintiffs. Goode demurred to the interrogatory on the ground that it related to matters about which he had only obtained information by means of confidential communications made to him by, or in the course of his agency for, his client, during the time he was acting for him in his capacity as a solicitor. One of the objects of the suit was to set aside a certain deed on the ground of fraud, it being alleged that a material clause contained in that deed had not been communicated to the plaintiff until a recent period. The defendant Saunders alleged that the existence of the clause was known to the plaintiffs much earlier, and that, at an interview between him and Mr. Goode, a copy of the deed containing the clause in question had been produced. By the interrogatory to which Goode demurred, Saunders proposed to examine him as to what took place at that interview. I cannot doubt that Goode was bound to answer the interrogatory. In the transaction in question the plaintiff had employed his solicitor as his agent to communicate with the opposite party. I cannot see how that communication can be regarded as either privileged or confidential, and I think that the solicitor must be examined as to what the communication really was. It is of every-day practice that communications of this nature pass between the solicitors for opposite parties, and orders are often made for the production of letters which pass between solicitors and parties on opposite sides. The demurrer must be overruled.

POTTER v. BAKER.

Will—Construction—Perpetual Annuity.

A testator, by his will, gave to E. L. "50l. per year for she and her children, and after her decease the money shall be paid to each of them as they attain the age of one and twenty; but if either of them die, to be paid to the survivor":—Held, affirming a decision of the Master of the Rolls, that the bequest was of a perpetual annuity.

The testator in this cause, William Hawkins, by his will, dated the 11th of April 1822, bequeathed as follows:—"I appoint Mr. Thomas Baker and Mr. Edward Wallis my executors, that as soon as possible after my decease that my freehold house known by 'The Red Lion,' in Parliament Street, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, to be let on lease at the option of my executors for the space of twenty-one years or thirty-one, which may be able in proportion to get the most money for. In the next place, I leave each of them my executors 10l.: and all the money arising from good-will, fixtures, plate, china, glass, and all other effects producing from my said freehold, and after all my just debts and funeral expenses are paid, then my executors shall put the money into the funds to the best advantage for those who I shall hereafter name. The first is my daughter Mary Ann Wiseheart, I give to her 50l., and to be paid to her half-yearly as long as she lives, and her receipt only shall be a discharge to my executors; and after her decease then that 50l. per year shall go one half to Elizabeth Luckhurst, and the other half to Mary Ann Ballard, who now resides with me here, who I shall name after. In the next place, my executors will give, as a token of respect to my late wife, to L. Bromley 10l. for mourning. In the next place I give to John Lemon my silver tortoiseshell snuff-box, but if he should die before me, I then give it to Henry Steeres. In the next place I give to Elizabeth Luckhurst of No. 10, Brook Street, Lambeth, 50l. per year for she and her children, and after her decease the money shall be paid to each of them as they attain the age of one and twenty, but if either of them die, to be paid to the survivor. In the next place I give all my remaining property to Mary Ann Ballard, whatever it might produce, either from the rent of the house, or money in the funds, and she shall remain in the house till it is let if she thinks proper, and after one year I wish the house to be sold to the best bidder, and the money to be put in the funds, and Mary Ann Ballard to receive the produce of it, and the money to be divided, after her decease, amongst her four children or any more she may have in my lifetime, share and share alike as they come to the age of twenty-one."

The suit was instituted for the administration of the testator's estate, and by a decree of Lord Brougham, dated in 1831, the legacies were declared to be well charged on the freehold estates of the testator. The three children of the legatee, Elizabeth Luckhurst, assigned their several interests to Mr. Scarth, and Elizabeth Luckhurst having died, the three children and their assignee presented a petition in the cause, praying that it might be declared that the annuity of 50*l.* was a perpetual annuity, and (as the produce of the freehold estates had been paid into court) that the sum of 1,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* consols might be raised thereout, and be transferred to Mr. Scarth. Lord Langdale made the order as prayed. The persons representing Mary Ann Ballard and her children, the residuary legatees, appealed.

and therefore proceed at once to declare that I am clearly of opinion that the Master of the Rolls was right. Although an obscurely worded will, the production of an illiterate person, is always in the predicament that it may strike different minds in different ways, yet I think when this will is investigated, the construction which ought to be put upon it is tolerably free from doubt.

The general rule no doubt is, that where an annuity is given to a person by name, and there is nothing more, that is only an annuity for the life of the donee. But, then, this must be coupled with the observation that being a general rule it must yield to the force of particular expressions, if any, to be found in the will. Are there then any such particular expressions to be found in this will? On looking into the nature of the property, and the manner in which the testator deals with it, I think there are. I agree that it is doubtful with respect to the public-house being let on lease whether "the most money" mentioned by the testator is intended to apply to premium or rent. I think, however, it means the former:—that the house was to be let in this manner for as large a premium as could be obtained, and then sold, and the property to be put in the funds. Then comes an annuity to Mary Ann Wiseheart. It is to be observed there is no provision made for her children, and after her decease that annuity, or an annuity of similar amount, is given, one moiety to Elizabeth Luckhurst, and the other moiety to Mary Ann Ballard. These two women were probably both cohabiting with the testator; at any rate they both had children, and the testator afterwards proceeds to make provision for those children. I say nothing, because no question is now raised, as to what Elizabeth Luckhurst and Mary Ann Ballard take under this bequest. I only observe that the language of this gift is very different from that afterwards employed in making provision for their families.

The testator, after certain pecuniary legacies, then proceeds as follows:—"I give to Elizabeth Luckhurst 50*l.* for she and her three children, and after her decease the money shall be paid to each of them as they attain the age of one and twenty, but if either of them die to be paid to the survivor." The question is, what does the testator here mean by "money"? Does he mean the capital representing the annuity, or an annuity only? In my opinion he clearly means the corpus from which the annuity in question would be derived. I base this opinion on two grounds: first, because I think that by the word "money" an ignorant person in the testator's situation clearly means something different from the provision which he had before made. "If either of them die" must mean die before that period at which he is to receive it, that is, before twenty-one. This, therefore, is a gift to the mother for her life, with remainder to the children absolutely, payable on their attaining twenty-one. The second circumstance on which I rely is from the terms of the residuary gift to Mary Ann Ballard, "I give my remaining property to Mary Ann Ballard whatever it might produce, either from the rent of the house, or money in the funds," and so on, and the house to be sold, "and the money to be put in the funds, and Mary Ann Ballard to receive the produce of it, and the money to be divided after her decease amongst her four children, and any more she may have." It is suggested that this means that Mary Ann Ballard is to take, after the decease of Elizabeth Luckhurst and her children, the annual produce of the property which is given to Elizabeth Luckhurst and her children, at any rate during their lives. I admit the words are large enough legally to bear this signification, but I do not think the testator used them in such a sense; for the subject of this residuary bequest is to be put in the funds, and Mary Ann Ballard is to have the produce during her life, and then at her decease the "money" is to be divided among her children. What "money" is this? Not the money, the annual interest of which Elizabeth Luckhurst and her children were to enjoy, because that was to be enjoyed by them, at all events, for their lives; and, therefore, that fund would not be divisible at the time appointed for the division in the residuary bequest, viz., the decease of Mary Ann Ballard. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the Master of the Rolls was right.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The impression upon my mind at the opening was different from that which I afterwards felt. The will is open to some unanswerable observations inconsistent with the notion that the children of Elizabeth Luckhurst take only for life. In my own opinion the clauses of this will cannot, for the purposes of construction, usefully be read in the strict order in which they occur. We must look at the entire system of the will, and so viewing it I am satisfied that by the gift of "the money" to the three children the testator intended a gift of the whole fund producing 50*l.* per annum, which in this case I suppose has been rightly estimated at the sum of 1,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* 3*l.* per cents. As the appellants are the residuary legatees, let the costs come out of the estate; but so far as they have been increased, if at all, by Mr. Scarth being a party to the appeal, or of having taken the assignment, we make no order.

LORDS JUSTICES.

REYNELL v. SPRYE.

Production of Documents, Motion for.

The defendant, by his answer, denied the possession of certain documents. The answer was admitted to be sufficient. The plaintiff alleging by affidavit that the denial of possession was untrue, and that the particular documents were wilfully suppressed, moved for their production:—Held, that assuming fraud, falsehood and misrepresentation to be proved, the plaintiff was not entitled to move for production, but must file a bill.

This was a motion made in two suits for the production of documents. The first suit was that of Reynell v. Sprye, for the purpose of setting aside a sale on the ground of fraud and concealment which was decreed by the late Vice Chancellor Wigram. The other suit was of Sprye v. Reynell (1) for specific performance of the agreement. The answer of the defendant in the second suit was sufficient, and that answer denied the possession of certain documents mentioned in the bill; it however admitted the possession of documents enumerated in the schedule. The defendant in the first suit appealed; and he now moved for the production of documents which he alleged were in the possession of the defendant (Reynell) in the second suit (2). Other matters were included in the notice of motion.

The Solicitor General, Mr. Bethell and Mr. Terrell, for the motion.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly and Mr. Shapter appeared to oppose, but were not called on.

Many affidavits were filed, those in support of the motion alleging as facts matters which were one and all positively denied by the affidavits filed in opposition. As soon as the motion had been heard,

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said—This is a motion by the defendant Mr. Sprye,—first, for the production of certain documents; secondly, which amounts to the same thing, that the hearing of the appeal may be postponed until the documents in question shall be produced, and thirdly, that the defendant shall be at liberty to file such supplemental bill or to take such other proceedings as he may be advised. The grounds upon which this motion is made are a case of fraud, and wilful suppression of certain documents, and misrepresentation to the Court itself on the part of a general officer and Commander of the Bath, a solicitor of long standing and of eminent respectability, and a barrister, of whom the least that can be said would amount to the same thing. A case of conspiracy in fact between these three persons. I mention the description of persons against whom these things are alleged, not as intimating that previous character can for an instant be put in evidence against established facts. All the allegations are in fact denied in gross and in detail. That is admitted by counsel for the motion. Into the evidence for and against them, the affidavits that is, we do not think it necessary to enter; for, assuming for the purposes of argument every one of the allegations to be true, can we accede to this application, which is a mere motion for the production of documents, the possession of which is denied by the defendant in the cross-suit in his answer, which answer cannot be now impeached for insufficiency or anything of that sort? Supposing, for the sake of argument, that the defendant to the cross-bill had in his answer untruly sworn that he had not, and had never seen, documents which at the very time he so swore, were in the possession of himself or his solicitor:—which he was well acquainted with:—which he had shewn to his counsel and had by his advice suppressed:—and upon the supposed ignorance of which, on the part of the plaintiff, the judgment of the Court below was based—(and I do not know that I can put a case higher than that)—all that may form very proper matter for some criminal proceeding; for an indictment for perjury, or a motion for removing the name of the solicitor from off the rolls, or for a new bill; but how can we, on motion, assuming for a moment (but of course I need hardly say merely for the sake of argument) everything stated in support of the motion to be true,—how can we, I say, order the production of documents, the possession of which the defendant to the cross-bill has by his answer to that bill denied? The plaintiff in the cross-suit is entitled to a full and complete answer to every interrogatory in his bill; when that is satisfactory, you are entitled to the production of all documents which the defendant admits in the usual way, but he cannot go beyond this. The motion must be refused.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH entirely concurred in the opinion that the motion must be refused, and with costs.

An order was ultimately made by consent and arrangement as to production, inspection and deposit in the office of certain specified papers, and for the postponement of the appeal, and for leave to file a bill.

(2) The motion raised a charge of fraud and concealment against the solicitors of Sir Thomas Reynell and of wilful misrepresentation against his counsel at the hearing before Sir James Wigram. The point, however, decided on this motion is sufficiently stated.

PARKER, V.C. }
Dec. 3. } MATHER v. NORTON.

Will—Construction—Power of Sale—Charge of Debts.

A testator, by his will, appointed A, B, and C. to be his executors, in trust to dispose of his property in the following way: He then directed that all his debts should be discharged by his executors, and that the residue of his property, real and personal, should be disposed of by them at the time therein mentioned, save and except his estate at M, which he gave to A. for life, and at A's death to be disposed of as aforesaid:—Held, that A, B, and C. had a power of sale of the estate at M: and that it was not necessary for them to shew that there were any of the testator's debts left unpaid.

Thomas Rylance made his will, dated the 29th of January 1827, in the following terms:—

"In the name of God, Amen. I, Thomas Rylance, do declare this to be my last will and testament, and dispose of my property in the manner following, viz.—First, I appoint Francis Mather, of Bury, and William Bowker, of Hyde Hall, Denton, to be my executors, and my wife, Mary Rylance, my executrix, in trust to dispose of my property in the following manner, viz., I direct that all my just debts and funeral expenses be discharged by my executors and executrix, and the residue of my property, both real and personal, to be held by my executors and executrix for the sole benefit and use of maintaining and educating my children until my youngest child arrives at the age of twenty-one years. At such time it shall arrive at the age aforesaid, then all my property, both real and personal, whatsoever and where-soever, to be disposed of by my executors and executrix and divided amongst my children, equal share and share alike. If in case any of my children die leaving issue, then to take their father's or mother's share as if they were then living, save and except my estate in Mellor, in the county of Derby, which said estate I give to my wife, Mary Rylance, to hold and enjoy during her natural life, and, at her decease, to be sold and disposed of by my executors, and divided amongst my children or their issues as aforesaid."

The testator died in October 1838. Mr. Bowker, one of the trustees, died soon after the death of the testator. Mrs. Rylance, the widow, married Mr. Shepherd. Mr. and Mrs. Shepherd and Mr. Mather entered into an agreement with Mr. Norton to sell him the estate at Mellor, mentioned in the will. Mr. Norton having declined to complete the purchase, a claim was filed against him for a specific performance of the agreement. The only question in the case was, whether Mr. and Mrs. Shepherd and Mr. Mather had, under the will, a power of sale.

Mr. Malins and Mr. H. Humphreys, for the plaintiffs, contended that all the real estate had been devised to Mr. Mather and Mrs. Shepherd in fee, and that the real estate had been charged with the payment of debts. The executors and devisees in trust then had a complete power of sale, and the circumstance that the estate in question had been made the subject of a subsequent disposition was immaterial—Shaw v. Borrer (1).

Mr. Bird and Mr. Berkeley, for the defendant, contended that the fee of the estate in question had not vested in the executors, and that the words "save and except," in the latter part of the will, must be read as qualifying the more general expressions in the earlier part—Doe v. Hughes (2). At any rate, it had not been proved in this case that there were debts of the testator unpaid. Satisfactory proof that there were debts unpaid ought to be afforded to the defendant—Gosling v. Carter (3).

Mr. Malins, in reply, contended that it was not necessary to give any proof that there were any debts unpaid.

PARKER, V.C. said that, although there was no direct devise to the trustees, there was a good present devise to them by implication. This devise included the real estate, and the whole real estate. He thought also that there was a charge of debts on the whole real estate. With a devise, then, to the trustees of the whole real estate, and a charge of debts on the whole real estate, the trustees had the power to dispose of it for the payment of the debts. He thought that there was no doubt that the clause "save and except my estate in Mellor," &c. ought to be taken as qualifying "the residue of my property, both real and personal," after the payment of the debts, and not as affecting the devise to the trustees in the earlier part of the will. There must then be a decree for specific performance.

Mr. Malins asked for the costs.

Mr. Bird contended that there was sufficient doubt in the case to induce the Court not to give costs.

PARKER, V.C. said that he had so little doubt as to the construction of the will, that if pressed he must give the plaintiffs their costs.

This was a special case under Sir George Turner's Act, which had been ordered to be set down for hearing. After this order, a tenant in tail of an estate in question in the case was born. This was an application for the purpose of having the case amended and restored to its place in the paper.

A testator appointed three persons to be the trustees and executors of his will. All these persons renounced the probate and disclaimed the trusts of the will.

This was a petition for the appointment of new trustees.

By the 32nd section of the Trustee Act, 1850, (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60) it is enacted that "whenever it shall be expedient to appoint a new trustee or new trustees, and it shall be found inexpedient, difficult, or impracticable so to do without the assistance of the Court of Chancery, it shall be lawful for the said Court of Chancery to make an order appointing a new trustee or new trustees either in substitution for, or in addition to, any existing trustee or trustees."

Mr. C. Hall read the above-mentioned section, and raised the question whether the act applied to the case before the Court. All the trustees had disclaimed, and there never had, therefore, been any existing trustee or trustees.

PARKER, V.C. said, that he thought it would be a narrow construction of the act to say that trustees could not be appointed in the place of these disclaiming trustees. He thought that the order should be to appoint the new trustees in substitution for the trustees who disclaimed.

HODGSON V. EARL OF POWIS.

Railway Company—Injunction.

A company was authorized by three acts of parliament to make three distinct railways, (not forming one line) with separate amount of capital for each. Another railway company was, by a fourth act of parliament, authorized to take a lease of the three lines, and did so; and the whole undertaking was placed under the controul of a joint committee of directors of all the companies. One of the three lines was sufficiently completed to be, and was, opened, and the directors made calls for the purpose of entirely finishing the opened line, the other two being abandoned. An injunction was granted at the Rolls, restraining the application of money and the making of calls for any purposes not authorized by the three acts, excepting only for the purposes of ordinary repair:—Held, on appeal, that on an interlocutory application, in the absence of the lessee company, the opened line being worked under the direction of the joint committee, the injunction must be dissolved.

This was an appeal motion from an order for an injunction made by the late Master of the Rolls, Lord Langdale. A full detail of the facts of the case and the judgment of Lord Langdale are reported in 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 356, 418. In order to render the grounds of the judgment on the appeal apparent, it will only be necessary now to state that the Shropshire Union Railways and Canal Company (that being one company,) was empowered to make three distinct railways, the first from Shrewsbury to Stafford, the second from Newtown to Crewe, and the third from Calverley to Wolverhampton. In the following session of parliament a fourth act was passed, by which the Shropshire Union Railways and Canal Company was empowered and required to grant, and the London and North-Western Railway Company to accept a lease of those railways, when completed, on certain specified terms; and it was directed that the whole should be placed under a committee of management, composed of directors of each of the companies. By the first act 800,000*l.* was to be raised, by the second 1,500,000*l.*, and by the third 1,000,000*l.* Shares were issued to raise the sums in 165,000 shares of 20*l.* each, and calls were made. An action was brought against Mr. Hodgson, in July 1850, for a third call. Mr. Hodgson filed his bill on behalf of himself and the other 20*l.* shareholders, against the company, which, after alleging that the only part of the three lines which had been constructed was a portion of the Shrewsbury and Stafford line, which had been opened, but that the other two lines were to be abandoned, the directors determining to apply to parliament for authority for so doing; and after insisting that the directors had no power to construct the Shrewsbury and Stafford line only, prayed a declaration that it was not in the power of the directors to apply the monies raised under the several acts, or any of them, for this exclusive purpose, and for an injunction to restrain it, and to prevent the enforcing calls except for the purpose of all the acts. Lord Langdale held that the company had no right to apply the funds in making one only of the three railways, but there being no allegation in the bill that the directors intended to apply the funds exclusively to the formation of one only of the three lines, a demurrer to the bill was allowed on that ground. The Court gave leave to the plaintiff to amend. The bill was accordingly amended, and the affidavits having been re-sworn, with some few variations, the injunction was moved for and granted, not extending to the restraint upon making calls, and permitting the application of the money for ordinary repairs. From this order the appeal was made.

From the evidence, which was very long and very conflicting, it appeared that the line opened was worked by the London and North-Western Railway Company, under the direction of the joint committee; that the plaintiff knew of the intended abandonment of the two lines upwards of a year before the filing of the bill, and that there was no intention or wish to stop the working of the completed line. The London and North-Western Railway Company (the lessees) were not represented on the motion. The arguments on the appeal were, in most respects, a repetition of those used in the court below.

Mr. Rolt, Mr. Willcock, and Mr. Speed, for the appellants, argued that the effect of the injunction was to prevent the defendants from doing anything whatsoever, even from doing what they were not only enabled, but were bound to do under the terms of the Leasing Act. The company were authorized to make three lines, and they had made one, which they wished to complete; the reason for abandoning the other two was, that they would not be profitable. If the money were paid as they wished, the one line would be rendered profitable, while, if the injunction were continued, all the money already expended would be thrown away.

Mr. Roundell Palmer contended that the company had no right to apply any part of the capital authorized to be raised for either of the two lines now abandoned in the completion and extension of that which was opened. Each capital was applicable to the formation of each line, and each line only. The principle governing such a case was fully laid down in the case of Cohen v. Wilkinson (1); it was held that a company could not apply an entire fund for the completion only of a part of an undertaking.

Mr. Speed, in reply.—This company ought not to be restrained from making and completing the Shrewsbury and Stafford line, they not being able, with any prospect of profit, to form the other two. The case of Cohen v. Wilkinson is obviously distinguishable from this, and its principle does not apply. To abandon one part of a long and continuous line is very different from making one line of three. At any rate, the London and North-Western Railway Company ought to have been represented on this motion, they having a very material interest in the question, and they being, as lessees, actually working the line from Shrewsbury to Stafford, under the direction of the joint committee. The evidence, also, is clear to shew that the plaintiff must have known long before the filing of the bill of the intended abandonment of the two other lines, and, therefore, he must be taken to have acquiesced in what has been determined on.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—As to this injunction, we have arrived at the same conclusion, whether precisely by the same course of reasoning is not very important to inquire. However, I wish the observations I am about to make to be taken as coming from me alone. I view this injunction as preventing in effect the defendants from applying a single shilling of the corporate money unless for the purpose of paying debts or liabilities which were in existence at the date of the notice of motion at the Rolls, and unless for the current expenses of the railway or canals; which, of course, prevents them from laying out a single shilling in improving the railway or adding to the works or conveniences connected with it, as I understand the order. But to what state of things do these observations apply? They apply to a case where, in the first place, a railway company which is importantly interested in the order sought is absent; a company which has, under a lease, possession of, and the working of the railway; which has the very management of the concern under the superintendence of a joint committee composed of members of this railway company and the absent company. But this is not all. One line of the system of railways in question, namely, that from Stafford to Shrewsbury being in actual operation, the continuance of such operation is not attempted to be stopped. The plaintiff accedes to the proposition, that in the actual state of things, this line must proceed and must go on. Indeed no other proposition can be accepted as reasonable, otherwise a very large amount of property would be doomed to destruction. In such a case, where the plaintiff makes such admissions, and where absent parties are importantly interested, he desires an injunction to prevent the application of a single shilling in additional buildings and improvements to make the outlay which has been already incurred profitable to himself and his partners.

It may be that these remarks are sufficient to dispose of the case, but this is not all. It has been assumed that this case is equivalent to that of Cohen v. Wilkinson, since here several acts of parliament are made and formed into one act, having reference to the same subject matter, with one capital stock, although to be carried into execution by the construction of various lines of railroad; and it has been assumed that because some part of the undertaking has been abandoned and some part retained, therefore a separate and distinct line cannot be made. But it is made and in operation, and if it were not, I am not persuaded that the principle of Cohen v. Wilkinson applies here. But more, —as a Judge, I am bound from the facts before the Court, to make the unavoidable inference that for more than twelve months before the bill was filed, the plaintiff must have known that the abandoned lines would be abandoned, and that there was no substantial chance of making either of them within the time fixed by parliament, and yet there was no bill filed until the month of November 1849. As a matter of fact, I believe that for more than twelve months, Mr. Hodgson knew that these lines could not and would not be proceeded with, and that there was no intention existing anywhere to attempt to proceed with them or either of them. Besides all this, I observe that this is an interlocutory application for an injunction, as to which the Court has always exercised a discretion, balancing and considering whether greater mischief would follow the granting or refusing of the injunction. The plaintiff comes here with a doubtful equity, and I am disposed to think that if his equity were clear, greater mischief would be done by granting than by refusing this injunction, and this even to his own property. I find that there has been here an acquiescence of a more than ordinary amount and of a very plain description. My Lord Cranworth agrees with me:—we have arrived at the same conclusion, although, perhaps, not exactly by the same process. We therefore dissolve the injunction. But it is said, that this will leave the defendants at liberty to make the Stone and Shallowford branch line. Perhaps this may be so. I am not sure that what is true of one line is not true of the two branches. But these two branches are not yet begun. If they shall be begun, and the plaintiff shall think himself entitled to complain, he may come here and complain and he shall be heard. We do not wish to prejudice any question that may arise, but at present it is extremely doubtful whether these two branch lines will be touched. The order we shall make is to discharge the order and dissolve the injunction, without prejudice to any future application, and without prejudice to any question. Reserve the costs of this motion and of the motion before the Rolls.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I entirely concur in the order which has just been pronounced. I have come to the same conclusion as Lord Justice Knight Bruce, and perhaps by nearly the same reasoning. I confess I had some difficulty in seeing any distinction between the effect of three acts of parliament authorizing three lines forming a cluster as it were, and one act authorizing one line. The principle appears to be exactly the same. But although when parliament has authorized one line or one cluster of lines, the parties must execute the whole, and, therefore, are acting in violation of the act unless they execute the whole, yet this Court has always exercised some discretion in matters of injunction,—especially when an injunction is sought, as in the present case, on an interlocutory application; and I confess that when one line only has been authorized to be made, I should feel less unwilling to exercise that discretion than when several lines are authorized to be made, because when one line of several is completed, this, though not all which is authorized by the act, is yet a substantial whole in itself, and this is not the case when a part only of a single line is in operation. For the exercise of this discretion of interposition by injunction there is plenty of authority; and I confess that if there were neither precedent nor authority, I should not be in any degree reluctant to make one. In this case, the facts are clear. Putting aside the consideration of the two branches to Stone and Shallowford, proposed to be added to the present line, one line is completed, but considerable additional expense may be usefully incurred in rendering the outlay already made, profitable. Now the effect of this injunction is, that not a single shilling can be expended in this manner. Early in the argument, I was struck with a passage in the order appealed from, in which Lord Langdale qualified his injunction by the explanation that he did not mean to include ordinary repairs. Now the necessity for introducing this qualification led me to doubt whether the injunction could be right in its integrity. Other like modifications suggested themselves to my mind, so as to leave some matters which clearly ought to be left in the discretion of the committee of management (if they were to have any management at all) untouched by the injunction, and I found that I must extend the qualifications to such an extent as to work a complete modification of the injunction. I was, therefore, convinced that an injunction was not the right course, for in fact the Court cannot anticipate everything which would be required. The necessity for any qualification at all satisfies me that this is not a proper case for an injunction at all. With respect to the argument of acquiescence, I fully coincide with what has been said by the Lord Justice Knight Bruce, so that I need say nothing more on that head. So much has been done, and so much more remains to be done in order to render the expenditure which has been already incurred useful or profitable, that it would be unwise to fetter the discretion of the directors by continuing this injunction, and, therefore, it must be dissolved in the terms which my Lord Justice Knight Bruce has already mentioned.

Costs, Taxation of—Attornies and Solicitors Act—Authority of the Taxing Masters—Costs of Appeal—Statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 83.

In the taxation of costs the taxing Master has authority under the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, to disallow the charges for an action which he in his discretion considers to have been improperly brought.

The statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 83, constituting the Court of Appeal, not pointing out what is to be done as to costs, where, in consequence of the Judges differing in opinion, the decision of the Court below is affirmed, such costs follow the result of the appeal.

This was an appeal from a decision of the late Master of the Rolls (Lord Langdale) made on a petition presented under the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. In the taxation of a bill of costs the taxing Master, Mr. Martineau, disallowed all the charges relating to an action of replevin, and he also disallowed the discharge of the solicitor (by payments alleged to have been made by him of debts due from his client) of the sum of 243*l.* 10*s.* admitted to have been received by him belonging to his client. The taxing Master did not consider that there was sufficient evidence of retainer as to the action, or of authority as to the application of the 243*l.* 10*s.* The Master of the Rolls confirmed the decision of the taxing Master. The evidence was exceedingly long and very conflicting. During the argument Lord Justice Knight Bruce put questions to Mr. Follett, the taxing Master, in answer to which that gentleman said, if the bill had been before him he should have followed the same course as Mr. Martineau, supposing he was of the same opinion as to the question of retainer, the impropriety of the action, and the want of authority.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Miller were for the appellant.

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. Southgate, for the respondent.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—My learned Brother has authorized me, in the event which has happened, of my mind being satisfied at the conclusion of the argument against the appeal, to declare at once my opinion upon it, whatever his Lordship's view may be. Accordingly, acting upon this permission, I do so. I repeat what I have already stated, that my mind has not a particle of doubt on the subject of this appeal. It is an appeal on the subject of a taxation of a bill of costs upon a long-considered decision of a taxing Master, confirmed in all points by a most careful and attentive Judge. The taxing Master, from whose decision this question was taken before the Master of the Rolls, was in his day a solicitor of the first respectability and of most extensive practice. Upon such a concurrence of opinion on such a question, a court of appeal, constituted like the present, ought to be very clear before reversing the decision which has been arrived at below. But whatever the weight of the decision appealed from, if the court of appeal be clear on the point, it is bound not to retire from the expression of its opinion, but to give judgment in accordance with its own views. Now, in the first place, the subject of the present dispute is the costs of an action of replevin claimed against a gentleman as administrator of his late wife and of her sister or one of them. Neither wife nor sister was party to the action, and prima facie, therefore, neither of them is or ever was, liable. But then it is argued, the two ladies, or one of them, authorized or directed this action to be brought, or became liable for the costs of the action; and upon this argument evidence has been gone into on either side of a very voluminous and not very consistent nature. The evidence produced is very far from satisfying my mind that either sister authorized or sanctioned the action, or contracted or became liable to pay the costs of it. It is, in fact, I say, to my mind, very improbable that either sister ever did so; but assuming, for the sake of argument, that either sister had done so, I am of opinion that it is incumbent on the solicitor employed to shew that he gave the ladies proper advice and proper notions on such a subject, and that he had not allowed them blindly to give instructions on such a subject which he was bound to understand, and which they must be taken to have known nothing about. There is no evidence or suggestion that he ever did so. I agree that, notwithstanding the impropriety of bringing any action the client may be liable for the cost of it if he insufficiently or falsely inform his attorney on a matter of fact, or if being informed by his attorney of the utter madness and hopelessness of bringing such an action, he should require the attorney to proceed with the action whether he considered it wise or unwise. In such a case I agree that the client is bound. Here, however, we have no such case. Every circumstance was known at the least as well to the attorney as to the client, and probably much better; and if the client had directed the attorney to proceed in such an action, it was the duty of the latter to have told him that the action was most absurd, that it was impossible to succeed. This is the language he ought to have held. There is not the smallest evidence to shew that he ever did hold such language or anything like it.

It is said that the attorney in bringing this action acted on the advice of counsel, and that an attorney is justified in acting on that advice, nay, is bound to act on it. On the general proposition we desire to say nothing. In this case it is sufficient to remark, that the only opinion of counsel which we have before us is against the action, as indeed must have been that of any person in the smallest degree conversant with the subject. There is nothing the other way, except the recollection of the solicitor conducting this case, that the opinion of two gentlemen of the equity bar had been taken in favour of the propriety of the action of replevin. However out of the usual course it may appear to have taken the opinion of gentlemen at the equity bar, on a point of pleading at common law, still, as I admit that every gentleman at that bar ought to have some, and that not a slight acquaintance with the principles and practice of special pleading, I might have allowed some weight to the circumstance if that opinion had been actually given and honestly acted on. But there is no evidence that such an opinion ever was given; there is not the smallest trace of its existence; there is no entry relating to it in the bill of costs, the subject of this appeal; no charge for it nor any attendance relating to it; and I think, therefore, that the recollection of this gentleman must have misled him, and that, at the most, it can only have been one of those opinions for which no payment is ever made, and which are proverbially known to be worth exactly what is given for them. Under every view of the case, I am of opinion that no charge as to the costs of this action of replevin can be maintained as against either of the ladies, nor contingently against the administrator as their representative.

The only other portion is as to a sum of 243*l.* 10*s.* belonging to these ladies or one of them, which found its way from the hands of the trustees into the hands of the solicitors, and from which they seek to discharge themselves by alleging that they disposed of it in payment of various sums of money claimed as due from the ladies. It is, under the circumstances, an unavoidable inference that the solicitors when they received this money from the hands of the trustees, had notice whose this money was, and therefore they became themselves in effect trustees of the money for those to whom they knew the money belonged, and directly indebted, that is equitably indebted, and chargeable in account with it upon the commonest principles of equity. No man has a right to pay my debt with my money without my consent, and if he do so, he is nevertheless answerable to me. It would, therefore, be impossible for me to concur in sending this case to law in the hope of there eliciting further evidence on the point of retainer, for my judgment does not go on the ground of non-retainer merely; and I think besides, it is extremely improbable that any adducible evidence has been omitted in this case, which, after having been upwards of three years before the Master, has now been twice examined in superior courts. I think the order appealed from wholly right, and, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed. If my learned Brother should not coincide in opinion that the petition should be dismissed with costs, I do not at present know how we have authority to deal with the question of the costs of the appeal. That point, therefore, in that event had better stand over for a few days, that we may have the opportunity of considering it.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—The statute which places us here says, that if there be a difference of opinion between the Judges the result of that difference shall be that the judgment appealed from shall be affirmed (1). It is, therefore,

(1) The statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 83, 'An Act to improve the administration of justice in the Court of Chancery, and in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.' The 9th section enacts, "That the decision of the majority of the Judges of the court of unnecessary for me to enter at large into the opinion I should have given, since, in whatever respect that opinion might have differed from the lucid statement we have just heard, it could not alter the judgment. I quite accede to the expediency of the delay proposed by my learned Brother for considering how the costs of this appeal are to be dealt with. I quite agree with all that my learned Brother has said, yet there is some small difference in the results we have arrived at. If I were sitting here as a jurymen I should be bound to acquiesce in that opinion entirely on both points, namely, that no authority was given either to bring the action of replevin, independently of all considerations as to the propriety of the action, or to apply the 243*l.* 10*s.* in the manner described. If I were sitting here as a jurymen, I say, I admit that I should be bound to negative that authority, but sitting here as a Judge I am bound to say that I am not convinced that the effect of further investigation might not be to alter my opinion, and at least to establish the liability of these ladies to discharge the costs of the action of replevin. The proposition to be made out, in this view of the case, by the appellant is, his legal right to assert his claim to these costs by action. Now the statute under which the taxation takes place (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73.) only intended to provide a more convenient way of ascertaining the amount of the bill for which the action was to be brought. The legislature never intended to delegate to an officer of the court the question whether the attorney should ever have a right or not to bring an action at all, which would be the case if the taxing Master could disallow whole bills as he seems to have done here. Sitting here, therefore, not as a jurymen, but as a Judge, I should have said if there is doubt as to part of the bill, bring an action as to that part. But it is said, that this action is altogether so preposterous that it was the duty of an attorney not to be concerned in carrying it on, and that, therefore, if he be concerned appeal shall be taken and deemed to be the decision of the said Court, and if the Judges of the court be equally divided in opinion on any cause or matter brought before the Court by way of appeal, the decree or order appealed from shall be taken and deemed to be affirmed by the court of appeal."

he cannot claim to be paid for doing so. But in spite of the weight due to the officer whose opinion we have heard in court this day, I very much doubt whether, when in taxing a bill of costs the client denies having authorized the action, the taxing Master can turn round and say that the attorney ought to have examined into the probable chances of success. If, indeed, this were within the province of the taxing Master, I quite agree that this is the most absurd action that could ever have been brought. So with regard to the discharge set up as to the sum of 243*l.* 10*s.* As a jurymen I admit that no sufficient evidence of authority for the alleged application of the money has been produced, but, as a Judge, I should feel disposed to try the effect of further investigation, and should, therefore, had I been sitting alone, have sent it to law. However, it is of little use to state what I might have felt myself bound as a Judge to do, had I been sitting alone. In consequence of the difference of opinion between Lord Justice Knight Bruce and myself the present appeal must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Cannot some arrangement be come to about the costs? If not, we must decide that point. The act of parliament says, that where the Judges of appeal differ in opinion the decision of the Court below shall be affirmed. If this depended on myself, had I been sitting alone, I should most certainly have dismissed the appeal, with costs. Counsel can now speak on the question of costs.

Mr. Roll.—During the argument one of your Lordships threw out a suggestion that possibly an action at law might elicit further evidence on these disputed points, and an action the appellant is desirous of trying, and Lord Cranworth has already stated his opinion that were he sitting alone he should have directed an action to be tried. No action suggested itself to Lord Langdale; and therefore as the only ground for the appellant not having the benefit of the action arises from the affirmance of the Court below, by reason of the difference of opinion between your Lordships, it would only be just to dismiss the appeal, without costs.

Mr. Southgate.—This is a second unsuccessful appeal, first from the order of the taxing Master, and, secondly, from the decision of the Master of the Rolls affirming that order. Neither before the taxing Master nor the Master of the Rolls was any suggestion made of an action, or that any further evidence could be produced. This second appeal has been unsuccessful, and the costs ought, as they would at common law, to follow the event. Even supposing this were a case at common law in error in the Exchequer Chamber, and the Judges were equally divided in opinion, the appeal would fail, and the costs would be given against the appellant.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—At common law the costs follow the event; but the analogy to a court of error is not correct; for there, when the Judges are equally divided in opinion there is no judgment, and therefore of course there can be no costs. That analogy, therefore, fails the respondent. In this court, however, constituted as it is under the statute giving us jurisdiction, it is expressly enacted that a difference of opinion affirms the judgment below. But the statute is silent as to costs. Even the general analogy of the respondent's counsel to the practice at common law cannot safely be drawn, for there the rule of costs following the event is universal, while here, in equity, the rule admits of many exceptions. I again say I feel every inclination with my learned Brother to give the successful party the costs of the appeal, but I doubt our authority. We must take a day or two to consider.

Nov. 17.—LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—The appeal in this case having been dismissed in consequence of a difference in opinion between the Lord Chief Justice and myself, it will be dismissed with costs on two grounds: first, because the difference felt by myself from Lord Langdale's decision is, not because I think that decision wrong, but because I think that decision was perhaps premature, for if the question had been sent to law further information might have been obtained, which perhaps might, or perhaps might not, have induced a different decision; and secondly, because, if deciding this appeal on the materials before Lord Langdale, had I been sitting alone, I have no doubt whatever I should have decided in the same manner as Lord Langdale. The appeal is dismissed, and the costs follow the result.

Nov. 22.—The case was by leave again mentioned on a supposed further discovery of authority to the solicitor by the client, but the order was not varied. The supposed new matter was discovered soon after the judgment was delivered, and the Court thereupon gave the leave. The order was directed to be drawn up as of this day.

Chanc. 420.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case the Vice Chancellor of England decided that the plaintiff Emma Yates, under the will of the testator, was entitled to a perpetual annuity of 100l. The defendants appeal from that decision, contending that Emma Yates is only entitled to this annuity during her minority, or at the furthest, during her life. I am of opinion that she is entitled for life only.

In Blewitt v. Roberts, Lord Cottenham says, "There is a marked distinction between the gift of the produce of a fund without limit as to time, and a simple gift of an annuity." "To hold that a simple gift of an annuity to A. does not give an annuity beyond the life of A. is not inconsistent with holding that a gift of the produce of a fund, without limit as to time, gives the fund itself. If a testator were minded to give 10,000l., can it be supposed that he would set about effecting this object by giving 500l. per annum to the intended legatee, without making any mention of the 10,000l.?" In Robinson v. Hunt (1), the testator gave an annuity of 100l. to his brother, and after his decease he gave the same annuity to his sister-in-law and his nephew, to be equally divided between them, and to the survivor of them; and he directed that if his nephew should have any children, the said annuity should be equally divided between them, but if his nephew should die without issue, then the annuity should go to the testator's cousin and his heirs for ever. And it was held that the children of the nephew took absolute interests in a perpetual annuity. In Stokes v. Heron (2), the annuities given by the will were held to be perpetual annuities. In that case the whole fund was devoted to the payment of certain annuities. In the present case, the testator merely gives an annuity of a certain amount. In Hedges v. Harpur

it was held that the children of the testator's daughters took only a life interest in their annuities. So, in Innes v. Mitchell (3) it was held that the annuities were for life only. All the decisions seem to me to be in accordance.

But it was stated that the fund which would produce the annuity, would be equivalent to the distributive share of Edward Yates in the testator's assets. The fundamental rule, however, is, that the intention must be collected from the words of the will; but, if it were otherwise, the argument is of small weight, as the testator had excluded Edward and his children from any share of his residuary estate. The antecedent probability is, that an annuity given indefinitely is for life only; and upon the authorities I must hold that the present case is not a gift of a perpetual annuity. The next question then is, whether it is for life or only during minority. I think the words "to be paid to his or her mother," are not sufficient to curtail the duration of the annuity; and that it will be more in accordance with the intention, to supply the words, "during the minority of such child." The declaration, therefore, will be, that the annuity is for life only, and that during minority it is to be paid to the mother.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL
v. THE BISHOP OF WORCESTER.

Charity — Grammar School — Statutes, 52 Geo. 3. c. 101. (Sir Samuel Romilly's Act), 1 & 2 Geo. 4. c. 92. (Charity Commissioners' Act), 3 & 4 Vict. c. 77. (Sir Eardley Wilmot's Act)—Pleading—Jurisdiction—Religious Test—Costs.

By order made in 1844 on petition, and by a subsequent order made on petition, under Sir Samuel Romilly's Act, in 1848, the Court confirmed certain schemes regulating the management of the Free Grammar School at Kidderminster (founded by inquisition taken in 9 Car. 1. to be then existing for the instruction of the children generally of the inhabitants in good literature and learning), and restricting it to forty free boys, from eight to fifteen years of age, of such inhabitants, with a preference to such as were members of the Church of England, and in case of deficiency to children of other persons, being members of the Church of England, to be instructed gratuitously in Latin and Greek, and for certain payments in other branches of education, giving the masters the privilege of taking boarders to compete with the free boys for the prizes, and power to the trustees to admit any additional number of boys at certain payments, requiring the masters to be members of the Church of England, and the head master to be a graduate of one of the English universities, and in holy orders, and allowing the latter to occupy a house exchanged for certain of the trust estates under Sir Eardley Wilmot's Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 77). On information, filed in 1849, to vary the schemes in the above particulars, and to set aside the exchange, the Court varied the scheme as to the religious test (without costs) according to the decree in the Warwick School case (1), and dismissed the remainder of the information, with costs.

This was an information against the Bishop of Worcester, his Lordship's Chancellor, the Vicar of Kidderminster and others, the trustees and feoffees of the Free Grammar School at Kidderminster, in Worcestershire, filed in February 1849, and seeking to vary two existing schemes for the general regulation and management of the school, for discharging the orders of the Court respectively confirming those schemes, to refer it to the Master to settle a proper scheme, and to set aside an exchange which had been effected of a part of the school estates.

By inquisition and decree, of the 10th of October in 9 Car. 1. of the Commissioners appointed by a commission under the Great Seal of the 28th of the previous month of December (and which decree was subsequently ratified and confirmed, except as to certain items of account, by Lord Keeper Coventry in 13 Car. 1), it was inter alia found that divers lands and tenements in Kidderminster were theretofore conveyed to feoffees to the use and for and towards the purpose of the maintenance of a schoolmaster and a free school for the education of children and youth in Kidderminster in good literature and learning. And it was inter alia ordered and decreed that thenceforth the rents of the school estates should be bestowed in necessary reparations of the school, and in buying necessary books for the boys by 40s. per annum, and the rest upon the two masters after the rate of two parts to the high schoolmaster, and one part to the lower schoolmaster, such schoolmasters to devote themselves to teaching and instructing the youth and scholars coming to the school to be taught and instructed, without using, exercising or following any other vocation, profession or business.

By the report of Master Sir George Rose of the 19th of November 1844, pursuant to an order of the Vice Chancellor of England of the 15th of April 1842, and made on the petition of certain individuals, and intituled "In the matter of the Free Grammar School of Kidderminster," (and which report was subsequently confirmed by another order of His Honour of the 13th of December 1844), a scheme was settled and approved whereby it was provided inter alia that the head and under masters of the school should be always members of the Church of England, and the former a graduate of an English university, in holy orders; that the school should consist of forty boys, children of inhabitants of Kidderminster, members of the Church of England being entitled to the privilege of being named or chosen, but if such number should not at any time be made up, the deficiency to be supplied from children of persons, being members of the Church of England, not residing at Kidderminster; that such scholars should be considered as free boys, and instructed in Latin and Greek without charge or payment, and should be further instructed in history, geography and mathematics, writing and other useful branches of education on payment of 1*l.* each quarterly to the head master; that such additional scholars should be admitted as the feoffees should nominate, being children of inhabitants of Kidderminster, and paying not less than 2*l.* each quarterly to the head master; that the schoolmasters should have the privilege of taking such boarders as the feoffees, with the approbation of the visitor, (the Bishop of Worcester) should permit, such boarders to receive their instruction with the free boys, and pay such sum as the feoffees should direct; and that those boys and scholars who were not then receiving any education in Latin and Greek, and who had been instructed in reading, writing and arithmetic without charge or payment, should continue until Lady-day then next, when the said school was to cease, but such scholars to have the privilege of becoming scholars of the Free Grammar School under the terms of the scheme.

In March 1848, the head master of the school (the defendant Cockin) and the vicar of Kidderminster presented a petition under Sir Samuel Romilly's Act (52 Geo. 3. c. 101.) in the matter of the school; and pursuant to an order thereon by the Vice Chancellor of England of the 10th of March 1848, the Master, by his report of the 4th of November 1848 (and which report was subsequently confirmed by another order of his Honour of the 17th of November 1848), settled and approved of a new scheme, whereby it was provided, inter alia, to the effect above stated of the previous scheme, but limiting the admission to boys between eight and fifteen years of age; and that the head master should have for his use Woodfield House and grounds which had been then recently exchanged for the Greenhill estates, part of the school property under the provisions of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 77. (the Grammar School Act.)

The school estates were stated to produce from 550*l.* to 750*l.* per annum.

These particulars and other details are minutely stated in the judgment below.

The grounds of objection to the above schemes on the part of the relators were, the introduction of the religious test, the restrictions of the number and ages of the free boys, the payments for other instruction than in Latin and Greek, the admission of boarders to compete for prizes, the introduction of paying and non-paying classes of scholars, the want of jurisdiction of the Court to direct the schemes on petition, and (as to the exchange) the improper situation of Woodfield House, its bad access to the town and inadequacy of consideration compared with the improveable value of the Greenhill estates.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Rolt and Mr. Charles Hall appeared for the relators.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Bigg, for the visitor (the Bishop of Worcester), the chancellor of the diocese, the vicar of Kidderminster and others, the trustees and feoffees of the Kidderminster Grammar School and its estates.

The Corporation of Ludlow v. Greenhouse, 1 Bligh, N.S. 66.

Nov. 8.—TURNER, V.C.—This information relates to the school at Kidderminster, and it prays that it may be declared that the whole income is for the benefit of the school; and that all the benefits of, and arising from, the school ought to be confined to free scholars only; and that the masters of the school ought not to be allowed boarders, and that the free scholars to the school ought not to be required to make any payment for their education; and that, in the administration of the charity, children who or whose parents are members of the Church of England ought not to have any advantage or privilege over children who or whose parents are not members of the Church of England, and that all boys who can read and write are proper objects of the charity; and that several orders which have been made by the Court in relation to the school may be discharged, and that it may be referred to the Master to settle a proper scheme for the general regulation and management of the charity, having regard to the above declarations, and that an exchange of an estate belonging to the charity called the Greenhill estate for a house and estate called Woodfield may be set aside and proper proceedings taken for that purpose. That the defendant Cockin, who is the master of the school, may be decreed to make good to the charity the damage occasioned thereto by the exchange.

No trace is now to be found of the deeds or instruments by which the school was founded; but it appears by an inquisition taken in the ninth year of the reign of Charles I. upon a commission issued under the statute of Eliz., that various parcels of land had been theretofore conveyed to the use and for and towards the maintenance of schoolmasters and a free school for the education of children and youth in Kidderminster in good literature and learning, and it appears that upon this inquisition the Commissioners made a decree whereby, after various provisions relating to the letting, and the misemployment of the rents of the land which were described as belonging to the free school, they ordered and decreed that no person or persons should be admitted, elected, chosen, allowed or approved of to be schoolmaster or schoolmasters of the Free School in Kidderminster aforesaid, nor have any benefit, profit, wages or stipend belonging to the said school or master or masters of the same, but such person and persons should wholly and altogether employ him and themselves as schoolmasters of the said school, and not employ him or themselves in any manner of other professions or businesses which might or should hinder or any way take away the continual attendance and diligence of such schoolmaster or schoolmasters upon the said school and the scholars therein; but that if any such schoolmaster should in any way or at any time neglect the said school and their duty therein, and also upon any other reasonable cause, such schoolmaster or schoolmasters should be removed and discharged from being further schoolmaster or schoolmasters of the said school, and be deprived of all future profit, benefit, wages or stipend belonging unto the said school or schoolmasters. They further ordered and decreed that all the rents thenceforth to become due for the premises should be employed and bestowed in the necessary expenses of the school, and in buying necessary books for the schoolboys 40s. per annum; or so much thereof as need should require, and the rest upon the schoolmasters for the time being for their wages and stipend for their pains and diligence in the duties of their several places in teaching and instructing the youth and scholars there coming to be taught and instructed; the payments to the schoolmasters to be at the rate of two parts to the high schoolmaster and one part to the low schoolmaster. They also ordered and decreed that no person or persons whatsoever should from thenceforth be nominated, elected, chosen, appointed or approved to be high or low schoolmaster or schoolmasters of the said school, but by the high bailiff of Kidderminster aforesaid for the time being, and certain of the feoffees of the premises for the time being, with the consent and approbation of the Bishop of Worcester for the time being, or of the Chancellor for the time being; and that such person or persons so to be nominated, elected, chosen, placed and approved to be schoolmaster of the same school should be of good and laudable life, gesture and conversation, painful, diligent and industrious in his or their place and places of schoolmaster and schoolmasters as aforesaid, and should continue no longer schoolmaster or schoolmasters of the same school than he or they should so demean and behave themselves as aforesaid in painful diligence and industrious manner in teaching and instructing the youth and scholars coming to the said school to be taught and instructed without using or exercising or following any other vocation, profession or business. And the decree also contained provisions as to letting and rents, and appointed new feoffees, and gave directions for the continuance of the trustees, and provided that the Bishop for the time being and his chancellor and the high bailiff of Kidderminster for the time being should be three of the trustees.

It appears that some exceptions were taken to this decree, and were referred to the Commissioners for their consideration, and that the Commissioners certified in favour of some alterations in the decree as to several matters affecting the tenants; and that the case having then come before the Lord Chancellor, upon exceptions to the certificate, he, on the 12th of June in the thirteenth of Charles I., made a decree, by which, according to the power and authority in that behalf given to him by the statute, he ordered that the decree of the Commissioners and all the matters therein contained should be ratified and confirmed by the decree and authority of this Court according to the alterations in the said certificate.

The property of the charity appears to have been, from time to time, conveyed to new trustees; and in the year 1825 a scheme for the appointment of trustees of the charity was settled under an order of this Court; but the Bishop of Worcester, the Chancellor, and the high bailiff of Kidderminster have always been retained as trustees in conformity with the decree of the Commissioners; and no alteration in the trusts declared by the decree appears to have been attempted to be made down to the year 1842.

By an order of this Court, dated the 15th of April 1842, and made upon the petition of the then trustees, in the matter of the charity, under the title of "The Matter of the Free Grammar School of Kidderminster, in the county of Worcester," it was referred to the Master to approve of a scheme for the future regulation and government of the Free Grammar School, regard being had to the provisions of the act, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 77, the Grammar School Act; and the Attorney General, by his counsel or solicitor, was to be at liberty to attend the Master on the matter referred to him. In pursuance of this order, the Master made his report, dated the 19th of November 1844; by which, after certifying that he had been attended by the solicitors for the petitioners and for the Attorney General, and stating that it appeared, by an affidavit laid before him, that the yearly income of the charity estates was, in the year 1825, 49*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.*, or thereabouts, and that the then present yearly income of the charity amounted to 507*l.* 5*s.* or thereabouts, and that certain leases would shortly fall in, by which it was probable the income would increase considerably; and that the school was then divided into two departments, the upper school and the lower school, and that the number of free scholars attending the free school then amounted, in the upper school to eight and in the lower school to forty; and that the number of free scholars for many years past had not exceeded that number, but that if the school was placed under improved management and regulations it was probable the number of scholars would be increased, and that the Rev. T. Morgan, the then head master of the Free Grammar School, was of the age of eighty years or thereabouts, and was willing to resign his office on having a retiring pension under the provisions of the Grammar School Act, and he found that Mr. W. Fawkes, the late under master of the school, was in the 70th year of his age, and had resigned his office, upon an understanding that he should be allowed a retiring pension of 100*l.* a-year for life, under the provisions of the said act; and he set forth in the second schedule to the report the scheme which he approved for the future regulation and government of the free school.

The provisions of the scheme set forth in the second schedule to this report, so far as they are material to be stated, were as follows:—Article 1. provided for a retiring pension of 150*l.* a year to the Rev. T. Morgan, the late head master of the Free Grammar School, who in the mean time had retired, and for a retiring pension of 100*l.* a year to Mr. Fawkes, the late under master. Article 2. provided that the Bishop of Worcester for the time being should be visitor of the Free Grammar School, and the vicar of Kidderminster for the time being should always be one of the trustees of the school. Articles 3. and 4. provided for the application of the rents of the estate, in the first place, in payment of repairs and of what should be necessary in the opinion of the trustees, or the majority of them, for books, not only for the service of the Free Grammar School, but also for prizes in books to be given at the yearly examination, with a proviso that the amount should not exceed 30*l.* per annum; and then in payment of the retiring pensions and of the salaries of the head and under masters, and of the clerk and collector, and other expenses: and it provided for and directed the surplus to be invested and accumulated, subject to any directions to be given by the Court upon a proper application for the purpose. Article 6. provided that the trustees or the majority of them should, with all convenient speed, upon any vacancy, nominate, for the approbation of the visitor, an apt and able man in learning, manner, and discretion; and that upon the approbation of the visitor, the trustees should elect him to be schoolmaster of the said school, and that they and the visitor should also, in like manner, elect and choose another able and discreet person to be under master or usher of the said school; such masters to be always respectively members of the Church of England, and the head master to be a graduate of an English university and also admitted in holy orders. Article 7. provided that the school should consist of forty boys, to be nominated by the trustees, the children of the inhabitants of the borough and foreign of Kidderminster, members of the Church of England, being entitled to the privilege of being named or chosen; but that if, at any time, the number of forty boys should not be made up by application or nomination from the borough or foreign of Kidderminster, the deficiency might be made up from children of persons being of the Church of England not residing within the borough or foreign. Article 8. provided that such scholars, when chosen, should be considered as free boys and instructed in Latin and Greek without charge or payment, and that they should further be instructed in history, geography, mathematics, writing, and other usual branches of education, on payment of 1*l.* per quarter, the payments to be made to the head master. Article 9. provided that in addition to the forty boys so to be named and educated, there should be admitted into the school such other boys as the trustees should, from time to time, nominate, sanction and direct, being children of inhabitants of the borough and foreign of Kidderminster, who should receive the same education in all respects as the forty boys or scholars, such additional scholars not to pay less than the sum of 2*l.* per quarter to the head master in such manner as the trustees should direct. Article 10. provided that the head master should, as and when required by the trustees, and subject to their consent and approval, appoint one or more assistant or assistants other than the under master, who should, under the superintendence of the head master, instruct the scholars in history, geography, writing, arithmetic, mathematics and other usual branches of education, the head master to pay to such assistants such salaries as the trustees should deem reasonable. Article 11. provided that the schoolmasters should have the privilege of taking such a number of boarders into their houses for the purpose of receiving their education in the said school, as the trustees, with the approbation of the visitor, should permit and approve of, such boarders always to receive their instruction in common with the free boys, such boys paying such sum as the trustees should direct and approve, but no other distinction to be made between the boarders and free boys in school hours, or as to the privileges and enjoyments of the school, or in their discipline or treatment in any respect. Article 12. fixed the salaries of the schoolmaster and the under master at the following minimum rate, the schoolmaster 300*l.* a-year and a house, and the under master 100*l.* a-year and a house, and it assigned houses belonging to the school property to the schoolmaster and under master respectively for their respective uses: and after reciting that the house assigned to the schoolmaster was small and insufficient for the accommodation of boarders, it provided that it should be competent to the trustees at any time, with the approbation of the visitor, to allow the master to reside in any other house within the precincts of the borough of Kidderminster; and that in such case the trustees might let the master's house, and permit the master to receive the rents thereof to enable him the better to provide for himself and his boarders a larger house. Article 13. laid down the rules and regulations for the conduct of the school, amongst which were the following:—that the business of the day in the school should commence and end in the prescribed forms of prayer to be approved of by the visitor for the time being, and that such a portion of Saturday in each week as might seem proper to the master, should be devoted to the instruction of the respective scholars in the principles of the Christian religion and the doctrines and rites of the Church of England; that all the scholars, except as thereafter mentioned, should repair to the parish or some other church of Kidderminster twice every Sunday, and on such of the days set apart for public worship as the trustees should from time to time direct; and that the head or under master should attend the boys at church on every occasion, with a proviso that the trustees might excuse, by a note in writing, any boy or boys from such attendance upon request made to them by the parents of any such boy or boys; and that such person so excused should not be compelled to attend at church morning or evening. That no boy should be admitted into the school who was less than eight or more than sixteen years of age. That there should be a yearly examination by an examiner appointed by the visitor, who should report to the trustees and also to the visitor the state of improvement and proficiency of the scholars, and the general state of the school, and also recommend such as were sufficiently advanced to be drafted into the upper school; and that in case the visitor should approve of the recommendation, the same should be forthwith adopted. Article 15. gave to the trustees power to appoint a clerk and a collector, with salaries. And Article 21. was as follows:—"That inasmuch as there had been previous to that time a number of boys or scholars not receiving any education in Latin and Greek, who had been instructed in reading, writing and arithmetic without charge or payment, and it was desirable that they should not be deprived of the advantage thus afforded them, the trustees should have the power to allow them to continue at the said school without any payment, except the mere payment quarterly for stationery, until the 25th of March 1845, when the said school was to cease, but the scholars thereof to have the privilege of becoming scholars of the Free Grammar School, under the terms of the scheme."

By an order of the Court, dated the 13th of December 1844, this report was confirmed and the scheme directed to be carried into effect. This order was made upon the petition of the then trustees in the matter of the charity under the same title as before of "The Matter of the Free Grammar School of Kidderminster, in the county of Worcester"; and the Attorney General appeared upon the petition. Upon the retirement of the Rev. Thos. Morgan from the head mastership of the school pending the above proceedings, and on the 21st of February 1843, the Rev. W. Cockin was elected to be head master in his place; and in some circulars which appear to have been issued for the information of candidates with reference to the election, it was stated that the master would be allowed to take any number of boarders the house would accommodate. That the school was open to the parish at large, that there was no payment with scholars, and that the course of education was classical and mathematical. The number of free pupils in the school was also stated, and it was mentioned that there were no boarders.

Mr. Fawkes, the under master of the school, having also retired from his office, as stated in the report, on the 25th of March 1844 the Rev. E. Brine was appointed under master in his place. Soon after Mr. Cockin was appointed to be head master of the school, and in the month of September 1843 he purchased a house in the borough of Kidderminster, called Woodfield House, with about nine acres of land attached to it, and fitted up the house for boarders. It appears to have been made capable of accommodating about fifty boarders, and under the 12th article of the scheme Mr. Cockin was allowed to reside in this house, and has ever since resided in it and taken boarders there. The house and lands thus purchased by Mr. Cockin were in the year 1848 exchanged by him with the trustees of the charity for another estate, in the parish of Kidderminster, belonging to the charity, and called the Greenhill estate, containing about fifty acres. This exchange was effected under the powers of the act, 1 & 2 Geo. 4. c. 92, for authorizing the exchange of charity lands, and all the provisions of the act appear to have been duly observed, including the valuation required by it. The exchange was completed by a deed, dated the 3rd of February 1848, by which the Woodfield estate was conveyed to the trustees of the school, and the Greenhill estate to Mr. Cockin, and Mr. Cockin has since sold the Greenhill estate. It appears that although Mr. Cockin was thus permitted to reside in Woodfield House, the school continued down to this time to be carried on as it had before been in an old building adjoining the parish church, and which was not included in any of the deeds by which the charity property was conveyed. In this state of circumstances, the Vicar of Kidderminster came to an agreement with his co-trustees, that the trustees should give up possession of the building adjoining the parish church, upon the terms of his erecting a new school-room, adjoining Woodfield House, at an expense of not less than 1,200*l.*; and thereupon, on the 7th of March 1848, Mr. Cockin and the vicar presented a petition in this court in the matter of the charity, under the same title as before, stating the exchange and the agreements; and that by reason thereof it was desirable that a reduction of the salary of the head master should be made, and that for that purpose an alteration of the scheme would become necessary, and praying that the agreement between the vicar and the trustees might be confirmed, and that it might be referred to the Master to examine and approve of a new scheme for the future regulation and government of the Free Grammar School, regard being had to the provisions of the grammar school.

By an order made upon this petition, and dated the 10th of March 1848, it was referred to the Master to inquire whether it would be fit and proper and for the benefit of the charity that the agreement should be carried into effect; and this order also referred it to the Master to approve of a new scheme in the terms prayed by the petition. In pursuance of this order the Master made a report, dated the 4th of November 1848, by which, after certifying that he had been attended by the solicitors for the petitioners and for the Attorney General, he approved of the agreement and of a new scheme for the regulation and government of the school. The scheme approved of by this report was in substance the same as that which the Master had approved by his former report, the only material variations being that the head master was to have 240*l.* a-year and Woodfield House and grounds instead of his salary of 300*l.* a-year; that the under master was to have, in addition to the house which had been before assigned to him, the house which by the former scheme had been assigned to the head master; and that the school was to be carried on at Woodfield House.

This report was confirmed by an order dated the 17th of November 1848.

The school has been conducted upon the footing of the schemes from the times they have respectively been in force. It had sunk to a low ebb at the time of Mr. Morgan's retirement, there being then only seven free boys in the upper school, and there were then no boarders. Upon the appointment of Mr. Cockin to the head mastership in 1843, it rose considerably, and when Mr. Fawkes retired at Lady-day 1844, there were sixty-three free boys in the school, of whom thirty were in the upper school where Greek and Latin were taught, and thirty-three in the lower school where the instruction was in English only. The number of free boys appears to have still further increased in the year 1844, as it is admitted that there were forty-four boys in the upper school at some time in that year. Since the year 1844, however, the number of free boys has gradually decreased, and at the time of the filing of this information there were only thirteen free boys in the school. The number of boarders, on the other hand, has gradually increased, and when this information was filed there were thirty-nine boarders in the school.

At the time when Mr. Cockin was appointed to the head-mastership, no payment was required from the free boys for their education, but from Michaelmas 1843 the free boys in the upper school were, by direction of the trustees, required to make a quarterly payment to the head master for instruction in English and other branches of education, Latin and Greek only being taught free of charge, and it is admitted by the information that before Mr. Cockin's appointment small payments varying from 2*s.* 6*d.* to 5*s.* a-quarter had sometimes been required to be made in respect of writing and arithmetic.

Many of the inhabitants of Kidderminster being dissatisfied with the scheme of 1844, a public meeting of the inhabitants was held on the 1st of December 1848, at which resolutions were passed condemning that scheme in the particulars complained of by the information and in other respects, and it was resolved to petition the Lord Chancellor and the Bishop of the diocese as visitors, and a committee was appointed to watch the interests of the school, to take proceedings in equity or otherwise, and to dispose of the subscriptions of the parishioners to defray the expenses thereof. In pursuance of those resolutions, a memorial was presented to the Bishop of Worcester, as visitor, in which the principal grounds of complaint were the quarterly payments charged by the scheme upon the free boys, the non-exercise by the trustees of their power to limit the number of boarders, and the non-distribution of the 30*l.* a-year in books and prizes. The Bishop answered this memorial on the 13th of January 1849, to the effect that the quarterly payments being imposed by the scheme, the alleged grievance in that respect was not within his jurisdiction as visitor, that he should not feel himself justified in interfering as visitor with the discretionary power which by the scheme was reserved to the trustees of limiting the number of boarders, and that it having been proved before him that the funds of the school were not adequate to meet the 30*l.* per annum, the only direction he could give respecting it was, that it should be applied according to the scheme whenever there was a sufficient surplus, after paying the salaries of the masters and other school expenses. The Bishop's answer to the memorial went on to state that grammar schools such as that at Kidderminster were not intended for the general education of the inhabitants of towns, but were exclusively instituted for the purpose of affording opportunities for a good classical education to the sons of merchants, tradesmen and others evincing an aptitude for learning. That the scheme had conceded this privilege to the inhabitants of Kidderminster on payment of 1*l.* per quarter, which was a trifling charge for such an education, and that it was not for him as visitor to decide whether it would have been more advisable that such education should have been afforded to the inhabitants gratuitously, as the point was settled by the scheme. The application to the Bishop having thus failed of effect, this information was filed on the 6th of February 1849, against the trustees and against the present master and under master and Mr. Fawkes the late under master of the school. In addition to the above-mentioned facts, in relation to the school, the information alleges that the rental of the charity has increased since it was reported, in 1844, to be 507*l.* 5*s.*, and that it is now of the value of 795*l.* per annum, and will, from the falling in of leases and other causes, be hereafter considerably increased; that at the time when the above petitions were presented it was known by the parties presenting them that many of the inhabitants of Kidderminster would not approve of the schemes set forth in the reports, and that the petitions were presented without the inhabitants being consulted in order if possible to prevent questions being made as to the propriety of the schemes: that it was the intention of the founders of the school, as set forth in the inquisition and decree; and was required by the decree, that the school should be a free school and that the benefits thereof should be enjoyed by free scholars only, and that it was contrary to the intentions of the founders that there should be any boys in the school whose parents should pay towards their education therein, and that no payment ought to be made by the free scholars for instruction in history, geography, and mathematics, writing and other branches of education, but that all such branches of education were comprised in and formed part of the good literature and learning for the instruction of boys in which the charity was founded, or at all events ought now to be included in the gratuitous education, which was an essential part of the charity. That the provisions contained in the scheme for the instruction of the boys in the doctrines and rites of the Church of England, and for the attendance of the boys at church and for giving a preference to boys being children of members of the Church of England, and for the non-admission of boys under eight years of age, and the payments required by the schemes to be made by the scholars called free scholars to the head master had prevented and would, unless the schemes were altered, continue to prevent many deserving and proper objects of the charity receiving the benefit thereof, and that, in fact, some boys who had applied for admission to the school had been rejected because their parents were not members of the Church of England, and other boys had, in consequence of the payments required, been obliged to discontinue receiving the benefit of the charity, and to be sent to other schools supported by subscription.

The information further alleges that the boarders had been allowed to compete with the free scholars for the prizes which were annually distributed in conformity with the provisions of the scheme, and that in consequence of the greater time and care devoted to their education, they had succeeded in gaining nearly all the prizes, and that in the year 1848 they had obtained twenty-one out of twenty-four prizes. That the success of the boarders as to the prizes occasioned ill-feeling amongst the scholars, and was disliked by parents who had sent, or might be willing to send boys to the school. That the inhabitants of Kidderminster being nearly all persons in trade, were unable to send their boys to the school as boarders, not only on account of the expense, but because the head master considered a tradesman's son objectionable as a boarder, and that the revenue of the school exceeded 700*l.* a year, and was sufficient to provide good and efficient masters to instruct the free scholars in conformity with the decrees, without resort being had to the taking of boarders, and that the masters, by the taking of boarders, obtained a much larger income than was necessary for the masters of the school. The allegations of the information as to the exchange are, that it was made with a view to Mr. Cockin taking a larger number of boarders, and providing for him a larger house for that purpose, and that it was improvident, except upon the assumption that it was in furtherance of the intention of the founders of the charity, or that it was otherwise justifiable to provide for the head master out of the trust property a house sufficiently large to accommodate a large number of boarders. That by reason of the exchange the revenue derived from the charity estate would be permanently diminished, or at least rendered more precarious. That the charity estate given in exchange was land let for agricultural purposes, and much more desirable property for the charity than property consisting principally of a house; that it was land which, from its peculiar position, was likely to increase considerably in value, and which it was known would, on the determination of the existing leases, produce a greatly increased rental. That the exchange never would have been made had not Mr. Cockin been desirous of having a large house, wherein he might take a large number of boarders; that the old house of the head master was sufficiently large for him and his family, and was then occupied by a large family, who had two boarders living with them, and that notices had been given in March 1843 and October 1847, that the exchange, if made, would be set aside. The information charges that the orders of April 1842 and March 1848, ought not, under the circumstances, and having regard to the decrees, to have been applied for on petition, and ought not to have been made; and that there was no jurisdiction in the Court to make such orders as the orders confirming the reports: and the prayer of the information is as I have already stated. There is a charge in the information as to the school being entitled to an exhibition to the University, but I lay it out of the case, as it is evidently of no value, and was not relied on in argument.

The defendants, the trustees, by their answer, state that the present annual rental of the charity estates is 579*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, and that they believe that by the falling in of leases the rental will be increased in 1851 and again in 1856. That they are advised and submit that the free school, according to its foundation, is not a school for the teaching of writing and arithmetic, but for educating scholars in the learned languages and grammar only; that it appears from orders and entries in ancient minute books in their possession, that payments or quarterages by scholars attending the free school have always been accustomed to be made in the school, but that such payments or quarterages have never been made for the education the boys were entitled to receive at the free school; that neither previously, nor at present, was or is any payment made by a free scholar for the teaching of Latin and Greek, but that the payments or quarterages have always been made, and now are made, solely and exclusively for instruction in writing, arithmetic, and English literature; and then they set forth the following entry in an ancient minute-book of the school, purporting to be resolutions agreed to at a meeting of the trustees of the 2nd of October 1756:—"That the usher or low master of the school should be well qualified for teaching Latin and grammar in the school, according to the original institution thereof, and also writing and arithmetic therein in an accurate and competent manner. That the said usher or low master should not be obliged to teach writing and arithmetic in the said free school, unless the parent agreed, or the friend of the child or children there sent to be taught the same, should, previous to such instruction in writing and arithmetic, engage and promise to pay to such master, for such learning, as the original institution was only for teaching Latin and grammar in the said school, the sum of 5s. per quarter, including pens and ink, for the said scholars." And also another entry in the same book, and dated the 17th of December 1777, as follows:—"Entrance money of 5s. to be paid to the under master, and that he has a right to receive the same." And they say they believe the only gratuitous instruction ever given in the said free school consisted of instruction in Latin, Greek, and grammar only, and they deny that at the time mentioned in the information it was the existing practice, and to the best of their belief that it was at any time the ancient practice of the school to give to the scholars gratuitous instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic.

With respect to the petitions, they admit that the inhabitants of Kidderminster were not consulted on the presentation of them, but they say that they were presented with the approval and by the direction of the trustees, and that the proceedings upon them were matters of notoriety in the town, and that the Attorney General attended by counsel on the proceedings before the Master for the settlement of the scheme. With respect to the religious qualification and the other provisions of the scheme relating to religious instruction, they say the Bishop of Worcester has always been the visitor of the school and one of the trustees. That the head master of the school has always been a clergyman of the Church of England, and that the free scholars of the school have always, time out of mind, attended the parish church, and that from such circumstances they have always considered and believed that the free school was a charity in connexion with the Church of England, but that they did not propose or suggest before the Master that the free scholars should be confined to the children of the inhabitants of Kidderminster being members of the Church of England, but that the counsel of the Attorney General insisted, before the Master, that the free school was a Church of England foundation, and that the benefits of the school should be confined to the children of the inhabitants of Kidderminster being members of the Church of England, and that the Master was of the same opinion, and, consequently, approved of the scheme, with such limitation. They state, however, that they are anxious and willing to act as the Court shall direct, and that they are willing to consent to an alteration of the scheme, so that the benefits of the charity may be extended to the children of all the inhabitants of Kidderminster; but they submit that having regard to the ancient practice in the school, and to the constitution of the school, the boys attending the school ought to be instructed in the doctrines and rites of the Church of England, and ought, at the discretion of the head master, to attend at church, or at all events, that the religious instruction of the boys ought to be left to the head master.

With respect to the charges for education, they say that the school has always been and is now a free school for teaching the learned languages and grammar, and that no charge whatever has ever been or is now made for such instruction, and that from the inquisition and decree and the ancient usage of the school, they believe that it was the intention of the founders that the parents of the free scholars should not pay anything for their instruction in good literature and learning: by which they submit is meant and intended instruction in Greek, Latin and grammar, and they submit that the head master is not required according to the constitution of the school to give gratuitous instruction to the free boys in any other branch of education except Greek, Latin, and grammar, and they say they are advised and submit that such is and always has been the practice in the said free school and in all other free schools similarly constituted ; and they therefore submit that payment ought to be made by or for the free scholars to the head master for instruction in history, geography, and mathematics, and all other branches of education, except Greek, Latin and grammar ; and they also say they are advised and submit that having regard to the ancient usages of the said school, and to the usage and practice of free schools similarly situated and founded at or about the same period, the branches of education in the information mentioned do not form part of good literature and learning for the instruction of boys on which the charity was founded.

With respect to the ages for admission, they submit that the school was intended for the purpose of affording a classical education, and that it would not be useful or advantageous to the principal objects of the charity to admit children of tender years ; that some age ought to be fixed for the admission of free boys, and that the age of eight years was a fair and proper age for such admission.

With respect to the prizes, they say that none have been distributed in conformity with the powers of the scheme, the income of the charity not having been sufficient to supply funds for the purpose, but that since the head master's appointment books as prizes have twice in every year been provided at the exclusive expense of the head master and the under master and two other persons who took an interest in the prosperity of the school, and that the free boys have always been permitted to compete with the boarders for such prizes, and that during the period that the prizes have been distributed, sixty-one of such prizes have been obtained by boarders, and fifty-one by free scholars ; and that although in the year 1848 the boarders obtained twenty-one out of twenty-four, yet that on many previous occasions the free scholars obtained the greater proportion of the prizes ; that the prizes have always been fairly distributed ; that the success of the boarders as to the prizes occasions no ill feeling among the scholars ; that no such ill feeling has existed or does exist, and that the great majority of the parents of the free scholars approve the system of distributing prizes as promoting greater competition among all the boys attending the school.

With respect to the boarders, they say, that although masters of average ability might be obtained for the salaries provided by the scheme, yet that schoolmasters of high reputation and character would not be induced by such remuneration only to accept the office of head master of the free school, and that they believe that it is greatly for the advantage and interest of the charity that men of high character and reputation from one of the Universities should be induced to accept such office, and that the present head master would not have accepted such office upon the remuneration which would have been provided solely from the income of the charity, and they therefore believe that the revenue of the school is not sufficient to provide good and sufficient masters to instruct the free scholars in conformity with the decrees mentioned, without resort being had to the taking of boarders ; and they say that in their judgment and belief the taking of boarders by the master is greatly to the advantage and interest of the free school by exciting competition among the boys and raising the character and reputation of the school ; and for those reasons they submit that the masters should not be prohibited from taking boarders ; and in conclusion, as to the school, they say they are willing, if the Court shall think proper so to direct, that the existing scheme should be altered by admitting to the benefit of the free school children of the inhabitants of Kidderminster, whether members of the Church of England or not ; but except in that respect, they submit that the existing scheme, having been settled under the authority of the Court, and with the express sanction of the Attorney General, represented by the counsel attending for him before the Master, ought not to be altered.

And as to the exchange, they state that the old school-room, being an ancient building attached to the church, confined in space and quite unsuitable for the purpose of a school-room, not only being in a dilapidated state, but surrounded by a crowded churchyard, they considered as trustees of the school that it would be generally for the advantage of the charity that a permanent and fit and proper residence for the head master of the school should be obtained by them, and that a new and commodious school-room should be built, which should be attached to the head schoolmaster's house. And then they go on to state in detail the proceedings relating to the exchange, and that it was completed under the provisions of the statute of 1 & 2 Geo. 4, and that a large and commodious school-room has been subsequently built adjoining Woodfield House, at a cost of upwards of 1,200*l.*, and that the room has been used for the purpose of the school since in or about June 1848. They further say, that it was in their judgment for the advantage of the charity that the house of the head master should be capable of accommodating boarders, and that they would not have effected the exchange unless the house had been suited for such purpose, but they deny that the exchange was improvident in any respect. And they set forth various particulars relating to the two properties, from which it appears that the income applicable for the purpose of the school was increased by the exchange. They also state, in relation to the exchange, that before it was effected they advertised the meeting held by the Commissioners under the act in the Kidderminster newspaper, for the express purpose of giving an opportunity to any inhabitant to attend and object. That the solicitor of the relators was the only inhabitant who attended; that he attended for several inhabitants, but refused to state for whom, and ultimately insisted on his right to attend in his own behalf, and that he protested against the exchange; and they say that the Commissioners then invited him to offer any evidence, or to make any statement he thought fit, but that he offered no evidence and gave no reason why the exchange should not be effected.

By their answer to the amended information the defendants, the trustees, state the present clear rental of the property, after deducting the former under master's pension, the salaries of officers, rates, taxes, repairs, and loss by tenants to be 351*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.*, and they set out a schedule of the prizes from which it appears that since 1846 by far the greater proportion of prizes has been obtained by the boarders.

The answers of the master and under master are to the same effect as those of the trustees. The answer of the master also states a further entry in the minute-book, under the date of the 6th of June 1768, limiting the number of boys to be taught by the second master to twenty, and another entry under the date of the 23rd of December 1773, prescribing the payment of an entrance fee to the under master of 5*s.* The master, by his answer, also states that the regulations of the scheme have not been enforced as against the children of parents dissenting from the doctrine of the Church of England, and that he is not desirous of excluding dissenters from the benefit of education at the school. And he submits that, at all events, he ought not to be prohibited from taking boarders, for he says that he became master on the understanding that he was entitled to take boarders, and that he has had such understanding twice assured to him by the schemes approved by the Court, and that he has on the faith of such his right incurred very considerable expense in providing for the reception of boarders. It also appears from the answer of the master that both Mr. Morgan and Mr. Fawkes had formerly taken boarders, although they had ceased to do so before they retired from their offices. And the master's answer states that he has sold the Greenhill estates. The under master's answer states his belief that many of the inhabitants of Kidderminster are dissatisfied with the schemes, and that the payments required to be made by the scholars prevent some of the objects of the charity receiving the benefit thereof. The answer of Mr. Fawkes contains nothing material to the questions in the cause.

A great deal of evidence has been gone into in the cause, both in support of the information and on the part of the defendants. In support of the information, it is proved that the meeting at which the resolutions were passed condemning the schemes was attended by about 1,500 persons, and evidence has been gone into as to the value of the charity property. Two surveyors, who have been examined, state that the net rental of the property, exclusive of the parts used as the school and the masters' houses, ought if well managed and let to the best advantage, to be 898*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.*; and with reference to the exchange of Greenhill estate for the Woodfield House and land, they state that if taken as one estate for the other it was an improvident exchange for the trustees; that the Greenhill estate is eligibly situate for garden ground and villas, and was calculated to produce an increase of income to the trustees, and that the land was four times the quantity of the land at Woodfield, and that Woodfield House unless occupied by the master of the school would be difficult to let unless at a very moderate rent, and they set the Greenhill estate at 200*l.* a-year if occupied as garden ground, and 400*l.* a-year if let for building. Many witnesses have also been examined on the part of the information in relation to the school, and on carefully reading their evidence I think it satisfactorily proves that there have been at different times from forty to fifty, and even sixty boys receiving their education at the school; that the boys were the sons of the tradesmen and the shopkeepers in the town, and that until the scheme of 1844 came into operation boys were admissible into the school at any age if able to read, and that there was no distinction as to the children of dissenters; but many of these witnesses state that at different times the under master had a few boarders, not however at any time exceeding six in number. It also appears from the evidence of several of these witnesses that small payments were made by the boys for books, pens and ink, and other incidental matters, but they all concur in stating that until the scheme of 1844 no payment was made for education at the school. Several of them state that the number of boys attending the school increased upon Mr. Cockin being first appointed, but again diminished upon the scheme coming into operation, and they ascribe the change to the rules introduced by that scheme, particularly to the rules as to the age of boys and to the quarterly payments, and the religious qualification; several of them stating that they have been prevented by those rules from sending their children to the school, and some of them deposing that they have been compelled to withdraw their children from the school in consequence of the quarterly payments. One of the witnesses, in particular, states that his boy, who had been admitted to the school at the age of seven, was refused admission after the scheme, because he was three weeks under eight years of age. Another, who is a dissenter, and had a boy at the school, states that about the time of Mr. Cockin's appointment she was told by the vicar that the school was intended for church boys and not for dissenters, and that her boy must leave unless he paid 2*l.* a quarter. And another states that the vicar told her that the school was made a grammar school, and advised her not to send her boy there as he was intended for trade. Several of the witnesses also state that the system of the masters taking boarders also operates to prevent the parishioners from sending their boys to the school, the parents considering that the boarders are better attended to than the free boys, that impression being increased by the boarders getting so many of the prizes. Two of the witnesses, indeed, go so far as to state that the free boys are not allowed to mix with the boarders, and one of them says that they were put to sit upon the form by themselves, and were not taught the same as the boarders, were kept to fewer books and had not the same treatment. And in connexion with this subject, the informants have proved a letter from Mr. Cockin to Mr. Griffith, one of the relators, with reference to his sending his son to the school as a boarder, in which Mr. Cockin in advising that the boy should not be sent as a boarder assigns as one of the grounds that Griffith being in business in the same town will he fears operate prejudicially to the boy amongst his companions. The informants have also proved notices to the trustees before the exchange was completed, and that proceedings would be taken to set it aside if carried out.

The evidence on the part of the defendants is, for the most part, documentary. It consists, first, of the minutes of the proceedings of the trustees from the year 1704. The school is, throughout those minutes, called the Free Grammar School. Amongst the entries in those minutes are those which are particularly mentioned in the answers; and it is observable that the entry of the 2nd of October 1756 contains, in addition to what is stated in the answer, the following provision, "That the person to be elected into the place of usher or lower master shall, previous to his election therein, be bound in a bond of 500*l.* that he will as well teach Latin and grammar as also writing and arithmetic in the said school." And these minutes also contain the following orders, under the date of the 6th of June 1768: "Ordered that F. Hemsell, the usher of the said grammar school, shall receive into the said school twenty boys, inhabitants of the borough or foreign of Kidderminster; such boys to be elected by a majority of the said trustees, and whose respective ages shall not be less than seven years; and that the said F. Hemsell shall receive and continue the said boys in the said school, and there teach and instruct them in reading, writing, arithmetic and grammar, for any term or time not exceeding the term of two years, without demanding or receiving any reward or gratuity for the same," with provisions for keeping up this number of twenty boys. Under date the 23rd of December 1787, an order for the appointment of an under master, made at a meeting of the trustees, and which states as follows: "At the said meeting, it was also agreed by the under-mentioned feoffees that the sum of 5*s.* shall be taken by the said under or lower master, as entrance into the said school, for any boys sent there to be taught, and that the said under master has a right to require from each boy now being or coming to be taught in the said school the like sum of 5*s.*" Under the date of the 19th of June 1787, an order appointing an under master, on condition of his entering into a bond obliging himself to teach the scholars of the said school not only grammar, but writing and arithmetic, at the discretion of the trustees or feoffees; and under the date of the 26th of October 1796, an order, by which, after reciting a representation of the under master that his salary was insufficient for the support of his family, and that from the number of boys attending the school for instruction in writing and arithmetic and his diligence therein he deserved every proper encouragement the trustees could give him, they consented that he should receive of the parents of such boys as were sent to the school a quaterage of 2*s.* 6*d.* for such boys only as were instructed in writing and arithmetic, to continue till otherwise ordered by the trustees. Secondly, several memoranda, signed by masters of the school upon their election and resignation, and dated in the years 1687, 1696 and 1697, in which the school is called the Free Grammar School; and thirdly, a great number of leases of property belonging to the school, from 1580 to 1809, in all of which, down to about 1704, the school is called "the Free School," except in two instances in 1675 and 1689, in which it is called "the Free Grammar School;" and in all of which, subsequent to 1704, the school is called "the Free Grammar School," except in four or five instances, between 1720 and 1730. This documentary evidence has been produced by the trustees, and they have also proved a copy of the Bishop's answer to the memorial; and they have examined their clerk as a witness, who proves that one of the relators in this information objected before the Bishop that the trustees, though prohibited by the scheme from so doing, had admitted children of dissenters to the school. This witness also proves that the gross income of the charity property, exclusive of the masters' houses, was, in the year 1848, 597*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*, and in the year 1849, 579*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, and that the net income of the charity property applicable to the school, after deducting the late under master's pension, salaries of officers, repairs, insurance and loss of rent, was in 1848 430*l.* 0*s.* 8*d.* and in 1849 351*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.*, and that there was no surplus applicable to the prizes, the charity being in debt to its treasurer. He further proves the increased rental obtained by the charity by means of the exchange, as stated in the answer. And he states that 5*s.* a quarter was heretofore payable by each scholar for being taught writing and arithmetic, and that if more or less than that sum has been taken or required it has been done without the sanction of the trustees. The trustees have also examined another witness, who proves, that when he went to the school in 1787, 2*s.* 6*d.* or 5*s.* was paid as entrance-money, and that whilst he continued at the school 5*s.* a quarter was paid to the under master for his instruction in reading, writing and arithmetic, independent of charges for stationery, &c.; but that when he got into the upper school nothing was paid to the upper master for his instruction in Latin and Greek; and he proves that the same payments as were made when he was at school have been paid by him for three of his sons, who went to the school in the years 1817, 1820 and 1826. The trustees have likewise examined Mr. Cockin as a witness on their behalf; and he proves that no part of the income of the charity has been applied in providing the prizes which have been distributed since he has been master. That there have been 172 prizes so distributed, of which 64 have been awarded to free scholars and 108 to boarders; that the course of education consists of instruction in the classics, mathematics, ancient and modern history, geography, and general branches of information; that this course is pursued throughout the school, the division into upper and lower schools having been abolished, and that no difference whatever is now or has been since the admission of boarders made between the education received in the school by the boarders and that received by the free scholars or town boys, all joining in the same classes according to their respective ages and attainments, and being taught together. It is also proved, on behalf of the trustees, that the words "being of the Church of England," which are contained in the scheme of 1844, and by which the children of dissenters are excluded from the school, were introduced by the Master, and that the introduction of them was objected to by the trustees; and it is also proved, on the part of Mr. Cockin, that he bought Woodfield House and land, in 1843 for 2,875*l.*, and that he expended upon the house, in permanent improvements, 300*l.* or 400*l.* in 1843 and about 850*l.* in 1846, and that the school buildings erected there have cost between 1,700*l.* and 1,800*l.*, and that he sold the Greenhill estate in 1848 for 4,200*l.*

The case standing thus upon the facts, it appears that the information seeks relief, first, as to the regulation of the school; secondly, as to the transaction of the exchange. I propose to consider the case first, with reference to the school.

Upon this part of the case, it was first argued, in support of the information, that the orders upon petition which have been made by the Court in relation to the school, and the schemes which have been settled under them, ought for several reasons to be wholly disregarded, and that the case ought now to be determined as if no such orders had been made and no such schemes settled. The argument on this point was rested on three grounds: first, that the decree of the Court confirming with modifications the decree of the Commissioners of Charitable Uses precluded the Court from dealing with the case upon petition; secondly, that the case did not fall within the provisions of Sir Samuel Romilly's Act, 52 Geo. 3. c. 101, and thirdly, that it was not reached by the Grammar School Act, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 77. It was said as to the first of those grounds that the decree of the Court following upon the decree of the Commissioners of Charitable Uses was final and conclusive, and the case of Windsor v. the Inhabitants of Farnham was cited in support of the proposition. As to the second ground, it was said that Sir Samuel Romilly's Act did not extend to empower the Court in any manner to alter or affect what had been settled by the decree of the Court; and as to the third ground that the school was not a grammar school, and if it was, the same restriction as was applied to Sir Samuel Romilly's Act ought to be applied to the summary jurisdiction created by the Grammar School Act. I am of opinion that the orders and schemes in question cannot be thrown out of the case upon any of those grounds.

As to the first ground, the case referred to which was cited from Cro. Car. 40, but is better reported in Duke, p. 634, has indeed decided that the decree of the Chancellor following upon the decree of the Commissioners of Charitable Uses is not open to a bill of review, one reason assigned, which appears in both of the reports, being that the Chancellor's decree in such cases takes its authority from the statute, and that the statute mentions only one examination by the Chancellor; in effect, that the decree is under the statutory and not the ordinary jurisdiction: and another reason, which appears in the report in Duke only, being that the appeal to the Chancellor given by the statute, is in itself in the nature of a bill of review, and that there can be no bill of review upon a bill of review. The latter reason appears to me the most satisfactory one, for it is difficult to see how upon any other ground it can be that the decree in such cases should not be subject to review, and yet should be open to appeal as the case itself decides it to be. But this case, although the facts of it do not appear, was evidently one in which the decree could not, according to the ordinary course of the court, have been altered except upon bill of review; and I see no ground for applying the same rules to cases in which according to the ordinary course of the Court no bill of review is necessary for enabling alterations to be made. The decree of the Commissioners in this case does not, I think, go further than to regulate the charity; the Lord Chancellor's decree does not even alter the regulations. This Court is in the constant habit of altering schemes which have been settled under its decrees as the alterations of times and circumstances have required; and it has frequently done so upon petition in the causes in which the decrees have been made, and I do not think that the power of the Court to make such alterations can depend upon the character in which the decree has been made by the Lord Chancellor. The Court does not appear in The Attorney General v. Bovill to have felt any difficulty in interfering with the Commissioners' decree; and although their decree in that case does not appear to have been brought under review by the Lord Chancellor, I think the same principle applies, and I have no difficulty in following the precedent.

As to the second ground, that the case did not fall within Sir Samuel Romilly's Act, I have referred to the act and the cases which have been decided upon it. The terms of the act are most general. It creates the summary jurisdiction in all cases of breach of trust or supposed breach of trust, and in all cases where the order or direction of the Court shall be deemed necessary for the administration of any trust for charitable purposes; but the decisions, I think, have settled that it does not apply between the trustees and strangers, that it applies only between the trustees and the objects of the trust, and it is in the discretion of the Court to what extent it ought as between them to be applied. The cases do not, I think, enable any fixed rule to be laid down by which the Court can be governed in the exercise of that discretion. Lord Cottenham, in the Tiverton School case (2), is reported to have said that the act ought not to be applied in cases where the Court sees that the jurisdiction given by it cannot be exercised with justice to any parties or with benefit to the charity; and it appears that he considered that case not to be proper for the exercise of the jurisdiction, as it involved extensive and fundamental questions as to the principle on which the charity was to be administered. But these rules still leave it to be considered by the Court in each case whether the act can be applied with justice and benefit, and what are the extensive and fundamental questions of principle which ought to exclude its application. Perhaps the rule might well be laid down that the act, at all events, may be safely resorted to in all cases where the objects of the charity have no distinct interests, and where, therefore, the Attorney General properly represents them all, and in all cases where although there may be distinct interests, no substantial question of principle can arise between the several objects. This, however, is not the question in the present case. I cannot accede to the argument that because a scheme was settled by the decree of the Commissioners followed by the order of the Lord Chancellor; it was not in the power of the Court to alter it; and if it could be altered upon information, I think it could be altered upon petition under the act. The Court had a discretion whether it would interfere upon petition or not; it has exercised that discretion, and I do not think that I should be justified in wholly disregarding what has been done by the Court in the exercise of a jurisdiction given to it by the statute, although it was discretionary in the Court whether it would exercise that jurisdiction or not.

As to the third ground upon the question, whether this is a grammar school, I think no reasonable doubt can be entertained. It was held by Lord Langdale, in The Attorney General v. Jackson, that the term "free school" in the instrument then under his consideration, ought not to be construed "free grammar school"; and, I think the term "free school" is flexible in its meaning, and must be construed according to the context and the usage which has prevailed in the school. The term "free school" has no reference to the instruction given in the school, but refers to the terms on which the instruction was given, and if grammar be taught in a school free of charge, I think it may well be said to be a free school. This school appears by the inquisition to have been founded for the instruction of children and youth in good literature and learning,—terms which, having regard to the early period of the foundation, go far of themselves to shew that it was intended for instruction in the learned languages. In the early documents of 1687 and 1696, relating to the masters of the school, documents in which a true description of the character of the school was most likely to be found, it is called the Free Grammar School. It is uniformly so described in all the proceedings of the trustees from 1701, and in all the leases from 1704, and it appears that in 1756 the trustees not only described the original institution of the school to have been for teaching Latin and Greek, and required payments to be made for instruction in writing and arithmetic, but actually required the under master to enter into a bond conditioned for giving such instruction, a fact which appears to me to be of the utmost importance for determining the character of the school, for of course if it had been the duty of the under master to give such instruction, no such bond could have been required. On the other hand, I see no evidence to prove that the school was not a grammar school, except the equivocal description of it as a free school in the inquisition and in the early leases, and what is said by the witnesses in their depositions, which is of less weight as they admit some payments to have been made, and of course they cannot carry back the evidence to any very early period. Upon the balance of this evidence, I have no hesitation in concluding that this school was a grammar school, and therefore within the jurisdiction of the Court under Sir Eardley Wilmot's Act, and although I apprehend that the Court has the same discretion as to applying that act as it has exercised as to Sir Samuel Romilly's Act, I think that the act having been applied, what has been done under it cannot be wholly disregarded.

It was said, however, on the part of the defendants, that if the Court should be of opinion that the proceedings upon the petition were within the jurisdiction, the case must be considered as concluded: that the orders upon the petition must then have the same effect as decrees of the Court, and could be altered only by a bill of review for error apparent, or upon the discovery of new facts: that it was not competent to the Attorney General to undo his own proceedings, and the case of Hyde v. Edwards was cited as to the effect of proceedings under the acts of parliament creating summary jurisdictions. I most fully agree in that decision, and concur in the general position advanced in the argument upon the part of the defendants, as to the effect of proceedings under such acts of parliament. Where a summary jurisdiction is created by parliament, the intent of the legislature must surely be that the proceedings under it, when resorted to, should have the same force and effect as the proceedings under the ordinary jurisdiction for which it is substituted; but this Court has not in cases of charity acted upon the strict principle by which it is governed in ordinary cases, and I am not prepared to hold that it is not competent to the Attorney General in a charity case to call upon the Court to review a scheme which had been settled under its decree, if he is satisfied that the scheme does not operate beneficially for the charity, and thinks that he can satisfy the Court that the interests of the charity can be better promoted by an altered scheme consistent with the foundation, the usage, and the law. In such a case, I think it is not only competent to the Attorney General, but it is his duty to apply to the Court for an alteration in the scheme. The Court, as I have already had occasion to observe, constantly alters schemes which have been settled under its decree as the changes of times and circumstances may require, and I see no reason why it may not equally alter them under such circumstances as I have pointed out. Lord Cottenham, in The Attorney General v. Bovill, differing from Lord Langdale upon the point, held, that he was not precluded by a decree of Sir William Grant from doing what might be proper to be done for the due regulation of the charity, and I think that in principle that case governs the present upon the point now under consideration. The Attorney General, it must be remembered, acts in these cases on behalf of the Crown as parens patriæ, and represents all the objects of the charity. The Court in these cases cannot look to any right or interest of the relators, but can regard the suit only as instituted by the Attorney General, and all the objects of the charity are thus, in effect, plaintiffs through him,—a consideration which has probably in some degree led to the deviation from the ordinary rules of the court which have occurred in such cases. But although it is thus, in my opinion, competent to the Attorney General to apply to the Court for alterations in schemes which have been settled under its direction, it is obvious, I think, that the Court must proceed upon such application with the utmost possible caution: that what has been done by the Court must not be disturbed except upon the most substantial grounds, and the clearest evidence, not only that the scheme does not operate beneficially, but that it can by alteration be made to do so consistently with the object of the foundation. Incalculable mischief will ensue to all the charities in the kingdom if these rules be not strictly observed, and if the Court ventures in such cases to interfere upon speculative views as to the result of alterations or in matters of discretion or regulation, matters on which the opinion of each succeeding Attorney General and of each succeeding Judge may well be permitted to differ. I consider this case as casting upon me the duty of most carefully guarding myself against being led into adopting, in opposition to what has been already settled by the Court, any mere opinions which I may entertain as to what might be more or less beneficial for this charity. Looking at the evidence in this case, I can entertain no doubt that more boys would resort to this school if the scheme was altered, the scale of education reduced, and the payments for it abolished. But was not this the very question which the Court had to consider when these schemes were settled? It was then a question between perfecting the education of those who were the objects of the foundation and extending the benefit of the foundation to those who were not objects of it, and the Court has exercised its discretion upon the subject. The inhabitants of Kidderminster have heretofore enjoyed a limited education for their children free of charge, or at all events upon a very trifling payment; it has appeared that they were not entitled to it, and they feel, and not unnaturally, disappointed at the discovery, but I cannot alter the foundation for them. I do not indeed see any mode by which the scheme could be altered with any certainty of benefiting them consistently with the regard which the Court is bound to pay to the interests of the primary objects of the foundation; and, I think, it is the duty of the Court to be more than ordinarily cautious in a case like the present where the scheme has been so recently settled, and popular feeling has evidently been excited against it. Regarding, as I do, most of the questions which are raised by this information as questions on which the Court has already exercised its discretion, I should perhaps be justified in giving no opinion upon them, but some of them are of such great importance to all the schools of this description throughout the kingdom that I feel bound to state the opinions which I entertain upon the subject.

As to the case of boarders, this information advances the general position that no boarders ought to be admitted into this school: that position is rested on the ground that the income of the charity is sufficient to provide competent masters for the instruction of the boys, and it is said, that in such cases boarders ought not to be admitted, and the cases of The Attorney General v. the Earl of Devon, and of The Attorney General v. the Earl of Stamford, were cited in support of the position. I do not understand those cases to have laid down a general rule against the admission of boarders in grammar schools, nor do I find any such general rule laid down in any case. In The Attorney General v. the Earl of Devon, the late Vice Chancellor of England appears to have proceeded upon the terms of the endowment, and upon the opinion which he considered to have been expressed by Lord Cottenham in the Manchester School case, that the terms of the endowment of that school precluded the admission of boarders, and accordingly when that case itself came before him on further directions he decided that boarders ought not to be admitted into that school. Whether the late Vice Chancellor rightly construed the endowment in the one case, or rightly collected the opinion of Lord Cottenham in the other, is not for me to decide, and is not indeed material to the present case; but I confess that on very carefully considering the Manchester School case, I am unable to collect from it any such opinion as was considered by the late Vice Chancellor to have been expressed in it. That Lord Cottenham was adverse—most adverse—to the admission of boarders into these schools is clear from his judgment, not only in that case but in many other cases which were referred to in argument, but neither in that case nor any other cases do I find that he prohibited their admission. It is sufficient, however, for the present purpose to observe that the cases which have been cited proceeded upon the construction of particular endowments under particular cases; and that we have here to consider the construction of a different endowment under different circumstances; and I cannot therefore consider them as at all governing the present case. This endowment is for the education of children and youth in Kidderminster; not, as in the Tiverton School case, primarily of children born in the place. What, then, is there to prevent the inhabitants of Kidderminster from taking as boarders boys who may resort to the school for their education; and if it be competent for the inhabitants to do so, why are the masters to be precluded from the same privilege? Lord Eldon, in the Bingley School case, referring to this subject, says, "In the evidence I find no contradiction to the allegation that children boarding with inhabitants of Bingley have been admitted, and that obliges one to consider whether, if you destroy the right of the master to take boarders, you can leave untouched the ancient practice with respect to other persons taking boarders. I think it probable, from the evidence, that the boarders were first introduced at an early period of the mastership of Mr. Hudson. What is the effect of the fact of the master not having taken boarders before that time is a question to be considered by and by; but if, even up to this time the master had received no boarders, there would be considerable difficulty in determining that, for that reason, he should not hereafter be permitted to have them" (3). And although it is true that Lord Eldon there refers to an ancient practice as having existed in that case, the same difficulty appears to me to present itself whether the practice has existed or not. It was said, in argument, that greater favour would of course be extended to the boarders, and that their superior condition in life must prevent association and produce discord in the school, and that those are evils the very danger of which ought to be avoided where the income of the charity is sufficient to maintain competent masters. It is, I think, a sufficient answer to the first objection, that it would be an abuse which the trustees and the Court would be bound instantly to correct; and that, supposing the admission of boarders to be of itself beneficial, it would hardly be refused upon the ground that abuses might arise from it; and to the second objection the answer appears to me to be that inequality of grade must necessarily exist in all these schools, and that if on the one side there be evils there are on the other side great advantages resulting from the admixture of the different classes. This is most admirably expressed by Lord Lyndhurst, in The Attorney General v. the Earl of Stamford, where he sums up that case, and uses this expression: "There is another consideration also connected with these establishments, that they are the avenues by which the humbler classes, by industry, activity and intelligence, can force their way into the highest situations of the state; and by furnishing the means of uniting at an early age the upper and lower classes, they tend to bind together by the strongest ties the whole system of society" (4). The observations which have been made upon the income of the charity being sufficient to maintain competent masters do not, in my opinion, present this case in its true point of view. All the cases establish that it is the duty of the Court to consult to the utmost the interests of the free scholars, the primary object of the testator's bounty; and the question, therefore, as I view it, is not, whether competent masters can be provided for a given income, but by what means the services of superior masters can be secured. It cannot, I think, be doubted that the admission of boarders to the school tends to accomplish this end; and when it is asked that the boarders may be excluded from it, it must be borne in mind that the probable, if not the necessary, consequence will be to lower the standard of the master. I must add, upon this point of the case, that there appears to have been some practice in this school of taking boarders, although to a limited extent only, and abandoned of late years in consequence of the advanced ages of the masters; and that whatever my opinion might have been, I could not, consistently with the authorities, have excluded boarders during the incumbency of Mr. Cockin. I must add, also, that it is the duty of the trustees to take care that the number of boarders admitted be not such as in any manner to affect the admission of free boys or the means of educating them to the best advantage according to the provisions of the scheme. I am of opinion that this part of the information could not, in any view of this case, have been maintained.

I have thought it right to enter more fully into this question as to boarders, because I find on referring to Mr. Carlyle's book 'On Endowed Schools' that there is scarcely one of these grammar schools in which boarders are not received; and I am fearful that great mischief would ensue if any countenance was given to the notion that this Court would exclude them in all cases where the income of the charity was sufficient for the maintenance of the masters: such a determination would, I think, lead to endless questions which could only be determined by this Court, as to what amount was to be considered sufficient for the master's maintenance. No rule laid down for one school could with any justice be applied to another. It would be necessary to consider in each case the position and character of the school.

As to the question raised by the information upon the payments charged to the free scholars, I am of opinion that the information ought as to this also, in my view of the case, to be dismissed. There are also many branches of education provided by this scheme which do not fall within the ordinary range of the instruction which the masters of grammar schools are bound to give; and the income of the charity does not, in my opinion, afford an adequate remuneration for such extended instruction. The number of boarders of course could not be relied on as a provision for this instruction, and I do not see how it could be secured otherwise than by those payments. The question therefore appears to me to have been reduced to this—whether it was desirable that this instruction should be secured? And I am of opinion that it was: for it being necessary to keep up the grammar school, and to retain the superior education afforded by it, I think it could not be otherwise than desirable that that education should be made complete.

As to the minor points respecting the ages and number of the boys, I regard them so entirely as matters of discretion, involving no general principle, that I do not think it necessary to enter into them: and the facts do not raise the question as to the prizes.

There is, however, one question in this case which I feel bound to entertain, regarding it as a question, not of discretion, but of principle,—I mean the question as to the religious qualification of the boys required by this scheme, and as to the other provisions having reference to religious instruction. There is, I think, some reason to suspect that this school was in connexion with the Church of England, but the evidence shews that the usage has been to admit the children of dissenters; and in the absence of any positive evidence confining the benefit of the charity to members of the Church of England, I think the question must be governed by usage, and that the Attorney General therefore is entitled to have this revision removed. I think also that this scheme, having been finally settled in 1848, after the decision in the Warwick School case, ought not to have contained the other provisions as to religious instruction which are inserted in it. The course pursued in the Warwick School case is, in my opinion, by far the best to be adopted, where dissenters are admitted to their schools, as it tends to prevent those feelings of offence which are too apt to arise on such a subject. I shall, therefore, direct that this scheme be reformed according to the precedent of the Warwick School case.

Then, the remaining question raised by the information is as to the exchange. Upon this point I feel no difficulty. It is not alleged that there was any fraud or concealment in the transaction, or that all the requisitions of the act were not duly observed, but it is said that the exchange was for the convenience of the master, and that it was not beneficial to the charity, except upon the footing of boarders being maintained. Those are questions with which, in my opinion, this Court has nothing to do. It was part of the duty of the Commissioners appointed under the act to ascertain whether the exchange was for the permanent benefit of the charity, and it was part of the duty of the Bishop, under the provisions of the act, to review their determination. The Commissioners and the Bishop have determined it to be beneficial, and I am aware of no power which this Court has to reverse their decision. It was said that the Bishop was himself a trustee; but it is not alleged that he had any personal interest in the matter, or that he had in any manner misconducted himself. To hold that the exchange could be affected upon such a ground would be to render the act inoperative in all cases where the Bishop happens to be a trustee of the charity, and this clearly could not have been the intention of the legislature, as the act contains express provisions applicable to the case where the party who takes in exchange happens to be a trustee.

The decree, therefore, which I shall make will be to alter the scheme as to matters of religious qualification and instruction in the mode which I have pointed out, and to dismiss the rest of the information. So far as I dismiss it, I shall dismiss it with costs; as although no just complaint can be made of the pleadings in the cause, I most highly disapprove of charity informations got up by public meetings and supported by public subscription. I think there is just reason to complain of the enormous mass of evidence by which this information has been attempted to be supported, and of the character of some part of that evidence; I allude particularly to the evidence of the surveyors. So far as I give relief upon this information, I give it without costs, being fully satisfied from the conduct of one of these relators that the matter on which the relief is given was not the substantial ground on which this information was filed. I find one of the relators himself objected before the Bishop to the children of dissenters having been admitted to the school. The decree which I shall make will be to have the scheme revised according to the principles of the Warwick School case, and I dismiss the rest of the information, with costs. The defendants will take the extra costs out of the fund.

 Nov. 10; } BLACKET v. LAMB.
 Dec. 1. }

Will—Construction—Election—Appointment—Condition—Precatory Words.

A testator by will disposed of his own property, and then, by virtue of a power in his marriage settlement, appointed the trust property among six of his children, nominatim, in equal shares, and requested them "not to sink into or spend their respective shares, but to leave the same for the benefit of their respective children, and if any of them have no children then to leave the same so that their share may go in the same way as my general estate and effects are limited :"
—Held, that the words formed no part of the appointment; that they were inconsistent with the power; that no trust was raised for the grandchildren; that no case of election arose; and that the children were entitled to their shares absolutely.

This was a special case.

Upon the marriage of George Lamb and Lydia his wife in 1815, a policy of assurance for 3,000*l.*, payable upon the decease of George Lamb, was vested in trustees, who were to stand possessed of the proceeds for the benefit of his wife for life, and after her decease upon trust to pay and transfer the monies unto and amongst all and every or any one or more of the children of George Lamb and Lydia his wife, in such shares as George Lamb should, either by deed or will, appoint.

There were seven children of the marriage: Augustus Lamb, James Lamb, Dorothy Lamb, George Lamb, Eliza, the wife of Charles Buttler, Francis Lamb, and Selina, the wife of Norris Boag.

On the 21st of February 1844, George Lamb made his will, and gave his real and personal estate to John Blacket, Joseph Hadland and William Bell, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, upon trust, to convert certain parts into money, and stand possessed of the money, and other his estate and effects, upon trust, to invest the same and pay the dividends and interest unto his six youngest children, in equal shares; one-sixth to each for their respective lives; the shares of daughters to be for their separate use; and after the decease of any of his children that one-sixth of the capital was to be in trust for his or her child or children then living, and the issue then living of such of his or her child or children as should have died in his or her lifetime, such issue taking per stirpes, if more than one, equally to be divided between them as tenants in common, the income of which and of any accruing share was to be applied to their maintenance during their respective minorities. And in the event of any of his children dying without leaving any such child or children, or issue of such child or children as aforesaid, the testator directed that the interest and dividends of the sixth share of each such of his children so dying should be paid to the survivor and survivors of his children, and the issue of any of his deceased child or children who should have died leaving issue as aforesaid, such issue to take his, her, or their respective parent's share; and that on the death of any surviving children the said accruing share of capital should be divisible amongst his or her child or children and issue of his deceased child or children, in the same way as the original sixth share was made divisible. The testator then recited the settlement made upon his marriage, and in execution of the power vested in him, appointed out of the monies to arise from the policy of assurance, the sum of 150*l.* to each of his seven children, and appointed the residue of the monies to be derived from the policy unto his six children, James Lamb, Dorothy Lamb, George Lamb, Eliza Buttler, Francis Lamb, and Selina Boag, equally to be divided between them in sixth shares, the shares of the daughters to be for their separate use, and said, "I especially request each of my said six children will not sink into or spend their respective shares thereof, but leave the same for the benefit of their respective children; and if any of them have no children, then to leave the same so that their shares may go in the same way as my general estate and effects are hereby limited."

The testator died on the 19th of June 1850; and the will was proved by Joseph Hadland and William Bell, two of the executors only, power for John Blacket to prove being reserved.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Bates appeared for the trustees.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Nalder, for the six children of the testator, contended that the testator, in exercising the power reserved to him by his settlement, had raised several questions;—First, whether an appointment had been made in favour of grandchildren. Secondly, whether they created a trust, and bound the children to elect between the gifts under the will and the appointment under the settlement. Thirdly, whether the words amounted to a condition, without being intended to operate as a portion of the appointment, in which case it would be void, and the children's shares would vest absolutely—Knight v. Boughton (1), Meredith v. Heneage (2), Carver v. Bowles

(1) 11 Cl. & F. 513.

(2) 1 Sim. 542; s. c. 10 Price, 306.

(3), Sale v. Moore (4), Bardswell v. Bardswell (5), Winch v. Brutton (6), White v. Briggs (7), Johnston v. Rowlands (8), Williams v. Williams (9), Lewis v. King (10) and Kampf v. Jones (11). The result, however, seemed to be that the children were entitled to vested interests under the appointment, and that the subsequent words amounted to nothing but a recommendation which possibly he hoped they would attend to; but that if they created a condition, it was inconsistent with the power, and could raise no case of election. It was, therefore, argued that the children were absolutely entitled under the appointment, and that the residuary estate of the testator might be enjoyed by them under the will.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Brodrick, for the grandchildren of the testator, contended that the words of the will created a trust and limited the previous gift—Wynne v. Hawkins (12), Pierson v. Garnet (13), Eade v. Eade (14), Wood v. Cox (15) and Baker v. Mosley (16). The testator, by these words, had imposed an election upon his children, and they must either subject the money arising from the policy to the provisions of the will or give up all claim to the testator's property; and Whistler v. Webster (17) shewed that the rule applied to parties who were not objects of the power. Church v. Kemble (18).

Mr. R. Palmer, in reply.

Dec. 1.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—In carrying out this will of the testator, a doubt has arisen whether the words following the appointment have not imposed upon the children the necessity of electing whether they would take the property of the testator, and subject the settled property to the trusts of his will, and whether a trust has not been created, which equity will either compel the children to carry out in favour of the grandchildren, or if they do not choose to do so, compel them to make compensation to the grandchildren. The testator distinctly recites the terms of the power he was about to execute; it was present in his mind that he could not execute it in favour of his grandchildren, and having disposed of what he thought proper among his children, he made an appointment of what remained, and added those precatory words as a special request. The question to be determined appears to resolve itself into two points: first, whether the words amount to a direct appointment in favour of the grandchildren; if they do, there can be no doubt that a case of election has been raised: but if these precatory words are to be treated as anything short of an actual appointment, that is, if they do not form a part of the actual appointment then they constitute a super-added condition. In this view, the case of Carver v. Bowles is material. It was there held, that if the shares given by the appointment vest absolutely in the children, and the donee of the power in making the appointment adds a condition inconsistent with the power, that condition is absolutely void. This case is similar: the words of condition, therefore, must be treated as if they were not in the will, and it must be declared that the children of the testator are entitled absolutely to the fund the subject of the power, and that they are also entitled for their lives to the income of their shares under the will. The costs must come out of the residue.

Waste—Timber—Money in Court—Accumulations, Right to—Settled Estates.

Several persons were entitled successively to life estates in real property limited in strict settlement: they became bankrupt, and their assignees cut down timber left for ornament and shelter. Upon a bill filed on behalf of H. L., the then first tenant in tail in existence, who was an infant, the assignees were ordered to bring the money into court; this, with the accumulations amounted to 26,133l. 2s. 10d. Two of the tenants for life died without issue; H.L. attained twenty-one, and being still the first tenant in tail, and entitled to the first estate of inheritance, he presented a petition for payment to him of the fund and the accumulations: which were ordered to be transferred to him.

John Boldero, by his will, dated the 31st of December 1785, gave and devised certain real estates to trustees for the term of 1,000 years, and subject thereto unto and to the use of his son, Charles Boldero, and his assigns, for life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of the said Charles Boldero successively in tail male; with remainder to the use of his son, William Boldero, and his assigns, for life, without impeachment of waste; with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders; with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of the said William Boldero successively in tail male; with remainder to the use of Henry Lushington, the eldest son of his daughter Hester Lushington, for life, without impeachment of waste; with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders; with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of the said Henry Lushington, successively in tail male; with remainder to Stephen Lushington, the second son of his daughter Hester, for life, without impeachment of waste; with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders; with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of the said Stephen Lushington successively in tail male; with divers remainders over.

NEW SERIES, XXI.—CHANC.

On the 22nd of August 1787, the testator, by a codicil to his will, directed the devisees to uses with all convenient speed after his death, for such time and so long as Charles Boldero should continue unmarried, from time to time to demise and lease the house called Aspeden Hall, with its appurtenances, and his park, called Aspeden Park, and the lands which should happen to be in his own actual occupation at the time of his death, with the household goods, &c. at the most improved yearly rent, for any term not exceeding twelve years, if the said Charles Boldero should so long live and continue unmarried, so as among other things no clause should be contained in such lease empowering such lessees to commit waste, and the testator directed that the rents should be invested and accumulated at compound interest, and laid out in the purchase of freehold or copyhold estates, and settled upon the uses declared by his will.

The testator died shortly after the execution of the codicil, leaving John Boldero his eldest son and heir-at-law, and leaving Charles Boldero, William Boldero, and Henry Lushington the tenants for life of the devised estates.

The testator to the day of his death had carried on the business of a banker in Cornhill in partnership with Charles Boldero, Edward Gale Boldero, and Sir Stephen Lushington, and subsequently thereto the business was continued by the surviving partners and by Henry, afterwards Sir Henry, Lushington, who was admitted a partner in the house.

On the 12th of January 1807, Sir Stephen Lushington died, and the remaining partners admitted Henry Boldero, the son of Edward Gale Boldero, a partner.

On the 2nd of January 1812 a commission of bankruptcy was issued against the firm. They were found bankrupts, and Messrs. Christopher Idle, William Timson, and Joseph Marryat were appointed assignees of the estate and effects.

This suit was instituted on the 11th of March 1813, and it stated that the assignees of the bankrupts had caused all the timber and timber-like trees upon the park and lands at Aspeden to be marked for the purpose of felling, with an intent to sell the same as part of the estate of Charles

Boldero; that the plaintiff was the eldest son of Sir Henry Lushington, and that Charles Boldero and William Boldero had not any issue, and that he, therefore, was the first tenant in tail in esse of the devised estates; and it prayed that the will and codicil of John Boldero might be established, and the trusts performed in respect of the devised real estates and the disposition of the rents; and that the assignees might be restrained from felling any of the timber and other trees then standing upon the premises, and from selling the same.

The assignees, however, pending the proceedings felled the timber, &c. and received the produce of the sale.

On the 22nd of March 1819 the Master, in pursuance of a reference made to him in 1815, certified that all the timber and other trees had been left for the ornament and shelter of the house called Aspeden Hall, and the park, pleasure-grounds, and lands; and that they, and especially the trees in the valley, overlooked by the drawing-room windows of the house, were left by the testator for ornament and shelter.

On the 14th of March 1822 the Master, in pursuance of a reference made to him, on the 26th of July 1819, certified that the removal of the trees felled was not essential to the purpose of ornament or shelter intended by the deviser; and that the timber and other trees cut and sold did not injure or impede the growth of any other trees adjoining, which were so important to the purpose of ornament and shelter, that the removal of such timber, &c. cut was essential to such purposes of ornament and shelter.

Upon these reports the assignees, in pursuance of several orders, paid into court the sum of 6,379*l.* 4*s.*, the amount for which the timber had been sold, to the credit of the cause to an account entitled "The account of timber felled by the assignees of the estate of Messrs. Boldero, Lushington & Co., bankrupts." They also subsequently paid into court to the like account the sum of 2,283*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.*, which was found due for interest upon that sum. Both these sums were laid out, and had ever since accumulated, and now amounted to the sum of 26,133*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*

William Boldero died many years since without having been married, and Charles Boldero, though married, died on the 10th of September 1851, without issue. Sir Henry Lushington was still living, and the plaintiff Henry Lushington having attained twenty-one, as being the person who at the time of the severance of the timber had and still had the first estate of inheritance in the estates, now asked that he might be declared entitled to the 26,133*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* consols, and that the fund might be transferred to him.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Tripp, for the petitioner.—The timber improperly felled was ornamental timber. Had Charles Boldero cut the timber, he could not have taken advantage of his own wrong. The money was retained in court only on account of the infancy of the party entitled to the first-vested estate of inheritance; the property in the timber however vested at the time, and Sir Henry Lushington would have been excluded from taking it; but the case became much stronger as the same assignees were appointed for all the tenants for life, and the cutting the timber related to the whole of their interest.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Goldsmid, for the assignees.—Whenever any infraction of a settlement takes place, equity contents itself by restoring what has been improperly taken from its protection, and again bringing it within the limits laid down by the settlor—The Duke of Leeds v. Lord Amherst (2), Mildmay v. Mildmay (3). If the tenant for life was not entitled to the money which arose from the sale of the timber, it must then form a part of the settled estates, and the interests and accumulations would belong to the tenant for life for the time being, as a part of the income arising from the settled property. It was similar to the case of a tenant for life who had committed a breach of trust by a misapplication of the trust funds; the Court would order it to be restored, but when restored, he would not be deprived of his life estate. It was admitted that the assignees of Sir Henry Lushington were entitled to the income, but it was insisted that they had forfeited their right to the income of this fund, but that was to inflict upon him a wrong done by parties acting as the assignees of Charles Boldero; that, however, would operate unjustly; it would be to enter into the question of penalties, which this Court has no power to enter into.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—In deciding this case I shall consider what would have been the effect if Charles Boldero had himself done this act. Here was a tenant for life, without impeachment of waste, who cut ornamental timber; the Court compelled him to pay the amount for which the timber was sold into court; and, omitting all questions respecting intermediate life estates, the question now is, whether he or the reversioner was entitled to the income of that fund. The equitable doctrine which applies to this and other cases is, that no person shall obtain any advantage by his own wrong. It is manifest that the tenant for life may obtain very considerable advantage from his own wrong, if he were to cut down timber and obtain the interest of the fund and thereby increase his income for life, which would not be the case if the timber were not cut. It has been observed that in all the reported cases it applies to the corpus of the fund; but that I think ought not to vary my judgment, because it depends upon an equitable and just principle. It says no man shall obtain a benefit by his own wrongful act, but he would obtain a benefit if he obtained the interest of the fund; and the cases which lay down the principle as having relation only to the corpus are equally applicable to any species of interest to be derived by reason of his own wilful act. It is then said, that this is a case in which the Court does not act in the way of penalty, but only by way of restitution, and that it would be a penalty upon the tenant for life, inasmuch as he has the advantage of the shade and mast of the timber, and which, if it had not been cut, he would have still enjoyed. The Court deprives him of that, or rather he deprives himself of it, and the Court deprives him of any substitution or remuneration for it. It is his own act. It is also material to bear in mind, that if the timber had not been cut it would have increased in value for the reversioner, but that has been made impossible by the tenant for life having cut it. If, therefore, it was totally impossible for the Court to ascertain what portion of the interest ought to be applied to the timber during the time when the reversion will fall into existence, and that portion which ought to be applied to the mast and shade of the trees which have been cut down, it is the tenant for life who has himself put the Court into that situation and makes it incapable of arriving at such a conclusion. It is not a case in which the Court speaks of the restitution of a fund. The case put, by way of analogy, of a tenant for life selling out the fund, and being compelled to restore it, is not here applicable, because the tenant for life cannot restore the subject-matter.

There may be a great number of cases in which the timber would become of great value when the reversion fell in, and it is impossible for the Court to ascertain what portion of that would have been applied towards the reversioner if the wrongful act had not been committed. And then undoubtedly this takes place, that if the tenant for life has not committed or joined in any wrongful act, and has had nothing at all to do with it, yet he does indirectly gain an advantage, but it is not by reason of any act of his. So if by the act of God, a large quantity of timber is destroyed by a storm, upon an estate, that would be laid out in the purchase of stock, and the interest of the fund would be paid to the successive tenants for life. So, upon the same principle, when there is a decay in timber. There the Court cuts it down, having ascertained that it is for the benefit of all parties: the timber continuing cannot benefit the reversioner in any respect whatever: and having ascertained the fact, the Court orders the interest of the fund to be paid to the tenants for life in succession.

(2) 13 Sim. 459; 14 Sim. 357; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 73.

(3) 4 Bro. C.C. 76.

When, however, the tenant for life has committed the wrongful act which produces the fund, the Court in that case will not allow him to gain any benefit from it; but the reversioner would take the benefit in that case arising from an accretion of the fund instead of an accretion of the timber. Can I look at this in any different point of view if assignees had done it? The assignees stand for these purposes exactly in the same place as the tenants for life; they are bound by the same equities, and are exactly in the same position and the same observations apply, nor am I able to separate the cases, or to distinguish between the cases of Sir Henry Lushington and Charles Boldero. Because, if the two tenants for life had concurred together, and had between themselves agreed that the one in possession should cut the timber, and that they should divide the produce in certain proportions, the Court would have prevented either of the tenants for life from gaining any benefit from the wrongful act which they concurred in performing. Here, they are the assignees of both; and I am not able to find any principle which says, that the assignees must not stand exactly in the same situation as the tenants for life would stand, or be bound by exactly the same equities. If the tenants for life had succeeded in the matter, it might have happened that Charles Boldero might have died immediately afterwards, and that a very long estate for life of Sir Henry Lushington might have accrued, and the whole of the proceeds of that estate might have been applied in payment of the joint creditors. That would have been a great benefit to the creditors of the tenant for life, or, in other words, the tenant for life would have been in exactly the same position as if the wrongful act had been committed by himself alone, and he alone had been the person who had been living during the whole period of time. I cannot separate the characters of the two assignees; they are assignees for the joint creditors of the joint estate, and I consider that I must treat the case exactly in the same point of view as if the two tenants for life, though one was not in possession, had concurred in the wrongful act of cutting the timber. It was suggested, during the hearing, that I should suppose that the commission had been superseded, and I was asked whether the tenant for life, Sir Henry Lushington, who is perfectly innocent in the matter, was to be prejudiced by reason that the assignees had committed this wrongful act. It would be hard if it were to be so, but I do not consider that question at present, because it does not occur before me. But if the question did arise, it is manifest that it would apply just as much to the case of Mr. Charles Boldero's estate, as to that of Sir Henry Lushington, nor can I find anything whatever in the fiduciary character of the assignees, who stand, as far as the tenants for life are concerned in matters of this description, exactly in the same position as the tenants for life; nor can I find anything in their fiduciary relation whatever to prevent their being liable exactly in the same manner as the tenants for life were. This is a wrongful act which they have done. They cannot, nor can the persons for whom they are trustees, gain any advantage by reason of their wrongful act; I am of opinion, therefore, that I must make an order upon the petition, according to the prayer.

Practice—Trustees Relief Act—Transfer.

A transfer of a fund paid into court under the Trustees Relief Act can only be directed by an order made on a petition.

A sum of stock had been transferred into the name of the Accountant General under the Trustees Relief Act in the first-mentioned matter.

It was desired that this sum should be transferred in trust in the above-mentioned cause.

The only question was, whether this could be done on motion, or whether a petition was necessary.

Mr. Lewin, for the application, referred to the 2nd section of the Trustees Relief Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96.

PARKER, V.C. said, that he thought that the application ought to be made by petition, the act not authorizing an application of this kind by motion.

Claim—Foreclosure—Parties—Mortgagees.

Upon a claim by an equitable mortgagee against a mortgagor, asking for a sale, and also that the several other mortgagees might be summoned before the Master, or that a decree might be made to ascertain what mortgages there were, and their priorities, the Court refused the order.

This was a claim by an equitable mortgagee of real estates against the official assignee of the mortgagor alone, to obtain a sale of the estate and payment of the money due. It was admitted that there were subsequent mortgagees.

Mr. Horsey asked for the usual decree, and for a direction to the Master to summon all the mortgagees—18th Order of the 22nd of April 1850 (1); and contended that if this order was not made, the Court would make a decree, directing the Master to inquire what incumbrances there were and their priorities, as the 8th Order of the 22nd of April 1850 provided, and that the only person to be named in the writ of summons as defendant to the suit in the first instance was the person against whom direct relief was claimed.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The relief asked is direct against all the mortgagees. Were I to make the decree, it might affect several absent parties. I think, therefore, that I cannot in the presence of one defendant alone make any such order. The claim may be amended.

Deed—Voluntary Conveyance—Gift—Baron and Feme—Constructive Trust.

G. P. executed a document, which was attested by two witnesses, giving and granting to E. P. his wife a freehold house in which they resided. G. P. afterwards died, without having made any will, and his heiress-at-law brought an action of ejectment to recover the possession of the house and premises from E. P. and obtained a verdict; upon which E. P. filed this bill. Upon a motion to dissolve an injunction which had been obtained,—Held, that the gift was incomplete; that the relationship of trustee and cestui que trust was not created; that this Court would not assist either party, but leave them as it found them; and that the injunction must be dissolved.

George Price, being seised of a messuage, in which he and his wife resided, duly executed the following instrument:—"July 8, 1849.—I hereby certify, that I, George Price, collier, of Whitcroft, in the township of West Dean and county of Gloucester, for and in consideration of the goodwill which I bear towards my wife Esther Price, also of the same place, have given and granted, and do hereby freely give and grant to the said Esther Price, in the presence of my uncle Samuel Price, of the same place, all my land, house, and chattels; and I hereby again declare that I, George Price, have absolutely, and of my own accord, given and granted the same without any manner of condition to the aforesaid Esther Price, and it is her sole and absolute property henceforth for ever. In witness whereof I have this 8th day of July 1849 set my hand and seal." To this document George Price set his mark in the presence of William Tanner and Samuel Price.

The document was delivered to William Tanner, who was requested to take charge of the same for Esther Price.

On the 20th of April 1850 George Price died without having made any will, leaving his wife, the plaintiff, and Emma Price, the only child of his elder brother, his heiress-at-law.

Esther Price continued to hold the hereditaments under the deed-poll, and the defendant Emma Price, by her mother as guardian, brought an action of ejectment to recover possession of the premises, and obtained a verdict. Esther Price then filed this bill, praying that Emma Price might be declared a trustee of the legal estate for the plaintiff, her heirs and assigns, and asking that she might convey the same to the plaintiff, and deliver up the deeds in her possession. It also asked for an injunction to restrain all proceedings at law.

To this bill the defendant put in an answer, and moved to dissolve the injunction which had been obtained.

Mr. Eddis, in support of the motion.—The defendant, instead of putting in an answer, should have demurred to the bill. Had that been done, the defendant could have obtained a decision upon the equitable right. The testator's husband by executing the deed converted himself into a trustee: he had contemplated a permanent provision for his wife, and that was a duty which this Court would execute—Walter v. Hodge (1).

Mr. Sandys, contra.—The testator's widow was a mere volunteer, and had no claim to be put in a better situation than a stranger. The deed contemplated a gift, which was imperfect, and had no legal operation. Effect has been given to imperfect documents in favour of a wife and children; but the policy of the law will not allow a man to deprive himself of everything in favour of his wife, or by that means he might defeat the claims of creditors; the wife, therefore, was a volunteer, and could have no claim under an imperfect deed against her husband or against the right of the heiress-at-law.

Mr. Eddis, in reply.

Dec. 2.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—

It is not disputed that the deed is wholly inoperative at law, but the plaintiff contends that this deed converted the husband into a trustee for the separate use of his wife, and that the heiress-at-law upon his death became also in like manner a trustee for the wife. On the hearing of the case I entertained a strong opinion that the deed in question created no trust which the Court could enforce, and that the heiress-at-law was not converted into a trustee for the wife, but as no cases were cited, I deferred my judgment to look at the authorities. This has confirmed me in my view.

The questions are two: first, whether the gift would have been valid if it was between two strangers; and, secondly, whether its being between husband and wife made any difference. Between strangers this deed would have been inoperative in equity as well as in law; I entertain no doubt on that point. On the other hand, if this deed is a gift, this Court will not convert a gift into a trust. If I were to decide that this deed would be good as between strangers, I should, in truth, be deciding that if a man executes a deed, simply declaring, "I hereby give and grant all my estate to another," and nothing more takes place, this Court would compel the delivery of the estate. This would be contrary to every authority.

The next question is, was this a transaction between husband and wife which the Court would carry out? A deed was executed for the benefit of the wife, it was intended to be for her separate use: do these circumstances give the transaction a different character from that which it would have had, if it had been one between strangers? Was there a trust created? In other words, could the wife, during the life of her husband, have maintained a bill in this court, by her next friend, against her husband, for the rents for her separate use? I am of opinion that no such suit could have been maintained. In Ex parte Dubost (2) Lord Eldon said, "It is clear that this Court will not assist a volunteer; yet, if the act is completed, though voluntary, the Court will act upon it. It has been decided, that upon an agreement to transfer stock this Court will not interpose; but if the party had declared himself to be the trustee of that stock, it becomes the property of the cestui que trust without more, and the Court will act upon it," but that would not be the case where a gift was intended. The obligee of a bond five days before her death, by a memorandum indorsed upon the bond, purporting to be an assignment without consideration to a person to whom the bond was at the same time delivered, was held to be an incomplete gift, and, as it was without consideration, that the Court could not give it effect—Edwards v. Jones (3) Meek v. Kettlewell (4). In this case there was no declaration of trust; it was either a gift, or it was inoperative, and the rule of this Court was, that it would not aid a volunteer to carry an imperfect gift into effect—Colman v. Sarrel (5), Sloane v. Cadogan (6), Holloway v. Headington (7) and Jefferys v. Jefferys (8). I am, therefore, of opinion that the relation of trustee and cestui que trust was not created in this case; that the whole was an imperfect gift, and that the transaction was one, in which equity will not interfere to assist either party, but will leave them as it found them, and that consequently this injunction must be dissolved.

Legacy—Lapse—Residuary Estate—Joint Bequest—Survivorship—Implication.

A testatrix gave her residuary estate, after the death of three persons, upon trust to pay and assign it equally between G.B. and E.B., their executors, administrators and assigns; but if neither of them should be living at the death of the survivor of the tenants for life, she gave the same to F. H. G. B. died in the lifetime of the testatrix, but E. B. survived the tenants for life:—Held, that the gift lapsed as to a moiety of the residuary estate; that no joint estate was created between G. B. and E. B.; that no right by survivorship arose by implication; that the event had not happened upon which the gift over was to take effect; and that one moiety of the residuary estate was undisposed of and belonged to the next-of-kin of the testatrix, and that the costs must be paid out of her estate.

This was a special case under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35.

Sweetenham Waters, by her will, dated in 1818, gave her residuary personal estate in trust for three persons for life, with survivorship, and after the decease of the survivor upon trusts, which were expressed as follows:—"Upon trust to pay, assign, or transfer the whole of the said stocks, funds, government securities, and all interest due thereon, unto and to the use of and equally between George Baxter and Eliza Baxter, children of my sister Ann Baxter, their executors, administrators and assigns, absolutely for ever; but in case it shall happen that the said George Baxter and Eliza Baxter shall neither of them be living at the time of the death of the survivor of the said [three tenants for life] then I give and bequeath the same to Francis Hutchinson, of Newcastle, if he shall be then living."

George Baxter died in 1821, in the lifetime of the testatrix.

The testatrix died in 1822.

Mr. Stratton, for the plaintiff.—The questions for consideration under this will are, whether Eliza Baxter, having survived her brother George, is entitled to the whole of the residuary estate; and if not, whether one moiety does not belong to the legal personal representatives of the next-of-kin of the testatrix. As to one moiety, there is little or no difficulty; but as to the other, it is submitted, that the legatees became entitled, under a joint-tenancy; or otherwise by a necessary implication, as by the limitation over, the testatrix contemplated a survivorship between George and Eliza Baxter, which was equivalent to creating a joint tenancy, especially as the gift over to Francis Hutchinson was in the event of both being dead at the death of the last tenant for life.

Mr. Toller, for the defendants, was not heard.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The Court can only put a construction upon the words of the will; it cannot make a will for the testatrix, or take into consideration whether she would have deemed it prudent to make such a disposition of her property, had she foreseen the events that have taken place. She gave her residuary personal estate to three persons, and the survivor for life. She proceeds, "and from and after their decease the stock shall be paid and transferred to George Baxter and Eliza Baxter, absolutely," with a limitation over in case of their deaths before that of the survivor of the tenants for life. George Baxter died before the testatrix; his share, therefore, lapsed, and remained undisposed of. The bequest was to the two as tenants in common; cases, however, have been referred to, in which, notwithstanding words creating a tenancy in common, a joint-tenancy, or what was equivalent to a joint tenancy, was considered to have arisen. A tenancy in common may be created between two persons, and words may be added declaring that on the death of one, his interest should pass to the other. That would, in some respects be similar to a joint-tenancy, but I know of no case in which the words "equally between" have created anything else than a tenancy in common; and that was the interest which these parties would have taken; but as one of them died in the lifetime of the testatrix, that share had lapsed, and being a moiety of a residuary estate, it did not fall into the residuary estate, but was undisposed of, and passed to the next-of-kin of the testatrix. But the will contained a gift over to Francis Hutchinson in the event of the death of George Baxter and Eliza Baxter, in the lifetime of the tenants for life. If any was wanted, Scott v. Bargeman was a direct authority to shew that a gift over could not take effect unless the event upon which the property was to go over happened. There a man, having a wife and three daughters, bequeathed 900*l.* to the three daughters equally, payable at their respective ages of twenty-one, or marriage, and if all should die before their legacies became payable, then the whole was to go to the mother. Two of the daughters died before their shares became due, and the surviving daughter was held entitled to the whole. In this case the event, on which the gift was to take effect, has not happened; neither are there any words by which Eliza Baxter can be considered as taking by implication. There are cases upon the subject, but no general rule has proceeded from them; every case must, therefore, depend upon the whole of the words used taken together: and in this case I consider that Eliza Baxter is entitled to one moiety of the fund, and that the next-of-kin of the testatrix are entitled to the other. The costs must be paid out of the estate.

Baron and Feme—Feme Covert—Next Friend—Security for Costs.

A married woman cannot be allowed to sue by a next friend who is incapable of giving security for costs.

In this case a motion was made, on behalf of the defendant, that the next friend of the plaintiff, who was a married woman, might be ordered to give security for costs. The next friend was the husband of the plaintiff's aunt, and it was in evidence that he was a labourer; that he lived in a house the rent of which was only 2l. 10s. per annum, and that he was not of ability to pay the costs.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Glasse appeared in support of the motion.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Renshaw, in opposition to the motion, said the plaintiff was herself a poor woman, and it was very natural that she should be unable to procure any one but a poor man to be her next friend. It was true that this man was a labourer, but he had sworn that he did not owe 5l. The Court would not allow a married woman to sue without a next friend, but if a woman in this rank of life was compelled to obtain a rich man to be her next friend, it would virtually be a denial of justice. It was not necessary that a next friend should be a person capable of giving security for costs. The question was simply whether a woman was to be precluded from suing because she could find no next friend who was satisfactory to the defendant.

her relation whom she appointed her next friend was incapable of paying the costs, in that case she would be suing in velvet; she would be putting a poor man forward who could not be made liable, and thereby save herself. The cases which have been cited relate to the next friend of an infant. Now, I see a great distinction between the next friend of a married woman and the next friend of an infant. Any one may sue for an infant without giving security. In that case it is the suit of the next friend; but with regard to a married woman it is mere machinery; the suit is hers, and there would be great danger in allowing her to sue by an insolvent person. In this case it is the same thing, for it is sworn that this man is a labourer out of work, and lives in a house of 2l. 10s. per annum. I cannot look at the relationship. If she were in a position to sue in forma pauperis that would be different, but otherwise she must abide by the practice of the Court; and it appears to me I am bound by the authorities, particularly that of Drinan v. Mannix, decided by Sir E. Sugden, to direct that the usual security should be entered into. The costs of this application to be costs in the cause.

June 11, 16. } NAVULSHAW v. BROWN-RIGG.

Principal and Agent—Factors' Acts—Validity of Pledges.

The plaintiff consigned goods to a Liverpool merchant for sale, and drew bills upon him to the amount of the value of the goods. The Liverpool merchant then handed the goods to his London agent to be sold, and drew bills upon him, as an advance, upon account of the goods. The London agent accepted the bills, having notice that they were consigned by the plaintiff for sale. The Liverpool merchant became insolvent, and the bills drawn upon him by the plaintiff were not paid. The London agent sold the goods to recoup himself the amount of the bills drawn upon him by the Liverpool merchant. The plaintiff then filed a bill against both firms for an account, alleging collusion, and praying that the London agent might be decreed to pay him the amount produced by the sale of the goods:—Held, that the Factors Acts applied to cases where goods were pledged; that there was no mala fides in this transaction, and that it was one expressly intended to be protected by the acts.

Held also, that a bill for an account by a principal against his agent cannot be sustained in equity where the transaction is a single transaction, and not tainted with fraud, the plaintiff in such case having his remedy by an action at law. Bill dismissed, with costs.

In this case the plaintiff was a merchant resident in India, and in the month of March 1847 he consigned two boxes of pearls to the defendants, Messrs. Brownrigg & Co., who were merchants at Liverpool, and drew bills for 2,466*l.* on them, which they accepted. On the 26th of May the pearls having arrived, the defendants sent them to their London agents, Messrs. Collett & Co., for the purpose of ascertaining their value, and they valued them at 2,050*l.* Messrs. Brownrigg & Co. then directed Messrs. Collett & Co. to sell the pearls, and drew bills on them for 2,000*l.*, which they accepted. In June following Messrs. Brownrigg & Co. sent the invoice of the pearls, signed by the plaintiff, to Messrs. Collett & Co., which was the first intimation they received of the pearls being the same as Messrs. Brownrigg & Co. had some months previously advised them of, nor were they aware of the fact of Messrs. Brownrigg & Co. having accepted bills upon the pearls. In July 1847 the pearls were put up to auction by Messrs. Collett & Co., but the greater portion were bought in; 320*l.* worth only being sold. On the 28th of August the bill for 2,000*l.* accepted by Messrs. Collett & Co. became due, and Messrs. Collett & Co., at the request of Messrs. Brownrigg & Co., who did not find it convenient to meet it, accepted a bill for 1,680*l.* which Messrs. Brownrigg & Co. procured to be discounted; and when that bill became due, the same course was pursued, the original object being to make up the 2,000*l.* In November the defendants became insolvent, and Messrs. Collett & Co. were obliged to pay the holders of the 1,680*l.* bill. The bills drawn upon Messrs. Brownrigg & Co. and accepted by them were dishonoured, except one. The plaintiff having sent a power of attorney to Messrs. Forbes & Co. to receive the pearls, they on the 4th of March 1848 applied to Messrs. Brownrigg & Co. for them, and they, three days subsequently returned for answer that they were in the hands of Messrs. Collett & Co., to whom Messrs. Brownrigg & Co. were indebted. This produced a correspondence, in which it appeared that Messrs. Collett & Co. had sold the residue of the pearls for 1,300*l.*, after the plaintiff had sent the power of attorney to Messrs. Forbes & Co. The plaintiff's solicitor then wrote to Messrs. Collett & Co. on the subject, and they replied, that having accepted bills on the pearls, they had placed the proceeds against such claim. The plaintiff then filed the present bill for an account, and for the payment of the money produced by the sale of the pearls; the bill likewise charged fraud against the defendants in the transaction.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Lewis, for the plaintiff, contended that Messrs. Collett & Co. had notice that Messrs. Brownrigg & Co. were only the agents for the sale of the pearls, by the inquiry previously made, and before the acceptance by them of the bills for 1,680*l.* distinct notice being given by the invoice. The sale of the remainder taking place immediately after, or indeed during the correspondence with Messrs. Forbes & Co. on the plaintiff's behalf, made it clear that there was collusion between Brownrigg & Co. and Collett & Co., and that the whole transaction was mala fide. This gave the plaintiff a right to proceed in equity, and file a bill against his agent also for an account. By the 4 Geo. 4. c. 83, the 6 Geo. 4. c. 94. and the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39. validity was given to contracts with an agent, notwithstanding the purchaser was aware of that fact, and the last act gave the same validity to pledges as were given to sales by the two former. But this only applied to bona fide transactions without notice of the absence of due authority. The words of the preamble of the latter act were these: "Provided such contract or payment be made in the usual and ordinary course of business, and that such person shall not, when such contract is entered into or payment made, have notice that such agent is not authorized to sell the same, or to receive the said purchase-money." Then followed an extension of the validity theretofore given to sales, to pledges also, but the advances and exchange of securities were to be bond fide. By the 3rd section it was enacted, that the act should be deemed to give validity to such contracts and agreements only, and to protect only such loans, advances, and exchanges, as should be made bond fide, and without notice that the agent making such contracts or agreements had not authority to make the same, or was acting malâ fide in respect thereof against the owner of such goods and merchandise; and nothing in the act contained should be construed to extend to or protect any lien or pledge for or in respect of any antecedent debt owing from any agent to any person with or to whom such lien or pledge should be given, nor to authorize any agent intrusted as aforesaid in deviating from any express orders or authority received from the owner; but that, for protecting all such bond fide loans, advances, and exchanges (though made with notice of such agent not being the owner, but without any notice of the agent's acting without authority) and to no other purpose, such contract, &c. should be binding on the owner, and those interested in the goods.

Mr. Malins and Mr. C. Hall appeared for Messrs. Brownrigg & Co.

Mr. James Parker, Mr. Rolt and Mr. Goldsmid appeared for Messrs. Collett & Co., and a large mass of evidence was read to shew that Messrs. Collett & Co. had acted bond fide, and in perfect ignorance of the want of authority to pledge, or of the actual ownership of the pearls.

Mr. Bethell was heard in reply.

LORD CRANWORTH, V.C.—I feel myself warranted in giving my judgment immediately upon this case, although it is an important one, because, as a good many days have elapsed since the matter was first considered, I have had the opportunity of turning it in my mind, and I confess I arrive at the conclusion without any doubt upon the subject. In my opinion the plaintiff wholly fails to make out any title to relief whatever. I should quite go along with the view that has been pressed upon the Court for the plaintiff, if I adopted that which is the main foundation on which the argument rests, namely, that there is any inconsistency in the fact of goods being deposited with a factor for sale, and his having authority to pledge; I see no such inconsistency. I think that there was probably that which would have satisfied me that there was notice before the bill for 2,000*l.* was accepted, that the goods were in the hands of Messrs. Brownrigg & Co. for sale; I do not make up my mind upon that, because it does not appear to me to be very important. I think that whether there was notice or not before the first transaction, there certainly was before the subsequent transactions. And one part of the opinion I had formed I confess the plaintiff's counsel has a good deal shaken me about, namely, whether it would necessarily follow that if the transaction was sustainable as to the 2,000*l.*, it was also sustainable as to the 1,680*l.* I give no opinion upon that subject, for this reason: it appears to me that there was no notice whatever that could by reasonable intentment lead Messrs. Collett & Co. to suppose that Brownrigg & Co. had not authority to pledge before they accepted the bill for 2,000*l.*, or either of the bills for 1,680*l.* There certainly, as to the two last, was distinct notice that they were agents for sale, but in my opinion that does not give them anything like notice that they had not authority to pledge; and I come to that conclusion for this reason—I believe that I should be putting upon this act a conclusion totally different from that which the legislature intended, if I were to hold that it meant to deal with two classes of deposits by the owners of goods with factors in London or other places; namely, one an authority to sell, and another an authority to pledge. I believe that it is a very rare transaction indeed to consign goods to a party merely that they may pledge them; it is not the course of dealing at all.

What was in the habit of taking place was this: goods were consigned to factors for sale, the factors then became largely in advance to the owners of the goods, and before the act authorized it they used to recoup themselves as well as they could by pledging. These were not valid transactions; there was no authority by law to do so. To meet that case this statute was passed, and in my opinion, when the act speaks of the ordinary practice, what is meant is the ordinary practice of parties having goods for sale raising money upon them by deposits. The act says, "whereas advances on the security of goods and merchandise have become an usual and ordinary course of business, and it is expedient and necessary that reasonable and safer facilities should be afforded thereto, and that the same protection and validity should be extended to bond fide advances upon goods and merchandise as by the said recited act is given to sales, and that owners intrusting agents with the possession of goods should be bound by a contract of pledge for any advances bond fide made on the security thereof"—then these enactments are made.

Now the transaction that gives rise to the present suit is this. The plaintiff consigns to Brownrigg & Co. a shipment of pearls; the moment he consigns them, he draws for 2,400*l.*,—and I say the moment, because it is quite clear that bills to that amount had been accepted before the 2,000*l.* was accepted by Collett & Co.; it is so stated. Therefore the position of Brownrigg & Co. was this: they had in their hands pearls to be sold for Navulshaw; they had rendered themselves liable to the amount of 2,400*l.* supposed to be something within what would be produced by the sale of pearls; in this state of things they, not being themselves parties to sell the pearls, send them in due and regular course of business to Messrs. Collett & Co. that they might do what was regular, and thereupon Messrs. Collett & Co. having got them, make the advances. Now, in my opinion (and if I am wrong in that, I am quite wrong throughout), that is the very case which this statute was meant to meet. The party had rendered himself liable,—it is true that he had not paid it, and it turned out afterwards that he became insolvent, and therefore never did pay this 2,400*l.*,—but he had rendered himself liable for that sum; therefore, putting the goods into the hands of the party who is to sell and receive the proceeds, he gets what is, in fact, an advance to him on account of these goods. In my opinion that was the precise case which the statute was meant to meet; therefore if I am right in that view of the case there is nothing of mala fides in it; there is notice that the party held these goods for sale, that is, notice that he was a factor; every factor holds them for sale, at least, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred. Goods put into the hands of factors are put into their hands for the purpose of sale, not for the purpose of raising money by way of pledge or deposit. He knows they are to be sold, and the party who puts them into his hands raises money upon them, which I conceive to be a raising of money protected by this statute; consequently there was nothing like fraud or mala fides in the transaction from the beginning to the end. I have already stated that I am inclined to think there was sufficient notice to fix Messrs. Collett & Co. before they accepted the 2,000*l.* bill, with the knowledge that these were pearls of a merchant in India to be sold. It is true that it was not stated they were the same, but there was quite enough to put them upon inquiry; therefore if the plaintiff's case depended on whether Messrs. Collett & Co. knew the goods were in the hands of Brownrigg & Co. for sale, I think the original vice would taint the whole transaction; but as I think there was no vice in it, it does not appear to me that I need go into the question of what is the effect upon the other bills; because there is no doubt that afterwards, before the other bills were accepted, there was notice. As I am of opinion there was no mala fides, that inquiry, therefore, becomes unimportant.

That being so, the only other question is, whether there is a case for an account. What was argued was that there was a case for an account independent of this transaction, for that Messrs. Brownrigg & Co. either alone or with Messrs. Collett & Co. were agents; and that this Court gives relief in the suit of a principal against his agent. If there had been anything of fraud that certainly would have been so; but, although it is said that this Court gives relief where a principal is proceeding against his agent, I think, upon all the authorities,—I do not mean merely the one or two handed up to me, but the text books and many other authorities if one were to search the books,—that that proposition must depend upon this, that it is a question not capable of being conveniently inquired into in a court of law. But this is really only one single transaction. Mr. Navulshaw sends a box of pearls or two boxes of pearls to Brownrigg & Co. to sell them. They have sold them, and there is nothing in the evidence to shew they have not sold them fairly. Probably they were to sell, either by public auction or private sale, as they thought best. They were put up to public auction, and only a portion of them were sold. Afterwards they did their best with the rest, and realized all that it was possible to realize. Therefore it is money had and received by them to the use of Navulshaw, and may be recovered in an action at law. Upon that ground also I think that the bill fails; and the consequence is, that the bill as against both sets of defendants must be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Bethell then submitted, on the question of costs, that there had been separate answers put in by every member of the firm of Brownrigg & Co., and there were several of them in partnership together.

Mr. Hall said, the plaintiff had been applied to, to waive the oath of the messenger, which he would not do, and it therefore became necessary to put in separate answers in consequence of the parties living in different parts of the country, one living in Devonshire, one in Scotland, and one in Liverpool.

LORD CRANWORTH, V. C.—These are most disagreeable questions to deal with. Undoubtedly, where parties put in three answers where one would suffice, it looks very like incurring unnecessary expense, unless there is something to justify it. All I can do is to dismiss the bill, with costs; and with regard to the costs of the defendants who have put in separate answers, let the taxing Master inquire whether it was necessary that there should have been more than one answer, and he will deal with the case accordingly.

LD. CRANWORTH, { PRESTON & THE LIVER-
V. C. { POOL, MANCHESTER, 1851. { AND NEWCASTLE-UP-
June 7, 26. { ON TYNE JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway Company—Specific Performance of Agreement—Residential Injury.

The plaintiff agreed with a railway company that, on the following conditions, he would assent to the railway being made through his property:—that if the company should obtain their act they should pay him 1,000*l.* for all lands required for making the railway, and the further sum of 4,000*l.* for residential injury to the estate and hall of the plaintiff. The company amalgamated with another company, who formed the railway in another direction and did not pass through the plaintiff's property:—Held, upon demurrer to a bill for specific performance of the agreement, that there was sufficient evidence to shew that the defendants represented the persons who originally contracted with the plaintiff, and although no land was taken in pursuance of the agreement, the defendants were bound to pay the 4,000*l.* which must be considered as agreed to be paid for the plaintiff's assent to the undertaking.

This bill was filed by Mr. Cooper Preston, of Flasby Hall, in Yorkshire, against the above company for specific performance of an agreement, dated in February 1846, which was to the following effect: "It is agreed that, on the following conditions, the said Cooper Preston will and does assent to the railway being made through his property at Flasby, as laid down in the deposited plans of the company: first, that in case the company shall in this or any subsequent session obtain an act of incorporation, the said company shall pay to the said Cooper Preston, his heirs and assigns, the sum of 1,000*l.* for all lands required by the company for the due making of the railway, and the further sum of 4,000*l.* for residential injury to the estate and hall of the said Cooper Preston." It was also agreed that the charges of the plaintiff's solicitor should be paid, and the sum of 25*l.* for his personal expenses. It appeared that when the agreement was entered into there were two companies proposing to make the line in contemplation, and the company with which the plaintiff contracted, which was entitled the Lancashire and North Yorkshire Railway Company, represented by two persons named Harper and Yates, amalgamated with another set of persons, by whom the undertaking was eventually carried out, the latter persons taking upon themselves the whole of the liabilities entered into by both parties. It also appeared that the company had given the plaintiff the usual notice of their intention to enter upon his land and take surveys and levels, and that they had entered in pursuance of the notice and staked out the land according to the agreement. This company obtained their act, but having subsequently become amalgamated with the company under whose name they were now sued, the line originally intended to be taken was given up and another adopted, so that they had not occasion to pass through or take any portion of the plaintiff's land, and therefore refused to pay the 4,000*l.* mentioned in the agreement or to perform it in any way. The plaintiff then filed his bill stating the above facts, and more particularly communications with him and his solicitor on the part of the company, whereby the agreement in question was clearly recognized and referred to, and charging that it was binding upon them and ought to be performed; that the withdrawal of his opposition to the bill was obtained upon the faith of the performance of the agreement, the failure of which would be a fraud upon him. That the railway was in progress, and that the company had obtained an extension of time for compulsory purchases, which had not yet expired. The bill then prayed a declaration that the agreement might be declared binding upon the company, and that they might be decreed to pay the sums of 1,000*l.* and 4,000*l.* therein agreed to be paid, and the expenses of the plaintiff's solicitor, and to enter into possession of the land.

The case came on upon a demurrer for want of equity put in by the railway company.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Humphreys, in support of the demurrer, contended, that the company was not bound to fulfil the agreement. The persons with whom the plaintiff contracted failed to obtain their act of parliament, and the undertaking was carried out by another set of persons. The line did not pass through the plaintiff's land, and therefore no damage was done to him or his property, and the company could not be compelled to pay him compensation for an injury which he had not suffered, nor for land which was not required. It was true that notice had been served upon the plaintiff of the intention of the company to enter upon his land, but this was merely the usual entry for surveying and taking levels—

Simpson v. Lord Howden, 3 Myl. & Cr. 97; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 315.

The Solicitor General, Mr. Southgate and Mr. Preston, for the plaintiff, contended, that the company ought to pay the 4,000*l.* mentioned in the agreement, whether they took the land or not, that sum being partly intended to secure the plaintiff's assent to the act of parliament which the promoters of the undertaking were seeking to obtain. The present company represented those who contracted with the plaintiff to all intents and purposes, and were as much bound as the actual parties to that agreement themselves.

LORD CRANWORTH, V.C.—This was a bill filed to enforce, against the defendants, the Liverpool, Manchester and Newcastle-upon-Tyne Junction Railway Company, an agreement, dated the 5th of February 1846, between the plaintiff and two gentlemen named Harper and Yates. It appears by the bill, that in 1845 Harper and Yates and others projected a railway to be called the Lancashire and North Yorkshire Railway, and required lands of the plaintiff, and that line was intended to pass near his residence of Flaasby Hall. In 1846 they introduced a bill into parliament to make this railway and the plaintiff prepared to oppose it, and in order to avert the plaintiff's opposition, the agreement in question was entered into. In the same session certain other persons introduced a bill into parliament for a rival line, to be called the Liverpool, Manchester and Newcastle Junction, and a third set of proprietors introduced another bill for another rival line, to be called the Northumberland and Lancashire Junction Railway Company, but nothing turns upon that third line. The first two sets of projectors agreed to unite and form a line, to follow the line, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, of the Lancashire and North Yorkshire Railway, and they expressly agreed to adopt the contract of the 5th of February 1846, on the faith of which the plaintiff withdrew his opposition. All this appears on the bill. On the 26th of June 1846 the act passed, for incorporating the company by the name of the Liverpool, Manchester and Newcastle-upon-Tyne Junction Railway Company. The books deposited with the clerk of the peace and referred to in the act enumerate several fields of the plaintiff's through which the line was to pass. The defendants, after the passing, set out the line over the plaintiff's lands, and gave notice that they should require the same; but they have never taken possession thereof, though the plaintiff has always been ready to give up the same. The object of the present bill is to enforce performance of the agreement and to obtain payment of the 1,000*l.* and 4,000*l.* The plaintiff says that the contract of Harper and Yates is binding in equity on the defendants. The doctrine of the Court is that where projectors of a company enter into contracts on behalf of a body not then existing but afterwards called into being, if so coming into existence they take the benefit of that contract, they cannot do so without performing that part of it which such projectors undertook to perform, that is, the Court treats such projectors as agents of the company so afterwards called into existence. The plaintiff says that according to this doctrine, the agreement is binding on the defendants. The defendants object on two grounds: first, that they are not the parties for whom Harper and Yates were acting; and secondly, that they did not take the benefit of the contract.

First, I think the defendants clearly are the parties, within the principle of the rule of equity, on whose behalf Harper and Yates must be taken to have made the contract. It is true it was originally made on behalf of a different body, but the promoters of the two rival lines afterwards coalesced and agreed to concur in obtaining an act for a line which should adopt that part of the line which traversed the plaintiff's land, and for that purpose adopt (inter alia) the contract of Harper and Yates, and the plaintiff on the faith of that withdrew his opposition, and I think this puts matters in exactly the same position as if the contract had been between the plaintiff of the one part and Harper and Yates as agents for the company which was afterwards amalgamated, that is, the defendants, of the other part. The same persons who agreed with him as projectors obtained the act; it is true others concurred with them, and the name of the company was changed, but as far as the plaintiff was concerned that made no difference; and then the united projectors adopted the original contract. I think this clearly entitled the plaintiff to look to the defendants as the parties liable to him. The case of Stanley v. the Chester and Birkenhead Railway Company is directly in point, if authority is necessary.

The real difficulty is on the second point, whether the defendants have taken the benefit of the contract. This depends upon its construction. If the meaning of the contract is, that in consideration of the plaintiff assenting to the bill, the defendants, on obtaining their act, were to pay him 1,000*l.* and 4,000*l.*, they have had the benefit of the contract, for they have bought off the plaintiff's opposition. If the meaning is, that in case the defendants should obtain their act, and also require the plaintiff's land, the plaintiff should sell to them what they might require at the price and on the terms stipulated in the contract, then the defendants have not the benefit of the contract, for they have taken no lands. But I think that this is not the meaning. It could hardly be that if the company took anything, however small, they were to pay 5,000*l.*; they were to pay 5,000*l.* as the consideration for what they took, otherwise nothing: whereas there is no inconsistency in supposing that the defendants agreed to pay the 5,000*l.* in case the act passed, in consideration of the plaintiff's consent, and as the price of the land required. The language, it is true, is not precisely the same as in the late case of Bland v. Crowley (1), in the Exchequer, but in substance it means the consideration to be in part the consent of the landholder to the passing of the act. The value of the assent could not be nicely calculated. There was, therefore nothing anomalous in fixing a sum, including matter of lesser moment, namely, the price of the land through which the railway was to pass, whether for that purpose more or less might be required. But it could hardly have been intended that, without reference to the advantage of obtaining the plaintiff's assent to the bill, the company should before they got their act have stipulated to pay 5,000*l.* for any portion of the plaintiff's land, whether the quantity was small or to the whole extent on the map; but if, instead of taking any of his land they should just go on the boundary and create just as much annoyance to him, they should pay nothing. This could not, I think, have been intended. The contract, therefore, must be read as a contract to pay 1,000*l.* and 4,000*l.* as the price of the plaintiff's assent and of so much of his land as should be required for the time, including compensation for what is called residential injury. It follows, therefore, that the demurrer must be overruled. The defendants are bound by the contract of Harper and Yates, and have in part had the benefit of it.

But the question on the contract is a mere legal one, and therefore I shall not overrule the demurrer without giving the defendants the opportunity, if they wish it, of taking the opinion of a court of law. If I am right in my construction of the contract, the plaintiff has a present right of action against Harper and Yates. I do not mean that an action should be brought, but that a case should be stated, the question being, whether, the act having passed, and the defendants having done the acts stated in the bill, the plaintiff has any present right of action against Harper and Yates. On this view of the contract, I am not obliged to decide on the question of the solicitor's bill, for there is no averment of the account, delivery, or refusal to pay: this was essential. The statute requires the delivery of a signed bill; but it would be oppressive to hold parties liable to pay costs, a bill for which has not been delivered.

It was then agreed that a case should be taken to the Court of Queen's Bench, and his Lordship's order for overruling the demurrer was suspended until the decision at law should be known.

Nov. 8, 10. } CREASOR v. ROBINSON.

Administrator de son tort—Assets—Debt—Intestate Debtor—Personal Representative—Party.

The widow of a deceased debtor, without taking out letters of administration, got in all the assets of her husband and compounded with his creditors. Upon a claim by a creditor to obtain payment of a debt due to him in full,—Held, that a legal personal representative of the intestate ought to be made a party, and leave was given to amend.

This was a claim by William Creasor against Mary the widow of John Robinson to obtain payment of principal and interest upon a debt of 31*l.* 2*s.* and 9*l.* 16*s.* for costs of an action.

John Robinson, saddler, died intestate in August 1849, indebted. His widow, without taking out letters of administration to her husband, called his creditors together, and with their approbation got in the whole of her husband's estate with the exception of a few small sums, and applied the proceeds towards the satisfaction of his debts. William Creasor was a creditor of the deceased upon a bill of exchange dated the 22nd of May 1849, for 20*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.*, and he was also a creditor for a further sum of 10*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* for goods sold and delivered, making together the 31*l.* 2*s.* for which he brought an action against the defendant Mary Robinson, who pleaded plene administravit; but without joining issue William Creasor signed judgment against Mary Robinson in respect of assets of her husband quando acciderint as to the rest of the declaration; and he then filed this claim.

Mr. Osler, for Mary Robinson, objected that the proceeding was imperfect as there was no personal representative of John Robinson before the Court.

Mr. Martindale, for the plaintiff, contended that this claim was filed against an administratrix de son tort. She admitted having got in assets, and having placed herself in an accountable position, she could not now object to the responsibility of the character she had assumed, and insist upon the legal appointment of a personal representative. She was the party entitled to take out the letters of administration, and as she had acted as administratrix and received and disposed of the property of the deceased, she was liable to account, and it was not necessary to bring any other party before the Court—Dan. Chanc. Prac. 421, 1st ed. In Cleland v. Cleland (1) an objection was taken for want of parties on the ground that there was no administrator before the Court, but it was overruled, because the widow of the deceased, who was the person by law entitled to the administration, and who had possessed herself of her husband's personal estate, and disposed of it, was a party, though, by her answer, she denied having taken out administration, which the bill alleged she had done. In this case the plaintiff asked for payment out of the assets, and as it was admitted that assets had been received, the defendant was liable to account for the money.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I am not prepared to follow the case of Cleland v.

Cleland; I do not consider it the practice; and I shall decline to make a decree in respect of the assets received only; I will, however, look to the authorities.

Nov. 10.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I have looked at the cases, but I do not find any in support of the plaintiff's claim except the one cited, and upon that alone I cannot make the order asked, especially as Tyler v. Bell (2), Humphreys v. Humphreys (3), Madox v. Jackson (4), and the general stream of authorities require that a personal representative should be before the Court, and differ from that cited. The plaintiff, however, may amend the claim—Eccles v. Cheyne (5).

MULLOCK v. JENKINS.

Benefit Building Societies—Purchaser—Agent—Real Estate—Illegal Contract—Investment of Money—Jurisdiction.

The trustees of a benefit building society having, through a shareholder as their agent, purchased an estate out of the funds of the society, and paid a sum of money on account of the deposit, filed their bill against their agent, who had himself obtained a conveyance of the estate, which he refused to convey to the trustees of the society, to compel him to convey the estate to them upon the trusts and for the purposes of the society. Upon a demurrer for want of equity and for want of parties,—Held, that the trustees had power to institute this suit to obtain a conveyance, though the purchase which had been made was alleged to be illegal and contrary to the act of parliament and the rules of the society; and that a suit instituted by the trustees authorizing the purchase, on behalf of themselves and all the other members and shareholders of the society, was sufficient; that it was not necessary to bring all the members before the Court to consent to the purchase, and that the jurisdiction of this Court was not ousted by the appointment of a separate jurisdiction for the regulation of the affairs of these societies.

This bill was filed by Richard Mullock, Edward Wills, Edward Thomas, Philip Thomas and John Richards, trustees, members and shareholders in the Newport District Benefit Building Society, on behalf of themselves and all other members and shareholders of the society, to obtain a declaration, that an estate, purchased in the name of Ebenezer Vaughan Jenkins, was the property of the Newport District Benefit Building Society, and that he and his mortgagee might convey the same to the plaintiffs, as trustees, according to the rules of the society; and that he might pay off the mortgage and deliver up the deeds, and that the mortgage might be declared void against the society. It also asked for an injunction to restrain the defendant from disposing of or incumbering the estate and property, or parting with the title deeds, or receiving the rents. It also asked that the accounts might be taken and a receiver appointed.

The bill stated that this society was formed in 1850, under its present style, and that rules for regulating the society were duly framed, certified and enrolled, pursuant to the statute in that behalf; and that such rules had been duly printed and circulated amongst the members; and that the first rule stated that the object of the society was to enable each member to receive out of the funds of the society the amount or value of his share or shares therein (each share not to exceed the sum of 50*l.*.) to erect or purchase one or more dwelling-house or houses, or other real or leasehold estate; to be secured by way of mortgage to the society, until the amount or value of his share or shares should have been fully repaid to such society, with the interest thereon, and all fines and other payments incurred in respect thereof. The second rule provided for persons becoming members; and the third rule provided that the society should be governed by a committee, consisting of a president, vice-president, five trustees, and fifteen members; and by the fourth rule that the subscriptions to the society should be paid weekly. Provision was also made for annual and other meetings of the society, and for the weekly and other payments to be made by members, and also for the payment of all money into the bank in the name of the trustees; and that shares in the society should be allotted to members according to seniority of membership; and that any member, by giving notice, might take the whole or any part of the shares he subscribed for in one allotment. The ninth rule provided that any member, upon receiving the share advanced, should execute to the trustees for the time being such mortgage as therein mentioned; and the same rule also provided that all monies to be received and retained by the trustees, under or by virtue of any such mortgage, were to be immediately placed with the society's bankers, to its account and for its use. The eleventh rule provided that the trustees and committee should be at liberty, as often as they should deem it advisable, to apply for and obtain from the bankers or other persons, at such rate of interest as they might determine, such sums of money as they should think proper, in order to advance the same to members. The twelfth rule declared that on the death of a member there should be no right of survivorship, and the shares should be personal estate. The seventeenth rule provided that the trustees should be intrusted with the funds and securities belonging to the society; that the banking account should be in their names; and all money received should be placed to their account with the West of England and South Wales Banking Company, or any other bankers the members or committee might agree to. All proceedings, whether civil or criminal, were to be commenced, prosecuted and defended by and in their names, and all expenses, costs and charges, and damages incurred were to be borne and paid by and out of the funds of the society. The rules also contained other provisions for vesting the property of the society in the trustees for the time being. They also contained provisions for referring to arbitration any disputes between members or the trustees or committee.

The bill then stated that divers persons, together with the plaintiffs, had subscribed and had become and were members and shareholders in the society, which consisted of upwards of 300 persons, who formed a fluctuating body and were too numerous to be named individually as parties plaintiffs or defendants, and could not be made parties without manifestly preventing the prosecution of the suit.

That the defendant E. V. Jenkins lately acted as one of the vice-presidents, and is or was or claimed to be a member or shareholder of the society. That the plaintiffs were the trustees of the society; and as such were duly authorized to commence and prosecute this suit on behalf of the society.

That in August 1850 an estate, called the Maindee estate, in the neighbourhood of Newport, was advertised for sale, and as it was considered advantageous to the society, it was resolved, at a meeting at which the defendant was present and presided, that he should be deputed to purchase that portion of the estate called the Fair Oak estate for the society, to which he consented.

On the 28th of August 1850 the defendant attended the sale, as the agent for and on behalf of the society, and purchased a certain portion of the estate, being lot 22, consisting of seventy-six acres, for the sum of 5,680*l.*, exclusive of timber of the value of 325*l.*

On the 30th of August 1850, at a meeting of the committee, the defendant reported to the meeting that he had purchased the land in lot 22 for the society; and for the purpose of the defendant paying a deposit, in part of the purchase-money, according to the conditions of sale, a sum of 600*l.* 10*s.* was paid by the trustees of the society to the defendant, who accordingly paid the deposit.

That proceedings were taken to appropriate the property purchased for the purposes of the society, and also for the investigation of the title and obtaining the proper conveyances; and that they were entered on the minutes and signed by the defendant E. V. Jenkins; and on the 5th of September 1850 the report of the purchase was confirmed, in the presence of the defendant, at a general committee of the society. At that time there was about 4,000*l.* belonging to the society in the bankers' hands, applicable to the payment of the purchase-money; and arrangements had been made to obtain a loan from them of about 2,000*l.*, at interest, to enable the society to complete the purchase; but it was alleged that the defendant E. V. Jenkins had, without any authority, procured the land purchased to be conveyed to him, and that he had borrowed a large sum of money from some person not a member of the society, and had, it was believed, secured the same with interest by way of equitable mortgage and deposit of the title-deeds.

The bill then charged that the person who had advanced the money had notice that the purchase was made for the plaintiffs, and that the defendant E. V. Jenkins had expressly at times dealt with the property as belonging to the society; but that he had recently attempted to set on foot a rival building society at Newport, and had issued a printed prospectus or advertisement of such proposed society, to which a note was appended, stating "that in consequence of recent disturbances it was anticipated that several eligible allotments on the Fair Oak estate would not be purchased or taken up; it was therefore intended that they should be ballotted for at the earliest opportunity, when all members not interested in the estate and who should have paid up to that time might participate in the ballot"; that this was at variance with the rights of the Newport District Benefit Building Society and of the plaintiffs and other members.

To this bill the defendant put in a general demurrer, for want of equity, and also because the committee and the several shareholders other than the defendant and the plaintiffs were not made parties.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Miller, in support of the demurrer.—Building societies cannot purchase real estate either for investment or for their own purposes; though if real estate is purchased by a member, the society may take and hold it, by way of mortgage, as a security for money advanced to that member out of the funds of the society, but in no other way can it deal with real property. Some of the members had thought it beneficial to the society to purchase this estate with a view to deal it out in lots that members might build; a sub-committee, and not a committee, of the society had consequently resolved to appoint the defendant their agent to purchase the estate. A committee of the society met after the sale, and to them the defendant reported the purchase, and upon this it was insisted by the plaintiffs that the defendant purchased for the society at large; that he was a trustee for the members, and that he holds the estate for them: but this was contrary both to the rules of the society and to the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 32, under which it was founded. This act contains no powers enabling building societies to purchase land for investment. The money they were empowered to raise was to be advanced as money to be repaid by instalments, the property of the individual member being mortgaged to secure it; it cannot be said that land was advanced within the meaning of the act. The society was not even formed with any apparent view to speculate in the purchase of land to be transferred in lots to its members: it is therefore unnecessary to consider that point. The purchase, therefore, of land was altogether at variance with the objects of the society; and were it not so, the governing body of the society neither sanctioned it, nor did the society adopt the purchase. It was said that the trustees advanced money to pay the deposit, and they, and not the governing body of the society, or the committee and members, filed this bill to obtain the benefit of a purchase which was made contrary to the rules of the society and the purpose of its formation. But if the purchase did fall within the objects of the society, every member ought to be before the Court, that he might have an opportunity of stating any objections he might have both to the purchase and the proceedings, which did not even originate with the governing body. It might be said that the defendant, who was a member of the society, entered into a contract to purchase for the society; but then, as it was illegal, and he had committed a breach of trust, he stopped. The only object of these societies was, a combination to insure small loans to members, that they might complete the purchase of small plots of land or houses, the purchase-money for which was to be secured to the society by mortgage; but in the present case members were necessitated to purchase the land however disadvantageous to them; they were left no option. The plaintiffs also were wrong in filing this bill; they had mistaken their jurisdiction, and ought, under the 10 Geo. 4. c. 26. s. 27, to have applied for redress to a Justice of the Peace. It was, therefore, most material to consider whether this suit was for the benefit of the society, as it would lock up the whole of its funds.

Bainbridge v. Burton, 2 Beav. 539.

Evans v. Stokes, 1 Keen, 24; s. c. 5 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 145.

Mr. R. Palmer, Mr. Rogers and Mr. Walford appeared in support of the bill, but were not heard.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—In this case the trustees of a building society have instituted this suit on behalf of themselves and all other members, except this single defendant, and he had been appointed their agent to purchase an estate for the society. He accordingly purchased the estate, and received money from the society to pay the deposit. If the trustees were competent to authorize the defendant to purchase, they, without doubt, were competent to sue on behalf of the society, as in any ordinary suit for the specific performance of a contract by a vendor, where the Court considered that parties, having power to purchase, sufficiently represented those who were beneficially interested, and who consequently need not be parties. But, assuming that the suit was properly constituted in respect of parties, could relief be given in this state of the record? A member and vice-president of the committee buys the estate, and acknowledges he has done so for the society, and that he has received a part of the purchase-money, and taken the conveyance to himself for his own use, and then refused to convey to the parties for whom he purchased. I assume the facts to be true and correctly stated; the transaction, however, has been called illegal, and it is said that there was no power to make such a purchase; but that the object of the society was to enable persons having land to build houses, or to acquire land, or means to borrow money to acquire land for that purpose: such was the object of the society contemplated both by the act of parliament and by the rules which had been framed. But assuming that the society had any surplus funds, was there anything to prevent it from investing them in real estate? It appears, though not clearly stated, that the defendant was present at the time when the resolution was passed deputing him to purchase the estate, and that he purchased accordingly, yet now he insists upon keeping both estate and deposit-money, which certainly cannot be allowed. It differs from those cases where the Court will not uphold the contract on the ground of its being contrary to law; but even in those cases, for instance in a case of usury, the Court always compels the party to do equity. I shall express no opinion upon what the result may be ultimately; but it is not competent for the defendant, who, by his demurrer, admits the facts alleged, to withhold the estate from the plaintiffs, or to hold it for his own use.

It is said that this Court has not jurisdiction to consider this question, that it belongs to the Justices of the Peace; but this Court has interfered where a particular jurisdiction has been created, and it must do so in this case, unless, which is not the case, the jurisdiction of this Court is expressly taken away. I must, therefore, overrule this demurrer.

HEWITT v. LOOSEMORE.

Solicitor and Client—Constructive Notice—Mortgage—Deposit of Title Deeds—Equitable and legal Mortgages—Priority.

Where a mortgagor, a solicitor, prepares the mortgage deed, the mortgagee not employing another solicitor, the mortgagor will be considered to be the solicitor of the mortgagee in the transaction of the mortgage; but the latter will not therefore be deemed to have notice of a prior deposit of the title-deeds by the mortgagor, or of any uncommunicated fact which it was the interest of the mortgagor to conceal from the mortgagee.

Constructive notice is knowledge imputed by the Court on presumption, too strong to be rebutted, that the knowledge must have been communicated.

A legal mortgagee will not be postponed to a prior equitable one, on the ground of not having got in the title deeds, unless there has been fraud or gross or wilful negligence on the part of the legal mortgagee.

Fraud or gross or wilful negligence will not be imputed to a mortgagee who has made bonâ fide an inquiry for the title deeds, and a reasonable excuse has been given for the non-delivery of them to him. Secus, if he has not made any inquiry after the deeds.

This was a suit by an equitable mortgagee by deposit of title deeds for foreclosure, and for redemption against a subsequent legal mortgagee.

In 1834 Robert Loosemore, a solicitor, at Tiverton, deposited the lease of certain leasehold property with the plaintiff, accompanied by a memorandum for the purpose of securing to the latter the repayment of 1,700*l.* and interest.

By indenture of the 17th of November 1838, Robert Loosemore assigned the leaseholds to the defendant John Loosemore, a farmer in the neighbourhood of Tiverton, to secure to him the repayment of 300*l.* and interest, at 4*l.* 10*s.* per cent. per annum. The mortgagor prepared the deed of assignment at his own expense, and promised, at the request of the defendant, John Loosemore (who did not employ any solicitor in the transaction) to deliver to him the lease of the mortgaged property, but excused himself from time to time for not doing so upon various grounds, and principally upon the ground of being busy when applied to on the subject. In 1842 the mortgagor became bankrupt, and the defendant John Loosemore then for the first time ascertained that the lease had been deposited, previously to his mortgage, with the plaintiff.

The bill charged inter alia that the defendant J. Loosemore had, at the time of his assignment, actual notice of the plaintiff's charge and the deposit of the lease and memorandum; that he did not use due caution or diligence in inquiring for the title deeds; that he had then notice that the mortgagor was in embarrassed circumstances, and had parted with his title deeds; that the defendant ought to have required the production and inspection of the lease; that he had been guilty of gross negligence and want of caution, and therefore not entitled to the benefit of his assignment as against the plaintiff; that the mortgagor was the solicitor of the defendant in the transaction of the mortgage, and that the latter had therefore constructive notice of the mortgagor's previous dealings with the mortgaged property as if he had had actual notice of the plaintiff's charge and the deposit; and that the plaintiff, if not entitled to priority, was entitled to redeem the defendant. The bill also prayed for a receiver.

The plaintiff rested his case upon the above facts, and relied upon the following passage, read as evidence from the defendant's answer:—"That in or about the month of October 1838, the defendant was possessed of the sum of 300*l.*, which he was desirous of investing upon mortgage or other sufficient security at interest, and accordingly applied to the said Robert Loosemore, who then and had for many years carried on an extensive business as an attorney and solicitor at Tiverton, in the county of Devon, to know if he had any client desirous of borrowing that sum upon a security which he could recommend; that he replied he had not then any client who wanted such a sum, but if he should hear of such a security as the defendant required he would inform him of it; that shortly afterwards, in the beginning of November 1838, he received a letter from the mortgagor requesting him to come to Tiverton, as he could then give him a good security for his money, and accordingly he went and had an interview with the mortgagor, who proposed to borrow the sum of 300*l.* for himself, and to assign a certain leasehold estate called Rosehouse, situate in Knowstone, in the said county, being the leasehold premises in the bill mentioned, to which the mortgagor Robert Loosemore was entitled under an indenture of lease, dated the 2nd of December 1833, for the residue of a term of ninety-nine years determinable on the deaths of himself and Robert Loosemore, and of Frances Sarah Loosemore and Robert Wood Loosemore his children, and the survivor of them, to the defendant as a security for the repayment of the said sum of 300*l.*, together with interest thereon at the rate of 4*l.* 10*s.* per cent. per annum; that the defendant knowing the said leasehold premises to be an ample security, accepted such proposal and agreed to lend the sum of 300*l.* to the mortgagor upon the security aforesaid, and the 17th of November 1838 was appointed to carry the agreement into effect; that on that day the defendant attended at the office of the mortgagor in Tiverton and advanced to him the sum of 300*l.*, and the mortgagor then duly executed and delivered to the defendant an indenture of assignment and mortgage of the leasehold premises to the defendant, and which indenture was dated the 17th of November 1838, and expressed to be made between the mortgagor of the one part and the defendant of the other part."

The defendant denied by his answer all notice whatever, express or implied, of the above-mentioned memorandum, charge or deposit, and stated that when the assignment and mortgage was handed to him he inquired whether the lease ought not to be delivered to him, and that the mortgagor replied it should, but as he was rather busy then he would look for it and give it to the defendant when he next came to market; that at that time the mortgagor had the reputation of being and was believed by the defendant to be a wealthy man and was much respected in the neighbourhood; that the defendant, having no reason to doubt that such lease was in the possession of the said mortgagor and would be looked for and delivered to him on the next market day, promised to call for it and took away the assignment; that on a subsequent market day and at several times afterwards, the defendant called upon the mortgagor for the lease, but the latter always made some excuse for not delivering it to the defendant, generally observing that he had been so busy he had not had time to look it out; that on the last occasion when the defendant called for the lease the mortgagor appeared to be rather angry with him for coming so often about it, and said, "I hope you don't mistrust me for so paltry a sum as 300*l.*"; that the defendant having in common with all his neighbours great confidence in the mortgagor and a high opinion of his integrity, and fully believing that he had only been prevented by the pressure of business from looking out the lease, made no further application upon the subject; that in or about July 1842, the defendant heard to his great surprise that the mortgagor had become bankrupt, and that he had pledged the lease to some other person.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Giffard appeared for the plaintiff; and,

The Solicitor General and Mr. Speed, for the defendant John Loosemore.

For the plaintiff it was argued, first, that under the circumstances above stated, Robert Loosemore, the mortgagor, was the agent and solicitor of the defendant, John Loosemore, and therefore that the latter had through him notice of the deposit of the lease with the plaintiff—Sheldon v. Cox (1), Le Neve v. Le Neve (2), Dryden v. Frost (3): and secondly, that the defendant having taken the assignment without the lease or further inquiry than appeared by his answer, the plaintiff's equitable title ought to prevail against the defendant's legal interest, and that the non-delivery of the lease and the absence of inquiry constituted constructive notice of the plaintiff's claim—

Jackson v. Rowe, 2 Sim. & S. 472; s. c. 4 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 118.

Tylee v. Webb, 6 Beav. 552.

Jones v. Smith, 1 Hare, 43; s. c. 1 Ph. 244; 11 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 83; 12 Ibid. 381.

Worthington v. Morgan, 16 Sim. 547; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 233.

For the defendant, John Loosemore, it was contended, first, that the mortgagor had not acted as his solicitor or agent, and had not been retained or paid by him; but that if he could be considered to be his solicitor or agent, a client would not be held to have had constructive notice of a fraud committed by his solicitor and agent, and concealed from his knowledge—Kennedy v. Green (4); and secondly, that a mortgagee was not bound to take all the precaution of a wary and prudent purchaser, and that the defendant, having inquired for the lease and received a satisfactory reason for its non-production, would not be postponed to the plaintiff. Allen v. Knight (5) and the cases above cited on the point of constructive notice.

Dec. 2.—TURNER, V.C., after stating the above facts, said—Two points were argued at the bar: first, that Robert Loosemore must be taken to have acted as the solicitor of the defendant in the transaction of the mortgage, and that the defendant, therefore, had notice through him of the lease having been deposited with the plaintiff; and secondly, that the defendant having taken the legal mortgage without the lease, or making further inquiry than appears upon his answer, the plaintiff's equitable title by deposit ought to prevail against the legal interest of the defendant, and that the non-delivery of the lease and the absence of inquiry constituted constructive notice.

As to the first point, I think that where the mortgagor is himself a solicitor and prepares the mortgage deed, the mortgagee employing no other solicitor, the mortgagor must be considered to be the agent or solicitor of the mortgagee in the transaction of the mortgage. The mortgagee in such a case trusts the mortgagor to discharge duties which his own solicitor would have discharged if he had thought fit to employ one. It can make no difference that the mortgagor is not paid by the mortgagee, for the nature of the transaction is this, that all expenses are to be borne by the mortgagor. I am of opinion, therefore, that Robert Loosemore must be considered to have been the agent or solicitor of the defendant in the transaction.

I do not, however, think that the defendant is therefore to be considered as having had notice of the plaintiff's deposit. Such notice would be constructive merely, and constructive notice is a knowledge which the Court imputes to the party on a presumption so strong that it cannot be rebutted, that the knowledge must have been communicated. I could not act on such a presumption in the face of the evidence which the plaintiff himself has adduced.

In determining this point in favour of the plaintiff, I desire it to be understood that I do not proceed on the case of Kennedy v. Green. The doctrine of constructive notice established by that case does not apply to the present case. Where there has been no fraud in the original deposit with the plaintiff, and no fraud in the mortgage to the defendant, if the fact of the deposit with the plaintiff is to be taken to have been communicated to the defendant, it would be a misapplication of the case of Kennedy v. Green to hold that the fact of the deposit must be taken to have been communicated because it was a fraud to conceal it. It would be to assume that there was fraud in bringing the question, whether there was knowledge or not.

The first point being thus disposed of, I proceed to consider the second question, (which is one of very great and general importance) whether an equitable mortgagee by deposit of title deeds is entitled to priority over a subsequent legal mortgagee of the property comprised in the deeds, who has not made all the inquiries after the deeds which he could or might have obtained. It is first to be considered how this question stands upon the authorities; for if there is a settled rule on the subject I cannot certainly venture to alter it, nor should I be disposed to do so, as I am fully satisfied that the advantage derived from adhering to settled rules of law greatly overbalances the mischief with which adherence to those rules may in particular cases be attended. Without referring to the authorities anterior to the case of Plumb v. Fluit (6) (many of which were favourable to the doctrine there laid down), it will be sufficient to state that it was there held that nothing but fraud or gross and voluntary negligence in leaving the title deeds will oust the priority of the legal mortgagee; and that where the legal mortgagee had applied for the deeds, and had relied on the promise of the mortgagor to send them, it was held that that was not such a fraud or gross or wilful negligence as would postpone the legal mortgagee to a prior equitable one. The doctrine thus laid down was re-asserted by Lord Eldon, in Evans v. Bicknell (7), and again in Martinez v. Cooper (8); by Sir William Grant, in Barnett v. Weston (9); by Sir John Leach, in Harper v. Faulder (10); by Lord Langdale, in Farrow v. Rees (11), and by Lord Cottenham, in Allen v. Knight (supra). This must, therefore, be taken to be the doctrine of the Court, unless there were other authorities which could be brought contesting it. It was said in argument in the present case, that the doctrine in the authorities just referred to could not be reconciled with the decisions in Jackson v. Rowe, Dryden v. Frost, Tylee v. Webb, and Worthington v. Morgan; but, on examination, I do not think it will be found that those cases are inconsistent with Plumb v. Fluit. In Jackson v. Rowe the question was, not whether a prior equitable title should prevail against a subsequent legal one, but whether the party had a legal or equitable defence against a prior legal title; and it does not appear whether any inquiry had been made about the title. In Dryden v. Frost, though the facts of the case do not appear from the report, it may be inferred from the reference in the judgment to the case of Hiern v. Mill (12), that the defendant had notice that the deeds were in the hands of the plaintiff. In Tylee v. Webb there was no question about the legal estate, but both the plaintiff and the defendant Hinton were equitable mortgagees by deposit; and, lastly, in Worthington v. Morgan there was no inquiry as to the title deeds.

The law, therefore, as I collect it from the authorities, stands thus: that a legal mortgage is not to be postponed to a prior equitable one, on the ground of not having got in the title deeds, unless there has been fraud or gross and wilful negligence on the part of the legal mortgagee; and that the Court will not impute such fraud or negligence to him if there has been a bond fide inquiry after the deeds, and a reasonable excuse given for non-delivery of them; but that the Court will impute fraud or gross and wilful negligence to him if he omits all inquiry as to the deeds. I am of opinion that there is much principle both in the rule and the decisions upon it. When the Court is called on to postpone a legal mortgage, its powers are invoked to take away a legal right, and it says that there is no ground on which it will act, except that of fraud, or of wilful neglect of a kind amounting to fraud. I think in transactions of sale and mortgage, if no inquiry is made as to deeds which constitute the title to the property, the Court is justified in assuming that the purchaser abstains from making the inquiry from a suspicion that the title will be affected by the inquiry, if made, and that it is, therefore, bound to impute to the purchaser, or mortgagee, a knowledge of the facts which would have been disclosed on inquiry; but where an inquiry is made, and a reasonable excuse given, and there is no ground to impute suspicion, this principle cannot apply.

Applying this principle to the present case, the plaintiff having failed to make out a case for postponing the defendant's mortgage, the only decree I can make is the usual decree for redemption; but the plaintiff must pay the costs up to and including the decree. The charge in the bill that the plaintiff is entitled to redeem the defendant, seems to me to take this case out of the range of Lord Eldon's observations in Martinez v. Cooper.

Decree accordingly.

LORDS JUSTICES. } THE SUTTON HARBOUR IMPROVEMENT COMPANY v. HITCHINS.
1851.
Dec. 9, 10.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, sect. 68.—Property injuriously affected—Compensation—Injunction.

A harbour improvement company, in the prosecution of their works, under the authority of a special act of parliament, obstructed access to a wharf from the place of business of M. H., by which he was put to expense in loading and unloading ships. M. H., claiming compensation, gave a notice and proceeded to appoint an arbitrator, under the 68th section of the 8 Vict. c. 18. (the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845). Upon a bill filed by the company, an injunction was granted to restrain the further proceedings of M. H. until he established his right at law, but on appeal the same was dissolved.

This was a motion to dissolve an injunction granted by the late Master of the Rolls (Lord Langdale) restraining the defendant from taking any proceedings under a notice he had given, to obtain compensation by an arbitration under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, for alleged injury sustained in consequence of the works performed by the company for the improvement of Sutton harbour, under the powers conferred on them by special acts of parliament of the 51 Geo. 3. c. cxcvi, the 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. ix, and the 10 & 11 Vict. c. cxcvii, by the last of which, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act and other general acts were incorporated therein. The facts of this case are fully set out in 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 489, but may be shortly stated thus:—The company, in the prosecution of their works, made a coffer-dam, which, for a time, enclosed part of the harbour, by reason of which the defendant, who rented stores adjoining Sutton Wharf, and who had a right, in respect of such stores, to ship and unship goods at the wharf, was prevented from so doing, and was compelled to send his workmen and labourers a greater distance for that purpose, and at an additional expense. When the works were sufficiently completed the coffer-dam was removed, and it was removed before the notice was given claiming compensation for the defendant's lands being "injuriously affected."

On the hearing, before Lord Langdale, the case of The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith (1) was cited and relied on on behalf of the plaintiffs. The defendant now appealed.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Terrell, for the appeal, argued that the Master of the Rolls

(1) 1 Hall & Twells, 364; a. c. 1 Mac. & Gor. 216; 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 193.

had apparently acted on the authority of Lord Cottenham's decision in The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith; but since that case a decision of equal authority, namely, that of The East and West India Docks and Birmingham Junction Railway Company v. Gattke (2), had been pronounced by the present Lord Chancellor, who, in his judgment, observed that although he disclaimed any intention to overrule Lord Cottenham's decision in Smith's case, that being properly the province of an appellate court, yet he should not deem it right to extend the application of the principle of that decision. His Lordship then, in his judgment, said that the application of the principle of Smith's case to the one before the Court, "and to others of the same nature, would operate very hardly upon the claimant, and would, I think, defeat an intention clearly entertained by the legislature, that of giving a summary remedy for assessing and recovering compensation; and experiments like the present, if successful, would deprive the claimant of a small amount of his compensation money, and would defeat the intention of the act of parliament." In that case, which was a demand as to lands alleged to be injuriously affected by reason of the railway damaging Gattke's goods and diminishing his custom, the question was, whether such consequential damage was within the contemplation of the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. The Vice Chancellor Sir James Wigram, on the company filing a bill to restrain Gattke from proceeding under a notice he had given for assessing compensation under that section of the act, granted an injunction; but on the same coming before the present Lord Chancellor he held that the words "injuriously affected" were not confined to the case of a person whose lands were directly interfered with by a company, but extended to a case of consequential damage, and that the sheriff's jury had jurisdiction to decide upon the title to compensation, as well as to the amount of damages to be awarded, and he dissolved the injunction accordingly. Whatever was the state of the law in January 1851, when Lord Langdale decided this case, and it might be admitted that the decision in Smith's case, decided in 1849 by Lord Cottenham, was to be held binding, still, as now there had been the judgment of a succeeding Lord Chancellor in February 1851, differing from that state of the law, and declaring the law to be otherwise, though not overruling the decision, the defendant was entitled to have the injunction dissolved.

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. C. Hall, for the company, contended that the appellant's case must fail, because the case of damage which he alleged, and which only amounted to 65*l.* by his own demand, was not within the meaning of the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and also because, as the case of Smith, before Lord Cottenham, was plainly and precisely in point, any reversal of the decision of Lord Langdale, in the case before the Court, would be in effect, and indeed in substance, an overruling of Lord Cottenham's judgment. It was to be observed that although Lord Truro had remarked on that case, and said in Gattke's case that he should not be disposed to extend the application of such a principle, he carefully and pointedly abstained from any course which might be considered as overruling it, and elaborately distinguished Gattke's case from that of Smith. The distinction was plain; Smith's was the case of arbitration, that of Gattke was a jury case. Although the judgment of the Master of the Rolls was pronounced in January, no action had been brought, nor did the defendant make any application for that purpose, as he might have done, and then the Court would have directed the judgment to be dealt with as it should see fit, as was done by Lord Cottenham, in the case before him.

[LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—There is this distinction between Smith's case and this. In that case Smith said that the works, when completed, would do permanent damage, while here the injury complained of is temporary, and has now ceased.]

Even supposing the company had done any damage, the remedy of Mr. Hitchins was under the special act, which provided for compensation for lands injuriously affected by the works of the harbour improvement "in regard to lands actually taken" for such works; but as that gentleman had had no lands taken, he could not come under the clause, and the special act did not provide for such a case as this, because it must be assumed no such case could be a ground for compensation.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Suppose the case of a much frequented part of a city, and that persons, having authority to do so, order the roadway to be taken up by which access to shops is prevented, and shopkeepers suffer in their custom, there the acts which authorize the thing done do not provide for compensation. Here the acts done are done by authority, and provision is made for compensation.]

There was a fallacy in such an argument, for the 68th section related to the case of lands not persons, injuriously affected. If the defendant was held to be entitled to proceed for compensation under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, every man conducting business on the side of a public road, the use of which was diminished by the construction of a neighbouring railway, would be entitled to compensation for the loss of custom in his trade and profit in his business.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—What is the precise head of equity on which the bill is founded?]

The equity on which the bill is founded was that by virtue of which the subjects of the realm were entitled to resort to a court of equity to have a question decided in the most convenient form, at the smallest amount of expenses, and without being compelled to resort to a multiplicity of suits, or involved in an entanglement of rights. If the present claim were successful, the harbour company, in the performance of their duties, and in constructing works for the general benefit of the community, would be open to a vast number of claims of the very smallest amount and for alleged injuries of the most insignificant character, which they now called upon the Court, in the exercise of its discretion, to prevent. Beyond this, if the company, on their part, named an arbitrator, they would have concluded themselves from afterwards questioning the title to compensation. The following cases were also cited—

The King v. the Directors of the Bristol Dock Company (3) and The Queen v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (4).

Mr. Bethell was not called on to reply.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—This Court being in the habit of interfering to prevent multiplicity of suits and needless entanglement of rights, it is not necessary for me to dispute or deny, and I do not dispute or deny, that cases may arise and have arisen in which this head of equity would support a bill founded upon an attempt and intention to prevent the resort to the powers of compulsory arbitration which are contained in an act of parliament of this description. A case may be so circumstanced as to bring it within the range of this head of equity, but in each particular case it is the duty of the Court, if it be satisfied, and more especially so on an interlocutory application, that more litigation and more entanglement will be created by interfering than by abstaining to interfere, to abstain from interference. Now, looking at all the facts of this case, considering all its circumstances, and seeing that I have come to the conclusion that more litigation, more expense, more delay, more entanglement, and more difficulty will be incurred by interfering than by declining to interfere, I am of opinion that there ought to be no interference, and that there ought to be no injunction. So far as I am concerned, I leave the parties to assert their legal rights, or their supposed legal rights.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I am of the same opinion. This case does not appear to me to require the laying down of any such doctrine as has been argued. When the legislature has laid down a particular mode of proceeding it ought to be a strong case to induce us to direct another. It is to be observed that in the present instance the amount of compensation claimed is only 15% above the minimum amount for which an arbitration could have been resorted to. I cannot yield to the idea of the naming an arbitrator being conclusive as suggested during the argument. In Smith's case—with the reasoning in which I confess I am unable to concur—the sum was large, it was 2,000*l.* and upwards, and it might be worth while to see whether there was or was not a claim for anything at all. I admit that although there is that distinction, it is not a distinction in principle. It does not appear that the company will be hurt by the proceedings under the act. They name an arbitrator under protest because the act compels them to do so. If there be any legal difficulty which shall arise in this case it will be very small when compared with the evil which will inevitably arise by the bringing an action at law, and which must occur from continuing the injunction. I think the injunction ought to be dissolved.

Dec. 12. } SIMS v. HELLING.

Mortgage—Equitable Deposit—Realizing—Administrator—Evidence.

*G. S. insisting that J. F., the owner of an agreement for a building lease, had deposited it to secure to him 900*l., claimed payment of the money from the administrator of J. F., who had expended money out of his own pocket in finishing the houses, and had obtained leases from the lessors, and questioned the deposit and the extent of the advance if any had been made:—Held, that the affidavits affording evidence of deposit, the Court was bound to act upon them; that when the deposit was made, it gave G. S. a title to a mortgage, and that he had a right to payment; and the Court made a decree for an account and sale of the houses comprised in the agreement.

This claim was filed by George Sims to obtain payment of 900*l.*, with interest, which was advanced by the plaintiff to John Faithfull: or to have three leasehold houses in Goldington Crescent sold, and the produce applied in payment of the debt and costs, and to have the balance, or residue of such debt and costs, paid out of his general personal estate, or otherwise that it might be administered under the direction of this Court.

The claim stated that, in December 1849, the plaintiff, George Sims, agreed to advance 1,000*l.* to John Faithfull at 5*l.* per cent., upon some or one of four properties, being a freehold house at Worthing, four leasehold houses in Weedington Street, St. Pancras, two leasehold houses in Medburn Street, or three leasehold houses in Goldington Crescent, which were to be worth 2,000*l.* On the 13th of December 1849 the plaintiff advanced 400*l.* to J. Faithfull and took his memorandum. On the 14th of December 1849 he advanced a further sum of 200*l.* to J. Faithfull, who signed the following memorandum: "I hereby undertake to give a good and proper mortgage to the property in Medburn Street to George Sims, he having this day advanced me the sum of 200*l.*" On the 5th of January 1850 the plaintiff advanced a further sum of 200*l.*, and on the 11th of January 1850 the plaintiff lent him a further sum of 100*l.*, and J. Faithfull signed the following memorandum: "I acknowledge that George Sims has this day advanced me the further sum of 100*l.*, making together 900*l.* on account of the mortgage to be prepared by Mr. Read." In February 1850 George Sims agreed to give up his security on the houses in Medburn Street in exchange for a security on the three leasehold houses in Goldington Crescent, and John Faithfull then deposited and pledged with Mr. Read on behalf of the plaintiff, an agreement dated the 22nd of December 1849, under which he was building the houses in Goldington Crescent, and also the draft of a lease for the same with the approval of the head landlord marked upon it, and it was also marked with the approval of Albert Read on behalf of the plaintiff.

In pursuance of this agreement George Sims allowed J. Faithfull to sell the houses in Medburn Street, and apply the proceeds to his own use.

In November 1850 John Faithfull died, and on the 21st of December 1850 Joseph Helling, the defendant, became his administrator with the will annexed.

From the affidavits, it appeared that Albert Read had acted as the solicitor of both parties; that he had gone to Australia; that the plaintiff sold 1,035*l.* stock, out of which he made the advances; that on payment of the last sum of 100*l.* the memorandum which J. Faithfull signed was read aloud by Mr. Read in the presence of J. Faithfull and his wife, and that she subsequently paid 4*l.* on account of interest, and that other sums of money were afterwards at different times paid by J. Faithfull on account of interest; that some disputes took place in consequence of the irregular payment of the interest; that on the 6th of July 1850 the plaintiff went with A. Read to the office of Mr. Vines, the solicitor of the Brewers' Company, who were the lessors, and that the clerk promised to send a copy of the leases to Mr. Read on the 11th of July 1850; and that Mrs. Faithfull, after the decease of her husband, said it was the fault of Mr. Read that the plaintiff had not the mortgage security.

The defendant, Joseph Helling, admitted that administration with the will annexed was granted to him as a creditor of J. Faithfull. That the principal part of the testator's property consisted of the carcasses of the houses in Goldington Crescent, and that he had finished the houses himself at a cost out of his own pocket of 630*l.*, and that he had obtained leases from the Brewers' Company, dated the 20th of March 1850. He denied that any notice of the plaintiff's claim had been given either to him or the Brewers' Company. That the building agreement was left in the hands of Albert Read as the solicitor of J. Faithfull, and passed with his papers to the solicitor who succeeded to his business. That there were no traces upon the books and papers of J. Faithfull of his having received any money from the plaintiff, and that he did not believe the testator was indebted to the plaintiff, when he died, in any money beyond 100*l.* And he believed that the plaintiff, if he had the money, made the advance to A. Read and not to the testator, and that he did not believe that the testator deposited the agreement with an intent to create a lien upon the premises in favour of the plaintiff.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Sandys, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff has advanced his money upon the security of one of four properties. The security had finally attached upon the houses in Goldington

Crescent which the deceased was building at the time: the agreement for the lease had been deposited with the gentleman who acted as the solicitor of both parties, but this was immaterial if the Court is satisfied that it was held by him for the plaintiff: that testimony, however, cannot be directly obtained as he has gone to Australia; but the plaintiff claims at the hands of the Court the benefit of the deposit, and his claim is supported by other collateral testimony upon which the Court can act.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Tripp, contra.—This is not a case in which a claim ought to have been filed. The agreement upon which the claim was based was not the defendant's title; he has finished the houses at his own charge, and has obtained leases from the ground landlords. The agreement therefore was gone, and with it the plaintiff's security. But where is the evidence of the deposit? The agreement had been found in the custody of the solicitor of the deceased. Mr. Read had gone to Australia, and there is not even an allegation or any evidence that Mr. Read held the agreement for the plaintiff. The defendant also has expended money upon the houses, and the plaintiff sought no relief until they were complete. The claim, therefore, ought to stand over, with liberty for the plaintiff to file a bill, as no decree can be made upon such a claim without a more searching investigation, or without opening the doors of the court to fraud or worse.

No reply was heard.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The plaintiff has proved a debt of 900*l.* to be due from John Faithfull to him, and it was sworn that it was charged upon a particular property which had been sold, as the plaintiff agreed to give up that security in exchange for one upon the houses in Goldington Crescent. When, therefore, the deposit of the documents was made with Mr. Read for the plaintiff, a title to a mortgage was given. The evidence on behalf of the plaintiff was direct; there was nothing on the other side to contradict it. The Court was, therefore, bound to act upon it. The Brewers' Company, the lessors, were said to have repudiated the agreement made with the deceased, and to have granted leases to Mr. Helling, who had become a purchaser of that interest, and came in under a new holding; his title, however, originated in his being the administrator of the deceased, and his having expended money and obtained leases did not make any difference, as the order of the Court would only affect the interest of the testator in the houses; I must, therefore, make the usual decree in the case of an equitable mortgage, for an account and sale of the leasehold property in Goldington Crescent.

PRICE v. GRIFFITH.

Specific Performance—Undivided Moiety—Lease.

A, in a letter addressed to B, said he would let the coal at L. B. to B. on the terms stated in the agreement in the hands of C. C. had two papers in his hands. One was called terms for letting "coals, &c." at L. B. and G. E; the other, instructions, &c. "to obtain coal in L. B." A. and another were, in fact, tenants in common in fee of the L. B. and G. E. property. B. assigned his interest to P, who filed a bill for specific performance of the agreement by A. and the other joint owner, but subsequently his bill was dismissed against the other owner. The prayer of the bill was, that both might specifically perform the agreement, or that A. might perform it if the claim should fail against both:—Held, that "coals, &c." was ambiguous, and that it was uncertain which of the documents in the hands of C. was meant.

Held, also, that there being no ground of impropriety or misrepresentation by A, the Court would not act against him as the owner of an undivided moiety by decreeing specific performance as to that share, with compensation for the other moiety which he was unable to demise.

This was a suit for specific performance. In 1842 Thomas Digby Aubrey Griffith and Miss Mary Jenkins his aunt, were seised in undivided moieties in fee simple of farms, lands and hereditaments in the parish of Bettws, in Glamorganshire, called Llettai Brongie and Gellie Eblig. In the early part of 1843 the following document was drawn up, and is the document spoken of as Exhibit A. It was drawn up by Mr. Griffith, and placed by David Rees, a mining agent of Mr. Griffith and his aunt, in the hands of Mr. George Cuthbertson, a solicitor. The document was afterwards delivered back by Mr. Cuthbertson to Mr. Rees, and was in the following words:—"Terms proposed by Mr. David Rees for letting and taking of coals, &c. at Llettai Brongie and Gellie Eblig. Lessors to grant term of ninety-nine years. Term to commence from the 1st of May 1843. If worked as a country colliery without a road, rent to be 20*l.* per annum. If used for exportation or manufactories, or if sold to manufactories, rent to be 100*l.* per annum, with stated royalty. Royalty to be 6*d.* per ton on all minerals. If minerals from other lands than the said farms be carried over the said farms, rent to be 100*l.* per annum, whether the minerals on the said farms are worked or not. Lessors to grant all right of waters appurtenant to the said farms, and not being to the detriment of the said farms, to the lessees as far as the lessors' rights extend. Lessees to have the power of discontinuing said lease by twelve months' notice; such notice to commence and be given on the first day of May ensuing [then followed the reservation of rent quarterly, and the stipulations as to making the road]. That lessees shall supply lessors, and all tenants of lessors on the site of working, with coal for their purposes and the purposes of the land they shall hold of the said lessors, free of all expense, save and except the expense of working the said coal." The document then concluded with stipulations as to the price of the land taken for the road, and for timber destroyed in making it, and as to the erection of a weighing-machine, and liberty of inspection of lessees' books to ascertain the "quantity worked." In April 1843 Mr. Griffith addressed the following letter to Mr. Rees, which is the document marked C, and so referred to in the judgment.

"Dear Sir,—As to the coal at Llettai Brongie, I beg to say that I am still of the same mind as to the letting, and to you as the lessee, on the terms we advanced and which we both coincided in, which terms are stated in the agreement in Mr. Cuthbertson's hands, and the time to commence from May next.—I am, Sir, very truly yours,

T. D. A. Griffith."

"To Mr. David Rees, Bettws."

At the time of the writing of this letter, Mr. Cuthbertson had in his hands a paper in the following words, which is the exhibit referred to in the judgment as exhibit Z—"Instructions for proposed articles of agreement. Parties, Miss Jenkins and T. A. G. lessors. David Rees, of Bettws, lessee. Particulars—Lessors agree with lessee that for consideration 16*l.* per annum, payable weekly, lessee shall drive one level to obtain coal in Llettai Brongie for the space of twelve months. That for second year, the consideration be 20*l.* payable as before. That lessee will purchase all timber required for his purposes therein of lessors at market price. That if such coal is worked by more than one party deriving any interest therein as joint lessee or partner, that then the rent shall be 100*l.* per annum, payable as before, with a royalty of 6*d.* Or if lessee shall ship coal at any port or sell to any public company otherwise than as a country collier, that then for the first year the rent be 50*l.* payable as before, and the second 100*l.*, with the mentioned royalty." Then followed other stipulations as to determination of the term, and as to making a road, and as to the supply of coal to the lessors for the purposes "of the said farm." On the 18th of March 1846, Mr. Rees, by an indenture of that date, assigned to Sir Robert Price, Bart., his executors, administrators and assigns, all his right and interest under the alleged contract between him and Miss Jenkins and Mr. Griffith. This deed recited that the agreement was made between Mr. Griffith on his own behalf, and as agent for his aunt, with Mr. Rees. Sir Robert Price filed this bill in April 1846 against Mr. Griffith, Miss Jenkins and Mr. Rees, and it prayed specific performance of the agreement against the two former, and if need be that Mr. Rees might be decreed to join them: or if the Court should be of opinion that she was not bound by the agreement, that Mr. Griffith might be decreed specifically to perform the same so far as respected his own undivided moiety of the said premises.

The answers denied the agreement, and set up the Statute of Frauds, and claimed the benefit of it. After the suit was at issue, and before witnesses were examined, the bill was allowed to be dismissed as against Miss Jenkins.

On behalf of the plaintiff, it was argued that the exhibits C and A formed an agreement, and that A was the paper referred to in C, and that the signature to paper C. was a sufficient signature by Mr. Griffith to the agreement. As to any doubt on the meaning of "coals, &c.," that could soon be set at rest by any person conversant with the customs of a coal district, and it would be found to mean coals, iron-stone and fire clay.

The cause was heard before Wigram, V.C., on the 25th, 26th and 28th of January 1850; and, on the 7th of February following, his Honour dismissed the bill, with costs, holding that there was no evidence to shew that exhibit A. was the document referred to in exhibit C, or what document was in fact referred to in exhibit C. On that occasion, the cases of Wheatley v. Slade (1), Thomas v. Dering (2), Hyde v. Wrench (3) and Graham v. Oliver (4) were cited. The plaintiff appealed from the whole decree.

Mr. Roll and Mr. Hislop Clarke appeared for the appellant.

Mr. Malins and Mr. J. H. Palmer, for the respondent, were not called on.

Upon the hearing of the appeal, the cases of Mortlock v. Buller (5) and Nelthorpe v. Holgate (6) were referred to.

and C. taken together comprise a perfect agreement, capable of being carried into effect by a decree of this Court for specific performance. To the affirmative of that proposition there are several objections. In the first place, I am not satisfied, speaking for myself alone, that the subject-matter of the contract is sufficiently stated. I am not satisfied what it was which was intended to be included in the term, "coals, &c." There is no evidence to shew, and perhaps such evidence would be difficult to get, what this "&c." includes or what it does not include. In the next place, I am not satisfied that the other terms of the alleged agreement are completely intelligible, or such as could be compelled to be carried into execution. But assuming that papers A. and C. comprise all that is necessary for constituting a binding contract, the question remains, are they to be acceded to, inasmuch as they are not signed, but only proposed to David Rees as the conditions upon which the coal mines were to be let? The absence of a signed agreement was endeavoured to be overcome by the letter C, which letter, however, only refers to the coal at one of the two places mentioned in the exhibit A. The agreement referred to in this letter is alleged to be the document marked A, which, I may remark, is no agreement at all. However, it might perhaps be too strict criticism to decide on the absence of identity merely on such grounds. It is a more important observation that there were two papers, namely, the exhibits A and Z, in Mr. Cuthbertson's office, each of which might with equal propriety, if with propriety at all, answer the description in this letter. It is therefore unnecessary further to examine what is the meaning of the paper marked A, since we cannot assume that it was the document referred to as the agreement in Mr. Cuthbertson's hands, because of the uncertainty thus introduced.—[His Lordship then made reference to the Statute of Frauds, and proceeded.]—But this is not the whole case against the plaintiff. This colliery belongs to two persons in undivided moieties. The plaintiff filed his bill against both, alleging that the contract was binding against both, but by an alternative prayer he prayed relief against one, if he should fail to establish his claim against the two. The bill was afterwards dismissed against Mary Jenkins, leaving only the owner of the other share. But the owner of the other share never meant to contract for one share alone: if he intended to contract at all, he intended for a lease of the whole colliery. I can conceive cases where a person who has contracted to convey more than it is in his power to convey, ought to be decreed to convey what he can, either with or without making compensation to the vendee for such part of the subject-matter of the contract as the vendor is unable to convey. A lease of an undivided moiety of a colliery is a very different thing from a lease of a whole colliery, and here there is no ground of impropriety or misrepresentation, as by holding himself out as capable of contracting for the whole, or in fact any other ground, for enabling the Court to act against the owner of one undivided share.

The only question which remains is, as to the costs of this appeal, and complaints have been made of the defence. There are numerous cases in which the plaintiff's case failing, it does not fail with all costs, but there the course of the plaintiff ought to be clear. Here, there is no case whatever against the defendant, and nothing for dividing or giving less than the whole costs. There was never any pretence for filing the bill at all.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I am of the same opinion. The Vice Chancellor seems to have gone on the ground that there was no agreement capable of being enforced. The agreement relied on is in two respects deficient. I am not satisfied what that paper is which is referred to in the letter of the 15th of April 1843, as "the agreement in Mr. Cuthbertson's hands;" and if the document A. be that paper, I am of opinion that the terms of it are too ambiguous for this Court to carry into effect. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

June 5, 6, 24. } OF GLOUCESTER.

Charity—Bequest to build and endow, conditional on a Gift of Land—Mortmain—Stat. 9 Geo. 2. c. 36.

*J. O. by his will, directed his trustees, after the decease of his wife, to transfer funds of the value of 8,000*l.* sterling to the corporation of G, and a like sum of 8,000*l.* to the corporate bodies of C, T. and W, upon trust in each case thereout to raise 1,300*l.* and lay out the same in the foundation, building, and furnishing a hospital or almshouse for the city of G, and each of the other places, C, T. and W, in the event of any land being given or granted to the corporation for the purpose of his charity within the period of ten years next after his decease, under the provisions of 9 Geo. 2. c. 36. And he declared that no part of the trust monies should be applied in the purchase of land; and in the event of no land being granted within the ten years, then the principal trust monies incapable of being applied, were to fall into his residuary estate. Land as a site for the hospital was conveyed to the corporation of G, and to each of the corporate bodies of C, T. and W, shortly before the expiration of the ten years, but the deed conveying the land to the corporation of G, was not enrolled until five days after the ten years had expired:—Held, that the deeds conveying the land were good under the 9 Geo. 2. c. 36. That a bequest made on an inducement to third parties to convey land in mortmain, and not to take effect unless land should be conveyed accordingly, was void: and that a bequest which tended directly to bring fresh lands into mortmain was void: and that a bequest of money to be expended in the erection or repair of buildings was void, unless an intention was clearly expressed that the money was to be expended upon land already in mortmain.*

John Ollney, by his will, dated the 3rd of January 1836, gave unto Henry Trye, Thomas Hinney and William King, their executors and administrators, the sum of 36,000*l.* secured to him by a contract with William King, and also a sum of 5,000*l.* secured to him by the bond of the Rev. Henry Maxwell, upon trust to get in and invest the same in government stocks or funds, and accumulate the dividends during the life of his wife Johanna, and after her decease, then to transfer so much of the said trust funds as should be equal in value to the sum of 8,000*l.* sterling into the names of the mayor and corporation of the city of Gloucester, who should stand possessed thereof upon the trusts and for the purposes thereafter declared of and concerning the same, (that is to say) upon trust that they, the said mayor and corporation, did and should thereout in the first place raise the sum of 1,300*l.*, and he directed that in the event of any land being given or granted to the said mayor and corporation of Gloucester for the purposes of his charity, within the period of ten years next after his decease, under the provisions of the 9 Geo. 2. c. 36, intituled "An Act to restrain the disposition of lands, whereby the same became inalienable," be laid out and expended in or towards the erecting and building, finishing and rendering habitable, a substantial hospital or almshouse for the city of Gloucester, according to the scheme or plan which he had drawn up and signed for the due regulation of those hospitals or almshouses which he intended should be founded and established in due time after his decease. And he directed that the residue of the said sum of 8,000*l.* should be held for the benefit of the city of Gloucester upon the trusts declared by him in his scheme or plan for the foundation and endowment of the respective almshouses.

The testator then directed the trustees for the time being of his will, as the trust monies and the accumulations should be sufficient, to transfer so much as should be equal to 8,000*l.* sterling into the names of the corporate body, or if none, into the names of the minister and churchwardens of each place thereafter mentioned, that is to say, Cheltenham, Tewkesbury and Winchcomb, who were to stand possessed thereof upon trusts similar to those before declared of the 8,000*l.* directed to be transferred to the mayor and corporation of Gloucester.

"Provided always, and he thereby declared that no part of the said trust monies, stocks, funds or securities should be in any respect applied, or attempted to be applied, for the purpose of procuring or purchasing land upon which to build or erect any of the said hospitals or almshouses."

"Provided always, and he further declared that in the event of no land or site being respectively granted or conveyed for the purposes aforesaid within the period of ten years next after his decease, then and thenceforth so much of the said principal trust monies, funds and securities as should eventually become incapable of being applied for the purposes aforesaid, should sink into his residuary personal estate for the benefit of his residuary legatees."

The testator then gave several small charitable legacies, and directed that they should be paid out of his monies and other personal estate not arising from or secured upon land. And as to all the rest and residue of his said trust monies, stocks, funds and securities, subject to any further legacies he might give by any codicil to his will, he gave the same to his wife Johanna, Margaret Powell and William King for their own benefit as tenants in common; and he appointed his trustees executors of his will.

A testamentary paper, duly executed and attested, was annexed to the will, containing a scheme for the management of the almshouses intended to be founded. The testator died on the 16th of January 1836, having made and published a codicil to his will, dated the 9th of January 1836, which did not affect the question in the cause, and both the will and codicil were proved by all the executors on the 2nd of March 1836.

This suit was instituted by the trustees, on the 31st of May 1848, asking the Court to declare whether the bequests made by the testator of the four sums of 8,000*l.* each were valid; and if so, for proper directions as to the course they should pursue with respect to the monies.

The Master, by his report, dated the 23rd of April 1850, in pursuance of a reference made to him on the 15th of December 1849, found that by four several indentures, dated respectively the 12th of January 1846, the 13th of January 1846, the 12th of January 1846, and the 13th of January 1846, four several pieces of land near Gloucester, Cheltenham, Tewkesbury, and Winchcomb, had been conveyed by several parties to the persons pointed out by the testator, in order that almshouses and hospitals might be built thereon, and that the whole of these indentures were enrolled, in compliance with the provisions of the Mortmain Act, prior to the 16th of January 1846, except the indenture by which the land, intended for the site of the hospital at Gloucester, was conveyed to the mayor and corporation of Gloucester; this indenture was not enrolled until the 21st of January 1846, which exceeded by five days the period of ten years from the day of the death of the testator. In each of these cases the grantors survived twelve months after each of the deeds severally executed by them, and that the several pieces of land had been given since the death of the testator, with the intention of giving effect to the purpose of the testator's charities.

The questions raised were, first, whether a gift of money to be applied for erecting, building, furnishing, and rendering habitable a hospital, in case land for that purpose should be given by a third party, was valid; and, secondly, whether, assuming such gift to be valid, the conditions specified by the testator in his will, requiring grants to be made for the purpose of his charities within ten years had been complied with.

Mr. Kenyon Parker and Mr. Elderton, for the plaintiffs, the trustees, and executors, stated the facts.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Lewin, for the corporation of Gloucester.—It may be considered as clearly established, that unless a testator distinctly points to some land in mortmain, the Court will consider that he means an interest in land to be purchased, and the gift will be invalid; that principle was laid down in the cases of The Attorney General v. Tyndall (1), The Attorney General v. Davies (2), Mather v. Scott (3), and Dixon v. Butler (4), but in this case the testator has declared that no portion of his property shall be laid out in the purchase of land, and has made his gift conditional upon land being legally in mortmain within the term of ten years after his decease. It was therefore open for a charity with lands already in mortmain to come forward within the time specified by the testator, and appropriate land for the purpose of erecting the almshouses, and it was also open for any person to give a piece of land for that purpose: in either case the object of the testator could be accomplished, as the land being in mortmain the money might be expended. The policy of the law allows bequests for the erection of hospitals and almshouses if lands are to be obtained for that purpose—The Attorney General v. Bowles (5). In Giblett v. Hobson (6) the bequest of a sum of money generally to build almshouses failed only because there was no land upon which they could be built, and the direction to build was considered as a direction to purchase. In this case the testator contemplated the formation of a fund auxiliary to others, and as an aid to other donations, and upon the presumption that other persons would assist in finding the house or land for the almshouses—Henshaw v. Atkinson (7), The Attorney General v. Hinzman (8). The gift of the testator was distinct and independent of the grant of the land, and neither depended upon the other, the condition in the will being no portion of the gift. A gift to repair almshouses already in mortmain is valid—The Attorney General v. Parsons (9), Johnston v. Swann (10), and The Attorney General v. Nash (11). In cases also where the Court can see the intention of the testator, and that it is wholly distinct from the Statute of Mortmain, it will not allow the bequest to fail on account of the frame of the gift—Simon v. Barber (12) and Hayter v. Trego (13). And here the land might be considered as conveyed to a corporation, under the 39

Eliz. c. 5. ss. 1, 3. and 4, which was made perpetual by the 21 Jac. 1. c. 1: those acts, for the purposes of a hospital, enabled persons seised in fee of lands to create a corporation and endow it with lands to the value of 200*l.* a year, and not less than 10*l.* In this case the deeds have been duly enrolled in Chancery in compliance with the provisions of the acts, and of the 9 Geo. 2. c. 36. There is, therefore, property upon which the gift of the testator will attach, so that with these powers in existence the whole intention and policy of the law shall be carried out. It will, no doubt, be argued that the corporation of Gloucester, or any other of the charities, has not any land as a site for the hospital, and that the deeds have not been duly enrolled: but enrolment was the act of the grantee—Taylor v. Jones (14), and might be done without the concurrence of the grantor. As, therefore, the donor has survived the execution of the deeds twelve months, their validity cannot be questioned. The enrolment was made within the six calendar months from the date—Gilberton Uses, 209, Sug. ed., and upon the principle acted upon under the 27 Hen. 8. c. 16, no ejectment could be maintained between the date of the deed and the enrolment—Dymmock's case (15), and upon enrolment the deed became valid from its day of execution.

whether there was an indirect intention that land should be purchased out of the money—The Attorney General v. Davies, The Attorney General v. Nash, The Attorney General v. Hyde (18). In Henshaw v. Atkinson the bequest was supported on account of the negative words, that the money was not to be laid out in land; but here the bequest was made a direct inducement to draw lands into mortmain. It was a condition precedent to the gift, and related to no particular parcel of land; it was a purchase in fact, the value for which was the intended outlay. In The Attorney General v. Downing (19), the devise was before the 9 Geo. 2. c. 36, and there it was considered necessary to obtain a licence from the Crown to take in mortmain, and the decree was conditional. The gift of the land in this case was not complete at the time indicated by the testator; the deeds were not duly enrolled, and until enrolment the estate was not legally vested in the grantees, and had they never been enrolled the bargainor would have continued seised—2 Com. Dig. tit. 'Bargain and Sale,' (B, 6). Until, therefore, the enrolment did take place, the estate was in abeyance—2 Inst. 674. It appears that all the grantors of these lands have lived a year after the execution of the several deeds; but have the conveyances satisfied the intention of the testator? The Court will not look into futurity to determine whether the gifts were severally good. The testator has named ten years, and the Court will not extend that time a day, and certainly not add to it the year which the grantors must live to render the gifts valid—Matthews v. Venables (20). Such gifts must be construed strictly and the condition be complied with—Tulk v. Houlditch (21), and here perfect and not inchoate gifts were contemplated. The reference was not to the gift being made, but to its being perfected. Assuming, therefore, that any of the gifts failed, who was entitled to that gift? The testator, as between the legatees, directed no abatement. The first named were to be satisfied in full; the failure, therefore, of any one of the legacies would carry that legacy direct into the residuary estate. On the whole, it appears that the gift to the charities has failed, and the residuary legatees are entitled to the legacies.

Mr. Lloyd, in reply.

June 24.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.
—The first question raised in this case is, whether the deeds which have been executed conveying the land for the purpose of these several charities can be considered as coming within the directions contained in this will, as it was impossible, on the day the ten years expired, to say that the conveyances had been perfected; and with respect to Gloucester in particular, from the circumstance of the non-enrolment, it was as it is alleged incomplete. With respect to all those points, I do not think any doubt exists, and that whatever might be the state of the property during the intermediate period that elapsed between the execution of the grant and the ultimate enrolment within six months and the survivorship of the grantors for twelve months, all the authorities, as well as reason and principle, concur in saying, that whether the deeds are made good or bad by the compliance or non-compliance with the necessary conditions imposed by the statute, the validity or invalidity must, for all purposes, date from the day of the execution of the deeds. I am therefore of opinion, that as the deeds were duly enrolled within the six months, and as the grantors all survived for twelve months after the date of the respective conveyances, the deeds were good and effectual deeds from the day of their due execution, and that in particular the deed conveying the land to the corporation of Gloucester was, on the 12th of January 1846, and has since continued to be, a good and effectual conveyance for all purposes. I consider this to be so well settled that I have been unwilling to go through the authorities cited at the bar, more particularly as I shall have to refer to several with reference to the subsequent part of the case. The circumstance that the grantors might defeat the conveyances (upon which I give no opinion) by conveying the land to a purchaser for valuable consideration does not, in my opinion, affect the question. If the conveyance had taken place before the will of the testator, and he had directed the money to be laid out on the lands so conveyed, I should not have hesitated to consider the bequest good,—and yet the same question might have arisen if the grantor of the land had been then alive.

The remaining question is, whether the bequest is good, having regard to the Statute of Mortmain, and to the circumstance that the bequest is made on condition that lands should be granted for the purpose of enabling the bequest to be carried into effect. This depends entirely upon the principle to be extracted from the numerous decisions which have been pronounced on the construction of this statute, 9 Geo. 2. c. 36. To make the conclusion I have arrived at intelligible, I shall refer to many of these cases and state the points as they have arisen, and I shall also state how far I consider the law to be settled. These authorities I consider establish conclusively two propositions: first, that a bequest to lay out money in the erection of buildings, without more, pre-supposes that a portion of the bequest must be applied in the purchase of land for this purpose; and that this, therefore, comes within the prohibition contained in the Statute of Mortmain, and that the bequest is void: secondly, that a bequest to lay out money in the erection or repair of buildings upon land already in mortmain is not within the prohibition, but is a valid and effectual bequest.

The question I have to consider is, whether the bequest is good when it is so framed as to induce some other person to give land in mortmain, and where the testator provides that the bequest is not to take effect unless the inducement so held out shall prove effectual. The authorities which bear directly or indirectly on this subject are very numerous; and I think it necessary shortly to notice those that bear directly upon the subject. The first case is Sorreaby v. Hollins (22). In that case a direction to secure an annuity to the poor of Leeke, "either by purchase of lands of inheritance, or otherwise as the executors should be advised," was held by Lord Hardwicke to be a good bequest, by reason of the words "or otherwise"; and he stated, that "upon this act of parliament there is no authority to construe a bequest to be void if by law it can possibly be made good"; and I cite this case rather for this observation as to the construction of the bequest with reference to the statute, than for the point expressly decided. In Cantwell v. Baker (23) the bequest of residue to trustees "in order to and towards erecting a school," was held by Lord Hardwicke to be a good bequest. In Vaughan v. Farrer (24) Lord Hardwicke also held, that a bequest of personal estate for erecting a hospital was not void within the statute. In The Attorney General v. Bowles a testator gave 500*l.* "upon trust to lay out part thereof in erecting a small school-house, and a little house adjoining for the master to live in, the whole purchase and building not to exceed 200*l.*, the remaining 300*l.* to be laid out in the purchase of land, or in some real security, for the maintenance of master." Lord Hardwicke held, according to the report in Vesey, sen., that the 300*l.* was void; "but as to the 200*l.*, if they could get a piece of ground by the gift or generosity of any person—not by purchase—they might be at liberty to apply to the Court to lay out that 200*l.* in erecting a school-house thereon." As to this it may be observed, that Lord Hardwicke has expressed in his judgment nearly what the testator has here expressed in his will. It is clear, therefore, consistently with that case, and with the cases I have already cited, if it is law, that this would be a good bequest. According, however, to the report in Aikyns, Lord Hardwicke held that the money could only be laid out in case there existed some piece of land in mortmain already in the parish, on which the school might be erected. In Glubb v. the Attorney General (25) a bequest to build a parsonage-house on existing glebe was held by Sir Thomas Clarke to be a good bequest.

The Attorney General v. Tyndall, of which I have three reports—one in Ambl. 614, a second in 2 Eden, 207, and also some private manuscript notes, which came to me from the possession of my father, (23) Cited 2 Ves. sen. 185.

(but by whom those notes were made I am unable to state)—has been considered a sort of leading authority upon the subject, and appears to have been the subject of repeated comment in the subsequent cases. It certainly altered the precise law, as it is to be gathered from the decisions which I have already referred to, and it contains some propositions which have not received confirmation. The testatrix in that case expressly directed land to be purchased, and almshouses to be erected on the land so purchased: so that there was little doubt but that, according to all the authorities, the gift, so far as regarded the purchase of land, was bad; and the other gift depending on that would fail also, and would have been so decided by Lord Hardwicke, and Lord Henley accordingly so decided, and in doing so, though it was not necessary for his decision, he laid the rule down broadly thus—that a bequest to lay out money in erecting buildings, even if the land is already in mortmain, would be bad, “because building on an existing site is laying out the money in realty, and therefore contrary to the spirit of the statute: it improves the site, is demandable in a præcipe, and is a purchase of so much realty.” This is certainly not law, according to the modern decisions; and the importance of this decision is rather from the manner in which it has been treated by subsequent Judges, for the observations of Lord Henley were not necessary to the decision; and he seems also to have felt some little warmth in deciding the case with reference to his observations in the House of Lords. It is true, in the case in Eden it is stated that that does not appear in the manuscript note, and is supposed not to have been stated; but in the manuscript note which I have of the judgment, which is evidently a third report, the same observations are contained. It is possible, therefore, he might have thought that it was desirable to omit that subsequently. In the subsequent case also of The Attorney General v. Downing, Lord Northampton seems desirous to support the case of The Attorney General v. Bowles, for he states that that case and the case of The Attorney General v. Tyndall are not inconsistent with each other; and in the decision I think they are not so.

In the case of Pelham v. Anderson (26), a bequest to “build and endow an hospital,” was held to be void; and in Brodie v. the Duke of Chandos a bequest to build a new parsonage-house on land already in mortmain was held to be good. In The Attorney General v. Hyde the testatrix gave 1,500*l.* to be laid out under the direction of the minister and churchwardens of Royston, for erecting a free school, and that when built 2,000*l.* should be applied for the support of it. It appeared that there was a piece of land in Royston already in mortmain, on a part of which there was a school-house standing, and which might be applicable for this purpose. Lord Apsley in his judgment reviewed the former decisions, and laid down this as the broad distinction:—that a gift to build on land already in mortmain was good, but a gift to build generally imported buying as well as building, and was therefore bad; and he held, that The Attorney General v. Bowles had been overruled by The Attorney General v. Tyndall. I consider the law as to this point to be in a great measure settled by this case. This distinction which he pointed out has prevailed since in all the subsequent cases. In The Attorney General v. Nash a bequest to build a school was held to be void, and a demurrer to the information was allowed accordingly; and so Lord Eldon states in 8 Ves. 191, solely upon the ground of the presumption already stated, that you ought to infer, where the testator is silent, that he meant land to be purchased. In The Attorney General v. Whitechurch, Lord Loughborough held that The Attorney General v. Bowles had been shaken by subsequent authorities, and he concurred in dissenting from it. Chapman v. Brown (27) and The Attorney General v. Parsons repeated and confirmed that a bequest of money to be laid out in making or repairing a building was good, so far as applicable to land already in mortmain, but bad to the extent that it went beyond that. But the latter contains a remarkable expression in Lord Eldon's judgment, which, to some extent, is favourable to the case of the charities in this case.

(26) 2 Eden, 296.(27) 6 Ves. 404.

He says, "I agree with the late cases, which go a great way to establish that the Court cannot put such a construction upon the word 'erect' as was put upon that word in former cases, and that prima facie the testator must be taken to mean by that word, that land shall be bought. I think the good sense is with the later cases, requiring that the testator himself should have manifested his purpose to be sufficiently answered if they could hire or beg land, according to the expressions in the different cases." I will consider the effect of this expression when I comment upon the case of Henshaw v. Atkinson; but, taking these words by themselves, it would appear as if Lord Eldon thought, that if the testator pointed out they might hire or beg the land, that would make a good bequest. The Attorney General v. Davies is a very important case. There a testator gave a "sum of 5,000*l.*, more or less, as it may be wanted, to build twelve almshouses, purchase the ground, six for poor men, and six for poor women, economy and convenience to be observed in the structure." Then he also gave as follows:—"After the foregoing bequests are discharged, and anything further that may occur of that sort, I give all the remainder of my property for the use of the Orphan School in the City Road, under the direction of the committee of that school for the time being, provided they will furnish a piece of ground near the school, to build the aforesaid houses on, and the committee to take the management of them and all my affairs, which is not great; and if it is not agreeable or convenient for them to do so, I request the following to accept of the trouble of fulfilling my desire." Then he makes some further statement. Sir William Grant held this to be void, on the ground that the residue was given to the charity on condition that they furnished the ground. He states, "It is unnecessary to consider how far that opinion, contrary to Lord Hardwicke's, may be well founded; for the provision of this will is not merely that if land shall be given these almshouses shall be built, but he proposes to the committee a gift, and offers them the residue as a consideration for their furnishing land for his almshouses, and taking the management of them and his affairs." It would take me too long to read the reasons for his coming to that conclusion. Lord Eldon, in affirming this judgment, makes this observation, (9 Ves. p. 544), which is of great importance, "Whatever were the decisions formerly, when charity in this court received more than fair consideration, it is now clearly established, and I am glad it has come back to some common sense, that unless the testator distinctly points to some land already in mortmain, the Court will understand him to mean that an interest in land is to be purchased, and the gift is not good." In Johnston v. Swann it was held, that a sum of money that was left to be invested, and the dividends applied in providing a school-house, was good, inasmuch as this bequest pointed to hiring the school-house, and not to putting any land in mortmain. And in the case of Henshaw v. Atkinson, which was decided five months before by the same Judge, a case which at first sight appears to have a very material and controlling effect upon this case, the testator states his wish that a blue-coat school shall be erected at Oldham, and a blind asylum at Manchester, and he gives 20,000*l.* in trust to trustees for the use of each of the charities, and directs that the monies shall not be applied in the purchase of lands, it being his expectation that other persons will, at their expense, purchase lands and buildings for those purposes; and then he gave all the remainder of his personal estate in trust for these charities. He afterwards, by his codicil, points out that he does not expect that any land whatever shall be given. The reasons given, in the printed report, by the Vice Chancellor for his decisions are not, to my mind, very full or satisfactory, but he seems to have decided it solely upon the ground that the second codicil shewed, that although originally the testator might have contemplated that land would be required for the purpose of the charities, yet afterwards, when he made his second codicil, he was of a different opinion; he, therefore, directed only the interest to be paid to the trustees for the maintenance and the support of the charities. This was commented upon by Sir Thomas Plumer, in the case of The Attorney General v. Hinzman, which is only material so far as it relates to this point. In The Attorney General v. Hinzman there was a bequest, which would have been good as it stood originally, but being inseparably connected with one that was bad, the whole failed. Sir Thomas Plumer said, in giving his judgment, that "if the case could be brought up to that of Henshaw v. Atkinson, where there were negative words shewing the intention to be, what is contended for here, that the money should not be applied to purchase or keep in repair any real estate,—if it appeared, as it did then, that the bequest was intended to form an auxiliary fund, to go in aid of other donations, on the supposition that some other person would give a house, we should then be relieved from the difficulty." These observations shew that Sir Thomas Plumer did not consider that the decision in the case of Henshaw v. Atkinson established anything more than this proposition, namely, that a bequest in favour of a charity expressly directing that no portion of the bequest should be applied to land, but providing that if, at any future time, some person should give land to the charity, this bequest might be made available in erecting or repairing buildings on that land, was a good bequest, and one of which this Court would execute the trusts. Assuming that to be decided, it is very much in accordance with the supposed case suggested by Lord Eldon, in his judgment in The Attorney General v. Parsons, to which I have already referred. It would also be very near the present case, and yet it would be scarcely consistent with the rule laid down by Lord Eldon in The Attorney General v. Davies, which I have already read. If that rule is to be carried to its fullest extent, still it would not be conclusive of the present case, as some material distinctions exist between that case and the present. The bequest in Henshaw v. Atkinson was to take effect at all events, even though no land should be obtained; and no portion was to be applied in obtaining land, nor any direct encouragement held out for that purpose. But in the case before me, though it is directed that no portion of the bequest is to be expended in the purchase of land, yet the bequest is to fail altogether unless land can be obtained from other persons to be put in mortmain, and it is expressly conditional on that event. This has never been decided to be good, and is, as I have already stated, opposed to the dicta which I have read of Lord Eldon.

In Pritchard v. Arbouin (28) Lord Lyndhurst stated the rule to be as laid down by Lord Eldon, namely, that "unless the testator distinctly pointed to some land which was already in mortmain," a bequest to build could not be sustained. Giblett v. Hobson is an important and material case, but principally for the observations contained in the judgment. The bequest was in these words:—"I give and bequeath to the Butchers' Charitable Institution the sum of 5,000*l.*, towards building almshouses to the said institution." This was held to be void, in conformity with the older cases, because it assumed that land must be purchased in order to enable the legacy to take effect. Though the decision in that case does not positively bear upon the present, some of the observations of Lord Brougham are very important and material as to the general policy of the act. He observes, that "placing land in mortmain is the object against which the act is pointed: but then money is equally forbidden to be devised for the purpose of buying land, because that would indirectly put the land purchased in mortmain. So charitable bequests, to be invested in real securities, are equally forbidden, in consequence of their tendency to bring land by foreclosure into the perpetual ownership of a corporate mortgagee." It appears, therefore, to have been Lord Brougham's opinion, that any bequest which directly tended to put land in mortmain would be a contravention of the statute.

Mather v. Scott is a most important case: the bequest there was, "As to all the residue of my property, I give the same to the chaplains of His Majesty's Dockyard at Devonport, and of the Royal Hospital of Stonehouse, in conjunction with my executors, with a request that they will be pleased to entreat the lord of the manor, either at Devonport or East Stonehouse, to grant a spot of ground suitable for the erection of as many decent dwellings or rooms." And then it provides how they are to be built. The testator evidently did not here contemplate the purchase of land. He does not expressly prohibit it, but he expects that the land can be obtained, to use the expression of Lord Eldon in The Attorney General v. Parsons, by begging from the lord of the manor. Lord Langdale went carefully through the authorities. He did not, as it appears to me, consider the casual expressions of Lord Eldon in The Attorney General v. Parsons, nor the case of Henshaw v. Atkinson, as conclusive on the case; but, on the contrary, having reviewed all the cases, he laid down the rule thus: that the bequest was void unless it pointed expressly to land already in mortmain. He then adds this passage, which, if it be the law, is decisive, in my opinion, of the present case. It is at the end of his judgment:—"It is said, that the direction of the trustees, to be pleased to entreat the lord to grant a piece of ground, does not bring this case within the principle; but I am of opinion that, if the testator intended to exclude a purchase, he has failed to express his intention, and that it is contrary to the policy of the Mortmain Act to permit testamentary gifts of money to be laid out on land as an inducement to draw land into mortmain. I am of opinion, upon the first point, that the language of the bequest is not sufficiently express; and, upon the second, that the charitable gift must fail."

There is but one further authority to which I intend to advert, but before I do so I pause to consider the effect of the cases to which I have already referred. The current of the later decisions at least has been express, bearing stronger and stronger, and concluding with the last, that whatever acts as a direct inducement to put land in mortmain is a void bequest; and, with the exception of the case of Henshaw v. Atkinson, on which I express no opinion as to whether that case would now receive the same decision as it did then, but which, as it appears to me, is easily distinguishable, so as to be consistent with all the other decisions, though not possibly with all the dicta to be found in those cases, the rule to be deduced from these decisions, laying aside some casual expressions, appears to be as stated by Lord Eldon in the case of The Attorney General v. Davies, to which I have already referred, that unless the testator distinctly points to some land already in mortmain, the Court will understand him to mean that an interest in land is to be purchased, and that the gift is not good; and this rule is confirmed by Lord Lyndhurst and Lord Langdale. I am therefore of opinion that I could not declare this legacy to be good, without being prepared to state my opinion that the cases of Mather v. Scott and The Attorney General v. Davies, decided by Lord Langdale, Sir William Grant and Lord Eldon, were not law—at least to this extent, that the case of Mather v. Scott was not law; and with respect to the second case, that the dicta in it would not be considered law, unless very much restricted in respect of what is there laid down.

The difficulty in this case, however, is not, in my opinion, concluded, for there still remains one case on which I must make two or three observations. This is the case of Dixon v. Butler. This case, as it stands reported, is one of a very singular description. As it appears to me, no arguable question in reality existed. In that case, the bequest was expressly made good by the statute 43 Geo. 3. c. 108, which had been passed by the legislature precisely to meet bequests of that nature; because, in the opinion of the legislature and of conveyancers, such bequests would be invalid unless sanctioned by statute; and yet the counsel seem to have argued the case, and the Court seems to have reserved its judgment, in entire ignorance of the existence of that statute. The learned Judge accordingly, in giving judgment, having apparently observed the statute subsequently to the argument, states, at the close of his observations, that the statute 43 Geo. 3. c. 108. determines the question in the case. His previous observations, therefore, are rather to be considered as obiter dicta, than as actually deciding the point. They are, however, from the ability of that learned Judge, entitled to the greatest weight. He states the principle of all the cases to be this : "But I apprehend, where a testator gives money to be laid out on land already purchased by others for such building, or on land to be given by a third person for that purpose, and the trustees have only authority to lay out the money in building on such land so procured, and cannot employ it in procuring such land, the bequest, if such an object appear clearly from the language used in the testator's will, is good. For then the word 'build' is not to be taken in its extended sense, as including the purchase of the land, but is by the language of the testator applied specially to the mere cost of erecting, as contradistinguished from procuring the land on which such erection is to take place." With the greatest respect and deference to the opinion of that learned Judge, I cannot say that I have come to the same conclusion as to the result of the previous cases; and I cannot reconcile the observations I have just read with what was decided by Lord Langdale in Mather v. Scott; with what was laid down by Lord Brougham in Giblett v. Hobson—neither of which cases appears to have been cited before the learned Baron; nor can I reconcile it with the principle laid down by Lord Eldon in The Attorney General v. Davies, nor by Lord Lyndhurst in Prichard v. Arbouin.

I am therefore unable to reconcile this with the former authorities—I mean the later authorities—because the earlier decisions of Lord Hardwicke undoubtedly would support that view of the case.

If I agreed with it on principle, and dissented from the other authorities, I should even then feel great difficulty in resisting what appears to me to be so strong a body of decision by such learned Judges; but as I concur with the principle enunciated by those decisions, and as I believe that the only clear and intelligible mode of construing the Statute of Mortmain, so as to give it a consistent rule and a test easily applied by which to ascertain the validity of bequests of this nature, is by adopting the rule laid down in those authorities, I am compelled to follow them in that which I consider they have decided. In order to facilitate an appeal in this case, and in order that the grounds of my decision may be as clear and distinct as I can make them, I state my opinion to be, that, according to the decided cases and the true construction of the 9 Geo. 2. c. 36, a bequest is void which tends directly to bring fresh land into mortmain; and also, that a bequest of money, to be expended in the erection or repair of buildings, is void also, unless the testator in his will expressly states his intention that the money so bequeathed is to be expended upon some land already in mortmain. This bequest, in my opinion, offends against both these principles. It is therefore, in my opinion, void; and I am prepared to make a declaration to that effect, and to give the consequential directions.

I cannot, however, conclude this case without observing that it is of great importance that the principle on which gifts to charities can be supported should be settled; and that, as this is a case, in which the property is of large amount, it would, in my opinion, be a very proper case to carry to a higher tribunal; and with this view, and to assist the parties against whom I decide, I have endeavoured to make the grounds of my decision as plain as possible. This is a matter, however, to be left to their discretion. I can only make the decree as I have already stated, and give the costs of all parties out of the estate.

WARDE v. WARDE.

Baron and Feme—Solicitor and Client—Production of Documents.

The plaintiff being the wife of the principal defendant, filed a bill against her husband, alleging that by their marriage settlement a particular estate was charged with a jointure on her behalf; that she afterwards signed a deed exonerating that estate from the jointure, upon the understanding that it was to be charged on another estate, and that during the preparation of that deed the solicitor of the husband acted also on her behalf, and that she had no other legal advice. The decree prayed was that the second estate might be charged with the jointure. The husband, by his answer, stated that the transaction relative to the release of the jointure was conducted by the solicitor solely on his behalf, and the solicitor stated that the plaintiff had no separate solicitor or counsel, and acted only under the opinion of the husband's legal advisers:—Held, (reversing the decision of the Court below) that the solicitor was to be deemed the solicitor of the wife as well as of the husband; and that the wife had a right to the inspection of all documents which came into the solicitor's possession in relation to and during that employment.

Semble—Where husband and wife have distinct interests, and the wife is induced, in dealing with those interests, to act under the advice of a solicitor employed and paid by the husband, the solicitor will be deemed to act as the solicitor both of the husband and wife.

This was the renewal of a motion, which had been refused by the Vice Chancellor Lord Cranworth, for the production of certain documents referred to in the answer of the defendants Charles Thomas Warde and Henry Bury his solicitor (1).

The case may be stated shortly as follows.

By deeds of October 1834, being the settlements executed previously to the marriage of the defendant C. T. Warde with the plaintiff, certain estates in Warwickshire were charged with a jointure of 1,000*l.* a-year in favour of the plaintiff, in case she should survive her husband; and a power was reserved to C. T. Warde to substitute other estates in lieu of the Warwickshire estates as a security for the jointure. On the 29th of November 1844, C. T. Warde contracted for the purchase of an estate in Bedfordshire, called the Luton Hoo estate, for the sum of 150,000*l.*; and by the terms of the contract, 5,000*l.* was to be paid down at the time of signing, and a further sum of 50,000*l.* on the 25th of March 1845; and in default of such payment of the last-mentioned sum, the sale was to be void, and the 5,000*l.* forfeited to the vendor. C. T. Warde being desirous of selling the Warwickshire estates for the purpose of raising funds to pay for the Luton Hoo estate, the plaintiff released the Warwickshire estates from the jointure of 1,000*l.* a year, on C. T. Warde covenanting to secure the same upon such real estates as he should thereafter acquire. C. T. Warde afterwards sold the Warwickshire estates, and out of the proceeds of such sale, paid the 50,000*l.*, part of the purchase-money of the Luton Hoo estate, and was let into possession; but he declined to charge it with the jointure of 1,000*l.* The bill was filed by Mrs. Warde against her husband, the surviving trustee of the settlement, Henry Bury (who was the solicitor of C. T. Warde in the transaction) and others, and it charged that at the time of the execution of the deed by which the Warwickshire estates were released from the jointure, it was understood by all parties that the Luton Hoo estate was to be charged with the same, and that on the faith of that being done, the plaintiff had executed and acknowledged the deed: and that the cases laid before counsel and the instructions for the preparation of the deeds, and the correspondence would, if produced, evidence the fact; and that the plaintiff entered into the arrangements and executed the release under the advice of the solicitor and counsel of C. T. Warde, and without having any other legal advice. The bill then charged that the defendants or some or one of them had in their possession or power, or in the possession or power of their solicitors or agents, divers deeds and cases for the opinion of counsel, and instructions to counsel for the preparation and settlement of deeds, letters and other papers relating to the matters aforesaid, or some or one of them, by which the truth thereof would appear; and that they ought to produce the same. The bill prayed a specific performance of the contract to charge the Luton Hoo estate with the jointure of 1,000*l.*

The defendant, C. T. Warde, by his answer, admitted that the release of the Warwickshire estates from the jointure was made for facilitating the sale of the same, and for enabling him to complete the purchase of the Luton Hoo estate, but that there was no contract or understanding that the Luton Hoo estate should be charged with the jointure; and he admitted that previously to the execution of the release of the 20th of September 1845, divers cases for the opinion of counsel, and instructions for the preparation of the necessary deeds, were laid before counsel, and that considerable correspondence relating thereto did pass between the defendant and his legal advisers; but he insisted that he was not bound to produce the same, having reference to the matters in issue in the cause; and he admitted that the plaintiff executed the said release under the advice of the solicitors and counsel of the defendant without having any other legal adviser. The second schedule to the answer contained a list of cases for the opinion of counsel, and the opinions thereon, and letters passing between the defendant and his solicitors relating to the matters at issue in this suit; and the second part of the same schedule consisted of cases, opinions and letters respectively, stated, given and written, after the dispute between the plaintiff and the defendant had arisen; and the defendant submitted that he ought not to be compelled to produce any of the particulars contained in the said second schedule.

The defendant, H. Bury, by his answer admitted that the plaintiff had no separate solicitor or counsel; but he insisted that the documents in question came into his hands as solicitor of Mr. Warde alone, and that he could not without a violation of professional confidence disclose the contents of the same.

Mr. Stuart and Mr. Dickinson, in support of the motion, contended that, previously to the execution of the release, no dispute had arisen between the plaintiff and her husband, but there was a community of interest; and that the opinions were taken, and the instructions were given on behalf of both parties; and that the plaintiff, having acted throughout under the advice of her husband's solicitor, without having any separate legal advice, must be taken to have a joint interest with her husband in the documents in question; and they referred to

It does not necessarily follow that because the plaintiff employed no other solicitor, the defendant's solicitor was her solicitor; and the defendant Bury, by his answer, says that he got possession of the documents as the confidential adviser of the husband alone, and the plaintiff must take that statement as she finds it.

Mr. Stuart replied.

August 5, 1851.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is an appeal against an order made by the Vice Chancellor Lord Cranworth, dismissing an application made on behalf of the plaintiff for an order directing the defendants Warde and Bury, to produce for the inspection of the plaintiff, certain written documents referred to in the pleadings. The facts of the case, so far as they are relevant to this appeal, may be shortly stated. The plaintiff Marianne Warde is the wife of the defendant Mr. Warde. The marriage took place in 1834. A settlement was made previous to the marriage, dated the 18th of October 1834, by which certain estates in Warwickshire called the Clopton Hall estates, were charged, amongst other sums, with a jointure of 1,000*l.* a-year in favour of Mrs. Warde, in the event of her surviving her intended husband. The trustees of that settlement were the defendants Lawes and Cottle, and two other persons since dead. Mr. Cottle retired from the trust, and the defendant Bury was substituted in his place. The settlement contained the usual powers, allowing, under certain restrictions, a substitution of the security for a jointure. In the year 1845, the defendant contracted to purchase a considerable estate in Bedfordshire, called the Luton Hoo estate, and he became desirous to sell the Clopton Hall estate, in order to apply the proceeds in payment for the Bedfordshire estate; and to effect that purpose, it was necessary that the Clopton Hall estate should be discharged of the jointure, so that the purchaser should not be responsible for the validity of the substituted charge, and the necessary deeds were executed to release the Clopton Hall estate. It was alleged, on the part of the plaintiff, that she was induced, at the request of her husband, the defendant, and upon the advice of the defendant Bury, who she insists acted as the solicitor for her and her husband, to consent to the release of that estate, upon the understanding, that the newly purchased estate, or some other estate, should be properly charged with the payment of the jointure.

Amongst the deeds executed in relation to the transaction was a deed of covenant by which Mr. Warde contracted to grant and secure out of, or otherwise well and sufficiently charge, a competent and sufficient part of such estate as he should thereafter acquire, one annuity or yearly rent-charge for 1,000*l.* for the benefit of his wife, the plaintiff, in case she should survive him, with like powers as in the former settlement. The purchase of the Luton Hoo estate has not yet been completed, but a considerable part of the purchase-money has been paid, and the defendant is in possession of the estate, and has since entered into a contract for the sale of the estate. Differences arose between Mr. and Mrs. Warde which led to a separation, and Mr. Warde has refused to charge either the Luton Hoo estate or any other estate with the jointure. The present bill is filed by Mrs. Warde, praying that her husband may be decreed to make such charge. The defendant insists that he never did agree or contract to charge a jointure upon any estate of his, but admits he intended to do so, and that the plaintiff, Mrs. Warde, joined in the release of the Clopton Hall estate, with the expectation merely that the defendant would secure the jointure by such a charge. Upon the coming in of the answers of Mr. Warde and Mr. Bury, containing admissions of the possession by Bury of certain documents, to which I shall presently advert, application was made to the Court for an order for the defendants to bring in those documents. That application was resisted on the ground that the documents referred to consisted of cases and opinions of counsel, drafts of deeds and letters, which referred to the matters in issue in the cause, and that some of them were given and written after the dispute had arisen, and in anticipation of and in reference to the present suit. The application for production was refused, and the present application is against that order. With respect to the second class of documents, no question can arise; they fall within a recognized and ordinary principle of protection, that the plaintiff is not entitled to such inspection.

So far as concerns the former class of documents, assuming that they would have been within the ordinary rule exempting them from inspection, as decided by the Vice Chancellor, if the plaintiff and defendant had been strangers to each other, I think the circumstances of the present case deprive them of such protection. The law excludes all presumption of fraud; and there is no evidence in this case to shew that this transaction was entered into or conducted on the part of Mr. Warde with any intention to deprive his wife of all security by inducing her to release the charge of the Clopton Hall estate, upon the pretence that he was only desirous of carrying into effect the provision in the settlement relating to the substitution of the security. I think the facts demonstrate that he entered into the transaction with perfect bona fides, and I think the bona fides involved in it a high moral obligation on Mr. Warde's part, to see that his wife was well advised and protected in such a transaction. This case may be important in its consequences to married women who are living with their husbands upon terms of affection and confidence, and most likely to act upon the representation and advice of their husband's solicitor in dealing with their own property and legal rights, and who must often be precluded from resorting to other advice without a breach of domestic harmony and peace. Wherever the husband and wife have distinct interests, and the wife is induced in dealing with that interest to act under the advice of an attorney employed and paid by the husband, I shall feel bound to hold that the attorney must be deemed to act as the attorney of both husband and wife, and that each of them would have a right to call for the production and full inspection of all documents that should come into the possession of the attorney during such employment relating to transactions and to the advice so given by him to the wife. But for the reasons that will appear, my decision in the present case will not rest upon any such general principle.

The transactions out of which this litigation arises, consist of two parts, but the accomplishment of each of these parts was, equally with others, within the object and intention of the parties. The one object was to release the Clopton Hall estate, and the other was to provide for the substitution of another security. Mr. Bury was the attorney employed by the husband to effect both purposes, and to have the duty of advising the wife, and protecting her interests, which were confided to him; and I think Mr. Bury was bound to act as the professional attorney of Mrs. Warde, as distinctly and independently as if he had not been concerned for the husband. I cannot entertain the idea that after Mrs. Warde had been induced to deal with her pecuniary interests, on the reliance of the advice of the attorney employed by her husband for the purpose of giving that advice, she is to be told that the attorney is not to be considered as having advised or acted on her behalf to the extent of giving her a right to inquire into and inspect the documents which were the foundation of the advice so given to her, and upon which she was so induced to act. I cannot consider the husband and wife as strangers to each other in this transaction, but as united in seeking to obtain one common object and in effecting one common purpose. The wife had no wish to change the security; but she evidently, upon the request of her husband, did unite with him in endeavouring to release one estate from her jointure, and to obtain an effectual substituted charge upon some other estate. I believe Mr. Warde acted at that time with the same identical purpose, and Mr. Bury was to my mind even employed to the extent to act for and on behalf of both in effecting such common purpose, and in doing so to protect the interest of both; and I therefore think the case is brought to that point that the learned Judge below thought would render that portion of the documents subject to inspection, which refer to the matters in issue, but which existed before any dispute arose. I come, therefore, to the distinct conclusion that Mr. Bury was the attorney of both husband and wife, and that each party had an equal right with the other to inspect the documents that came into the possession of Mr. Bury in relation to his employment. I will refer to the passages in the answer that lead me to the conclusion I have stated. The answer, after setting forth the general circumstances of the case, admits that under the circumstances stated in the bill, it was recommended by the legal advisers of the defendant, and was assented to by the plaintiff and her trustee, that the plaintiff should release the jointure; and the defendant believed that the plaintiff, as well as the defendant, executed the release in the expectation of the Luton Hoo estate, or a sufficient or competent part thereof, being voluntarily charged with the jointure. It will be observed that the answer contains no denial whatever that Mr. Bury did act as the attorney as well on the behalf and was employed to protect the interest of Mrs. Warde, as to protect the interest of Mr. Warde; and the fact of Mrs. Warde having no other legal adviser to protect her very important interests, which she was, at the request and with the recommendation of the husband, dealing with, can, I think, be accounted for on no other ground; but I am of opinion that the statement of the defendant amounts to an admission of the fact, and establishes for all the purposes of the present question that Mr. Bury must be considered as having conducted the transaction as the attorney and on the behalf of Mrs. Warde, as well as on the part of the defendant, and that the plaintiff is entitled to the inspection of the documents which came into the possession of Mr. Bury, and which are connected with the advice he gave to Mrs. Warde. The only sentence which can be found which even by implication denies that Bury acted as such attorney, is contained in the affidavit filed by Mr. Warde, in order to explain an admission in his answer as to the documents in Mr. Bury's possession. In that affidavit Mr. Warde states that the several documents, which he enumerates, were laid before and obtained from counsel on his behalf, and by his direction, and not on the behalf of and by the direction of any other person. This statement, standing alone, would seem to be a denial that Mr. Bury acted on the behalf of Mrs. Warde; but whatever construction Mr. Warde may put upon the fact, I think that the other distinct statement by him that Mr. Bury, under the circumstances to which I have adverted, acted as the professional adviser of Mrs. Warde, connecting, as it does, that advice with the documents referred to, establishes her right to the inspection.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the documents referred to in the first part of the second schedule, and which existed before the dispute commenced, ought to be produced.

 NOV. 11. } GROVE v. YOUNG.

Costs—Suits for establishing the Will of a Testator—Heir-at-Law.

A testator devised his real estates to A, and died, leaving B. his heir-at-law. B. brought an action of ejectment against A, in respect of a part of the testator's real estate, on the grounds of the incompetency of the testator, and fraud on the part of A. The action was tried, and failed, and a motion for a new trial was refused. A bill was then filed by A. against B. for the purpose of establishing the will. B. in his answer, set up the incompetency of the testator, and fraud on the part of the devisee, and entered into a good deal of evidence in support of his case. At the hearing, issues were directed to try the validity of the will. The issues were tried. B. at the trial merely cross-examined A.'s witnesses, and did not enter into any independent evidence. A verdict was given in support of the will. On the coming on again of the cause on the question of the costs of the suit and issues,—Held, that B. was not entitled to any of the costs of the suit or issues, but was bound to pay so much of the costs of the suit and issues as were occasioned by his raising the above-mentioned questions of incompetency and fraud.

A testator, by his will, dated in 1844, after leaving some small legacies to his relations, devised and bequeathed the greater part of his property to the plaintiffs, upon certain trusts for the benefit of the solicitor who prepared the will, and his children. The will was made in the testator's last illness, and he died a short time after it was executed.

The trustees entered into a contract with Mr. Bastard for a sale of a part of the testator's real estate. After the contract was entered into, Mr. Young, the heir-at-law of the testator, brought an action of ejectment against the trustees in respect of this property, on the ground that the will of the testator had been obtained fraudulently and by undue influence. The action was tried, in July 1846, and a verdict was given for the trustees, and a motion for a new trial of the action, made in June 1847, was refused.

Mr. Bastard, declining to complete the contract, on the ground that the will was open to suspicion, a bill was filed against him for a specific performance of the contract. The Master, on the usual reference, found that a good title could be made to the property. Exceptions taken to the report by Mr. Bastard were overruled by Knight Bruce, V.C., and a decree was pronounced for specific performance. On appeal made by Mr. Bastard from that decision, Lord Cottenham thought that a bill ought to be filed by the vendors against the heir-at-law for the purpose of establishing the will. A part of his Lordship's judgment was as follows:—"In that way, the question will be speedily and conclusively determined. If, as soon as the bill is filed, the heir puts in an answer, abandoning his claim, the cloud will be removed at once, and the question set at rest for ever. If, on the other hand, he insists on an issue, it is much more in accordance with the practice of this Court that that question should be tried between the heir and the devisee than between the heir and the purchaser, after he has paid his purchase-money" (1).

In pursuance of this decree, a bill was filed by the trustees against Mr. Young, the heir-at-law, in June 1848. Mr. Young, by his answer, insisted that the testator had been incompetent to make a will, and that the will had been obtained by fraud and undue influence, and entered into a great deal of evidence in support of his case. The cause came on to be heard, before Knight Bruce, V.C., and issues were directed to try the validity of the will. These issues came on to be tried at the Summer Assizes in 1851. At the trial, witnesses were examined by the trustees in support of the will, and cross-examined by Mr. Young. Mr. Young, however, did not examine any witnesses of his own. A verdict was given in favour of the will.

The cause now came on for further directions. The only question was as to the costs of the suit for establishing the will and the issues.

The evidence entered into by Mr. Young in the cause, was mentioned by the counsel for both parties in the discussion, but none of it was read. The counsel for the plaintiffs described it as containing very gross and scandalous charges against the solicitor, in whose favour the will was made. The counsel for the defendant described it as containing circumstances from which, at least, very grave suspicions of unfair dealing would arise.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Rasch, for the plaintiffs, read the following passage from Berney v. Eyre (2), "If a devisee brings a bill, and the heir-at-law does nothing more than cross-examine the witnesses who are produced to confirm the will, he is entitled to his costs. If he examines witnesses to encounter the will, then he shall not have his costs. If he sets up insanity or any other disability against the person who made the will, and fails, he shall not have his costs. But it must be a very strong case which will induce the Court to give the costs against him, as spoliation or secreting the will." They also referred to White v. Wilson (3), Smith v. Dearmer (4) and Tucker v. Sanger (5). There are, then, these rules to be adapted to three classes of cases. First, if a bill for establishing a will is filed against the heir-at-law, and the heir merely puts the devisee to the proof of his title, and cross-examines the devisee's witnesses, he is entitled to his costs. Secondly, if such a bill is filed, and the heir, by his answer and by evidence, sets up a case of incompetency of the testator, or fraud on the part of the devisee, and fails in it, he shall not be entitled to costs, but shall not pay them. Thirdly, if such a bill is filed, and the heir sets up such a case, and also, in the conduct of his case conducts himself vexatiously, litigiously, and oppressively, he will be made to pay costs. Taking all the circumstances of this case into consideration,—the action that was tried before, in which everything that could be urged against the will had been pressed, and failed—the plaintiffs being compelled by the Court to file a bill to establish the will—the evidence adduced by the defendant, containing as it does gross charges against the devisee, which, at the trial of the action, he did not attempt to substantiate by independent evidence—all these bring the case into the third class, and the heir ought to be held to pay costs. At any rate, he ought not to be allowed any costs.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Beales read the following passage from Webb v. Claverden (6), "Where an heir is made a defendant, even though he should insist upon the will's being fraudulent, and an issue at law is directed to try the fraud, yet this Court will not give costs against him, though he fails, but very often allows the heir his costs," and referred to Wright v. Wright (7). They then contended that the position that the heir was to pay costs was not established by the cases that had been cited by the plaintiffs. In the evidence adduced by the heir in the cause, there were circumstances from which unfair dealing might be inferred, and the testator's heir-at-law or his family, smarting under the disappointment of seeing his property go from them to strangers, and having reason to believe that there had been fraud and improper conduct, were entitled to a good deal of indulgence.

PARKER, V.C.—There is no doubt as to the general rules respecting the costs of establishing a will against an heir-at-law. The devisee coming to this Court to have a will established against the heir, comes for his own benefit, and the heir is entitled to put the devisee to the proof of his title, and, in an ordinary case, to have his costs of such a proceeding. The Court will not treat the heir-at-law as bound to litigate questions of that kind with his hands tied, and will consider him at liberty to bring any matter before the Court to determine the validity of the will. But, as in any other case, the heir-at-law, if he is guilty of litigious and vexatious conduct, must suffer the consequences of it. It would be dangerous to lay down that the heir-at-law, whatever his conduct may be, will be entitled to costs. These are the general principles; but the application of them to particular cases must be in the discretion of the Court.

The peculiar feature of the present case is this:—before the present bill was filed, the heir-at-law had brought an action against the devisee, disputing the validity of the will, and had then an opportunity of bringing forward everything against the will. In this action he failed. The effect of this was, not to preclude him from again disputing the will, but only to determine whether he was entitled to the property in dispute in that action. The devisee has afterwards occasion to establish the will. He had no right to ask the heir-at-law to release his claims, and he is obliged to come to this Court to file a bill to establish it. In this suit, the heir-at-law had certainly a perfect right to put the devisee to the proof of his title, but the circumstance that he had had the advantage of a judicial investigation before that time, must materially weigh with the Court in considering the question of costs, and induce the Court to look with much less indulgence on the line of defence adopted by him than in ordinary cases. The bill being filed, I find that the heir-at-law sets up the incompetency of the testator, and fraud, and improper practices on the part of the devisee. On these points he goes into evidence. Then the cause comes before the Court, and, on the hearing, issues are directed to decide the validity of the will. The parties go to trial upon those issues. The devisee examines witnesses in support of the will. The heir cross-examines witnesses, but does not examine any witnesses for himself. The result is a verdict for the devisee. Under the circumstances of the case, I shall refuse the heir his costs of the suit, including the costs of the issues, and shall make him pay the costs of so much of the suit and action as have been occasioned by the questions of fraud and improper practice which have been raised by his answer, and which he endeavoured to support by evidence at the hearing of the cause. The decree will be this—No costs as regards the general result of the suit and the issues. The defendant to pay the costs of so much of the suit and issues as were caused by raising the question by the answer, and going into evidence. The costs of this hearing to be treated as costs in the cause.

		VAN VLISSENGEN.
		SAME v. VERBECK.
		SAME v. ROLFE.

Foreigners—Jurisdiction.*

Upon the plaintiffs entering into the usual undertaking to bring actions against the defendants, an injunction was granted to restrain foreign owners of foreign vessels whilst in this country from infringing a patent within the limits of the grant, unless and until they obtained proper licences from the owners of the patent, where the invalidity of the patent had been bonâ fide twice unsuccessfully contested at law in an action brought by the patentee, and once in an action, against him and the assignees of the patent, under a writ of sci. fa. to repeal the grant of the letters patent.

These were three several motions on the part of the plaintiffs in the above causes for injunctions to restrain the defendants from using or exercising within the limits of that part of the United Kingdom called England, the dominion of Wales and the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, including the seas, rivers and havens thereof, the invention of James Lowe, or any mode or process for the propulsion of vessels merely colourably differing therefrom; and from using or employing, or permitting to be used and employed within the limits aforesaid any vessel fitted or provided with a propeller constructed and applied without the licence of the plaintiffs, according to the form and mode respectively described in the specification of James Lowe's patent, or merely colourably differing therefrom; and particularly from permitting certain vessels mentioned in the several notices of motion, or any other vessel or vessels within the limits aforesaid under the command or controul of the defendants, and fitted or provided with a propeller or propellers constructed and applied without the licence of the plaintiffs, according to the form and mode aforesaid, or merely colourably differing therefrom, to proceed on any voyage or voyages.

The plaintiffs, Charles Andrew Caldwell, Joshua Procktor Brown Westhead, Webster Flockton, Magnus Count de Rosen and Frederick Collyer Christy, were the assignees, under certain indentures of the 14th of October 1846 and the 8th of February 1850, of Lowe's patent mentioned in the above notices of motion, and granted to him by letters patent of the 24th of March 1838, for the term of fourteen years, and of any extension to be granted of the patent. The nature of the patent is described in the judgment below; and it was stated that an extension of it had been duly granted.

It appeared from an affidavit of one of the plaintiffs that in November 1843 J. Lowe, the patentee, brought an action against John Penn, of the firm of Penn & Sons, engineers, for infringement of the patent, and obtained a verdict, with 40*s.* damages. This action was again tried, with a like result, before Lord Chief Justice Denman and a special jury. A rule for a new trial was obtained, but judgment was subsequently entered up for the plaintiff by consent without another trial. A writ of sci. fa. was afterwards issued against the owners of the patent and the patentee, on the prosecution of Thomas Henry Maudslay, to repeal the letters patent. The action on the sci. fa. came on for trial in February 1850, in the Court of Exchequer, before the Lord Chief Baron, and a verdict of not guilty upon all the issues was by consent taken for the defendants, and an agreement to the following effect entered into, viz., the engineers (subsequently named) to pay all money received or to be received for propellers made or contracted for up to this time; the account to be furnished and settled by the 1st of May; to have licence to make propellers at 1*l.* per horse during Lowe's patent, and 10*s.* per horse during Smith's extension; parties left to their respective rights after that; other engineers to come in on the same terms on or before the 1st of May; Flockton v. Miller to be discontinued, each party paying his own costs; Lowe v. Penn, judgment for the plaintiff, each party paying his own costs. The engineers, parties to this arrangement are, Maudslay (Maudslay & Co.), Penn (Messrs. Penn & Son), Rennie (Messrs. Rennie & Co.), Seaward (Messrs. Seaward & Co.), and Miller & Ravenhill; Messrs. Caldwell, Newberry & Flockton to be parties on behalf of the representatives of the under-mentioned patents, viz., Smith's, Woodcroft's, Lowe's, Ericsson's and Blaxland's; any misunderstanding to be referred to the Attorney General, Sir John Jervis, (counsel for the defendants) and Sir F. Thesiger (counsel for the plaintiffs).

The affidavit stated that all those engineers (except two firms of them, who had only paid a portion on account) duly paid the sums and royalties agreed upon, and which amounted to 3,898*l.*; that eleven suits for injunctions to restrain infringement of the patent had been stayed at the request of the respective defendants, on payment by them of the royalties required and costs of suit; that the profits of the patent were very lucrative; and it enumerated other engineers and eleven steam navigation companies who had submitted to pay royalties to the plaintiffs. The patent was also stated to be extensively used in the royal navy.

The several vessels particularly referred to in the notices of motion in the above-mentioned causes were three foreign vessels, viz., the Burgemeester Hindekoper and the Gouverneur van Ewyck, both belonging to a foreign company called the Amsterdam Steam Screw Schooner Company, and trading between Amsterdam and London, and the Syemoord belonging to a foreign company called the Netherlands Steam-Packet Company, and trading between Rotterdam and London. The defendant in the first cause, Paul Van Vlissingen, was the managing director of the first-mentioned company; the defendants in the second cause were Verbeck & Stuit, the former the alleged owner, and the latter the master or captain of the Gouverneur Van Ewyck; and Rolfe, the defendant in the third cause, had been the master or captain of the Syemoord, but had ceased to be so when his answer was filed.

Substituted service of the notices of motion were made by leave of the Court upon the London agents of the Amsterdam company, and the solicitors in London of the Netherlands company.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Amphlett appeared for the plaintiffs;

The Solicitor General and Mr. Baggallay, for the defendant in the first cause;

Mr. Eddis, for the defendants in the second cause; and Mr. Bacon and Mr. Miller, for the defendant in the third cause.

The grounds of defence and the principal argument of the defendants' counsel are sufficiently noticed in the judgment.

The following cases were cited in support of the motions :—

Treaty with Holland (27th of October 1837.)

5 Hertslet's Commercial Treaties, 338 (1820-44.)

Dec. 20.—TURNER, V.C.—after stating the effect, as above, of the notices of motion, said, — The plaintiffs in these causes are the assignees of a patent granted to James Lowe in the year 1838, for a mode of propelling vessels by means of one or more curved blades set or affixed on a revolving shaft below the water line of the vessel and running from stem to stern of the vessel. The defendants in the first two causes are owners of vessels trading between Holland and this country, and the defendant in the third cause was the captain of a vessel engaged in the same trade, but it appears by his answer that he is not now captain of the vessel.

Upon the argument of these motions, and particularly of the motion in the first above-mentioned cause, it was insisted on the part of the defendants that the injunction ought not to be granted; first, because the patent was invalid for want of novelty, and for several insufficiencies and other imperfections in the specifications; secondly, because there had been no such enjoyment under the patent as would warrant the interference of this Court before the validity of the patent was established at law; and thirdly, because the plaintiffs and those under whom they claim have, as it is said, acquiesced in the use of the invention by the defendants; but, on examining the affidavits on these points I think that the defendants have not established such a case of acquiescence as will preclude the interference of this Court. They have, I think, made out such a case as renders it incumbent on the Court to put the plaintiffs upon an undertaking to bring an action (the interference of the Court in cases of this nature being founded upon the legal right); but I do not think the case they have made out is such as would justify the Court in withholding its interference until the legal right has been tried.

The question whether the Court will interfere to protect a patentee before he has established his right at law, or will suspend its interference until the right at law has been established, appears to me to depend upon very simple principles. It is part of the duty of this Court to protect property pending litigation; but when it is called upon to exercise that duty the Court requires some proof of title in the party who calls for its interference. In the case of a new patent this proof is wanting. The public whose interests are affected by the patent have had no opportunity of contesting the validity of the patentee's title, and the Court therefore refuses to interfere until his right has been established at law; but in a case where there has been long enjoyment under the patent (the enjoyment of course including user) the public have had the opportunity of contesting the patent, and the fact of their not having done so successfully affords at least prima facie evidence that the title of the patentee is good, and the Court, therefore, interferes before the right is established at law. In the present case, I think that the plaintiffs have proved such a case of enjoyment under the patent and of their title having been maintained at law against the several attempts which have been made to impeach it that the Court is bound at once to interfere for their protection unless there are other sufficient grounds for withholding its interference.

It was insisted, on the part of the defendants, that there was in each of these cases a sufficient ground for the interference of the Court being withheld. In the first place the ground is thus stated in the affidavit of Izebbe Swart, of Amsterdam:—He says, in his affidavit, that he is the master of the ship called the Burgemeester Hindekoper, in the pleadings of this cause named, and that he has been master of the said ship since the 23rd of March 1850; that he was born in the kingdom of Holland; that the vessel belongs to a company formed in Holland in the year 1848, and called the Amsterdam Screw Schooner Company; that the company consists of a great number of shareholders or partners, all, he believes, natives and subjects of Holland, and residing in Holland, and that no Englishman has, as he believes, any share or interest whatever in the company or in the ship, property or effects thereof; that the said company was established for the purpose of trading with steam ships between Amsterdam and other countries; that for the purposes of the company and the trade for which the same was established, a vessel named the Burgemeester Hindekoper was, in the year 1849, built and fitted up with the same propelling power with that which is now and always has been used for the propulsion of the said vessel, by the defendant (Van Vlissingen) and workmen in his employ at Amsterdam, for and on behalf and by order of the company; that the vessel was bond fide built and fitted up with her steam engines and propelling power in the kingdom of Holland, by and for natives and subjects of that kingdom, and that no Englishman was in any way employed in building and fitting up the vessel; that it was so built and fitted up according to the most approved course of ship building then in use in Holland; that all the machinery and propelling power with which it was fitted up, or which have since been used for the purposes of the vessel, were manufactured and made up by the defendant at Amsterdam; that some time before the vessel was built and fitted, the same propelling power with that used for the vessel had been openly used and exercised in Holland; that the deponent is and always has been altogether ignorant and unacquainted with

James Lowe and with his alleged invention for certain modes of propelling vessels, and also with the patent alleged to have been obtained by him in respect of such alleged invention; that he verily believes that the ship was built and fitted up in ignorance of any such patent, and according to the most approved principles of ship-building and maritime machinery then in use in Holland; that no patent has been granted, or, as he is informed and believes, applied for in Holland, for or in respect of such alleged invention; that it is competent for English subjects who may have discovered any new or valuable invention to apply for and obtain a patent for the sole use of the same in Holland, and such patents are frequently applied for and obtained; that the said ship sails, and is entitled to sail, under and to carry the national flag of Holland, and is entitled to trade with and to enter the ports of all countries at peace with Holland, and to depart therefrom at pleasure; that the crew of the vessel are all natives of Holland; that before the vessel was built and fitted up with the propelling power, and before such propelling power was used on board the vessel, another steam ship had been built and fitted up by the defendant, for and by order of the company, and was built and fitted up in the same manner and with precisely the same propelling power as the Burgemeester Hindekoper; that he was mate of the vessel, and it had (before the Burgemeester Hindekoper was fitted up with such propelling power as aforesaid) traded between Amsterdam and London, and had made many voyages between those respective ports with such propelling power as aforesaid; that until the month of September last he never heard that the plaintiffs or James Lowe, or any other person, did or could raise any objection to the use of such propelling power as that now in use in the Burgemeester Hindekoper, or make any claim in respect thereof; and that he believes that previously to the said month of September last no objection or claim was made by the plaintiffs or James Lowe or any other person in respect of the said vessels or either of them, although he believes that the plaintiffs and James Lowe must have well known that the said vessels had, for upwards of two years and a half, been from time to time trading to and from London; that various other steam ships have been built and fitted up in Holland, by and on behalf of natives and subjects of that kingdom, upon the same principle and with the same propelling power as the said Burgemeester Hindekoper, and that very large sums of money have been expended in building and fitting up such vessels, and that the same have respectively been built and fitted up in ignorance of the alleged patent; that a very large proportion of the trade of Holland consists in the export of articles for consumption from Holland to England, and the importation of goods and merchandise from England to Holland; that such trade is now, and has been for some time past, mainly conducted by and by means of steam ships, built and fitted up in the same manner and with the same propelling power as the Burgemeester Hindekoper; that such trade is, in his judgment and belief, of great advantage to both the said countries, and would be greatly prejudiced if such steam ships were prevented trading between them; that large sums of money have been expended by the company in the building and fitting up of the Burgemeester Hindekoper, and that very serious loss would be sustained by the company if the sailing of the Burgemeester Hindekoper were to be restrained by the injunction of this Court.

I think it right to observe that I never read an affidavit in this court more concise and more properly stating the case on the part of a defendant, and I very much wish that all the affidavits filed in this court were as much directed to the real point at issue as this has been.

In the next case, (Caldwell v. Verbeck,) I find no ground assigned beyond what is stated in the affidavit of the defendant Stuit, which merely states that he is master of the vessel, and does not enter upon the merits of the case.

In the third case, (Caldwell v. Rolfe,) the answer of the defendant Rolfe states his case as follows:—That the vessel in the said bill mentioned, called the Syemoord, has been employed by the Netherlands Steam-Packet Company for several months past, in steaming between Rotterdam and London; that this vessel was fitted up or provided with a screw propeller; that the propeller was and is composed of two blades only, each being a portion of a curve, and that the same is set or affixed on a revolving shaft below the water-line, and running from stem to stern of the vessel; that he believes that the propeller used in the vessel was made in Holland, and designed and invented by the maker thereof, without having seen any propeller alleged to have been invented by J. Lowe, or any drawing or specification thereof; and he denies that he is the captain of the vessel Syemoord, or that he has any management or controul of the vessel, or that the management is under his command; that he does not threaten or intend to take the vessel on her voyage between Rotterdam and London; that he resides at Rotterdam, in Holland, where he has always resided, and that he has not used any domicile in any part of the kingdom of Great Britain; that the Netherlands Steam-Packet Company is a registered company according to the laws of Holland, and that all the persons interested in the company and having any right to interfere in the management of the vessels belonging to it are resident in Holland; that he is advised that the plaintiffs can, according to the law of Holland, obtain relief in the courts of that country against the company for any infringement of the patent which they may be able to establish; and, therefore, submits and insists that the plaintiffs are bound to pursue their remedy in those courts against the company, and that this suit has been improperly instituted against him.

It is to be observed, that in none of these cases is it attempted to be denied on the part of the defendants, that the screw-propellers used in their respective vessels fall within the invention claimed by the patent; and after anxiously considering the case, I am of the opinion, that I cannot withhold these injunctions upon the grounds which are above stated. I take this rule to be universal, that foreigners are in all cases subject to the laws of the country in which they may happen to be, and if in any case when they are out of their own country, their interests are regulated and governed by their own laws, I take it to be not by force of those laws, but by the law of the country, in which they may be, adopting those laws as part of its own law for the purpose of determining such rights.

Mr. Justice Story, in his Treatise on the Conflict of Laws, addressing himself to this subject, says, "In regard to foreigners resident in a country, although some jurists deny the right of a nation generally to legislate over them, it would seem clear, upon general principles of international law, that such a right does exist; and the extent to which it should be exercised, is a matter purely of municipal arrangement and policy. Huberus lays down the doctrine in his second axiom. All persons who are found within the limits of a government, whether their residence is permanent or temporary, are to be deemed subjects thereof. Boulle-nois says, that the sovereign has a right to make laws to bind foreigners, in relation to their property within his domains, in relation to contracts and acts done therein, and in relation to judicial proceedings if they implead before his tribunals. And, further, that he may of strict right make laws for all foreigners who merely pass through his domains, although commonly this authority is exercised only as to matters of police. Vattel asserts the same general doctrine, and says, that foreigners are subject to the laws of a state while they reside in it" (1). In this country, indeed, the position of foreigners is not left to rest upon this general law, but it is provided for by statute; for by the statute of 32 Hen. 8. c. 16. s. 9, it is enacted, "that every alien and stranger born out of the king's obeisance not being denizen, which now or hereafter shall come in or to this realm or elsewhere within the King's dominions, shall, after the 1st of September next coming, be bounden by and unto the laws and statutes of this realm, and to all and singular the contents of the same." Natural justice, indeed, seems to require that this should be the case. When countries extend to foreigners the protection of their laws, they may well require obedience to those laws as the price of that protection. These defendants, therefore, whilst in this country, must, I think, be subject to its laws.

(1) Conflict of Laws, c. 14. s. 541.

It is to be considered, then, what are the laws of this country with reference to the rights of patentees? According to our laws and constitution the Crown, I apprehend, has at all times exercised a controul over the trade of the country. Anterior to the statute of 21 Jac. 1. c. 3. the Crown assumed to exercise that controul to a very prejudicial extent by the creation of monopolies, and in the great case of monopolies—Darcy v. Allein (2), such an exercise of its powers was held to be illegal; but it was at the same time held, that the Crown had power to grant as a recompence for any new invention the exclusive right to trade in it for a reasonable period. What was to be considered as a reasonable period does not appear to have been settled. By the statute of James it was fixed at fourteen years, and thus,—as explained by Lord Coke in his commentaries on the statute (2),—the statute did not create, but controuled the powers of the Crown in the granting of patents. Patentees, therefore, have always derived, and still derive, their rights not from the statute, but from the grant of the Crown.

We must consider, then, what is the effect of the grant. It purports to give to the grantee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, special licence, full power, sole privilege, and authority, that he, his executors, administrators and assigns, and every of them, by himself and themselves, or by his and their deputy and deputies, servants or agents, or such others as he, his executors, administrators or assigns, shall at any time agree with, and no others, from time to time and at all times hereafter during the term of years herein expressed, shall and lawfully may make, use, exercise, and vend his said invention within that part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called England, the dominion of Wales, and the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed. Undoubtedly, this grant gives to the grantee a right of action against persons who infringe upon the sole and exclusive right purported to be granted by it. Foreigners coming into this country are, as I apprehend, subject to actions for injuries done by them whilst here to the subjects of the Crown. Why, then, are they not to be subject to actions for the injury done by their infringing on the sole and exclusive right which I have shewn to be granted in conformity with the laws and constitution of this country? And if they are subject to such actions, why is not the power of this Court, which is founded upon the insufficiency of the legal remedy, to be applied against them as well as against the subjects of the Crown? It is said that the prohibitory words of the patent are addressed only to the subjects of the Crown; but these prohibitory words are in aid of the grant, and not in derogation of it, and they were probably introduced at a time when the prohibition of the Crown could be enforced penally against the parties who ventured to disobey it. The language of this part of the patent, therefore, does not appear to me to alter the case.

In the course of the argument upon these motions, I put the question whether, in the case of a railway engine patented in England and not in Scotland, the engine, if made in Scotland, could be permitted to run into England; and I might have added, whether, if the invention we are now considering was patented in England and Scotland, and not in Ireland, steamboats propelled by means of it could be permitted to run from Dublin to Holyhead, Bristol, and Glasgow. The answer which I received to this question was that, in the case of patents, there was a difference between Scotland and foreign countries; that a prior user in Scotland would, although a prior user in a foreign country would not, invalidate an English patent; but this answer does not appear to me to meet the question. What previous user will invalidate a patent, and what user if any can be permitted in contravention of the patent right, are different questions, depending wholly on different considerations; the one upon the extent of previous knowledge, the other upon the effect of the grant.

It was further argued, upon the part of the defendants, that the user by them of this invention was not such user or exercise of the invention as would amount to an infringement of the patent; and some observations which fell from Lord Eldon, in The Universities of Oxford and Cambridge v. Richardson, (supra,) were cited on this point, as was also the case of Minter v. Williams, (supra), in which it was intimated that there might be an innocent user of a patented invention. But I do not think those authorities at all assist the case of the defendants. On the contrary, the case of The Universities of Oxford and Cambridge v. Richardson appears to me to be very much in favour of the plaintiffs; for there Lord Eldon draws a marked distinction between user for the purposes of trade, and other user. It is true that he there speaks of cases of necessity; but surely it cannot be said that the user of this invention by the defendants is a matter of necessity. Their user of it is merely for the purposes of trade, and is not otherwise necessary than as the means of securing them increased profit by their trade. If, indeed, any of their vessels were stranded, and it became necessary to use the propeller, this might be a case of necessity, falling within the range of Lord Eldon's observations. So, again, in the case of Minter v. Williams, I find no trace of a user for the purposes of trade being considered as innocent.

(2) 11 Rep. 85; also reported in Noy, 173.

(3) 3 Co. Inst. 131.

In the argument, on the part of the defendants, much was said upon the hardship of this Court interfering against them, and upon the inconvenience which would result from it, and some reference was made to the policy of this country; but it must be remembered that British ships certainly cannot use this invention without the licence of the patentees, and the burthens incident to such licence; and foreigners, I think, cannot justly complain that their ships are not permitted to enjoy, without licence and without payment, advantages which the ships of this country cannot enjoy otherwise than under licence and upon payment. It must be remembered, too, that foreigners may take out patents in this country and thus secure to themselves the exclusive use of their inventions within Her Majesty's dominions, and that if they neglect to do so, they to this extent withhold their inventions from the subjects of this country. It is to be observed, also, that the enforcement of the exclusive right under a patent does not take away from foreigners any privilege which they ever enjoyed in this country; for if the invention was used by them in this country before the granting of the patent, the patent, I apprehend, would be invalid. One principal ground of inconvenience suggested was, that if foreign ships were restrained from using this invention in these dominions, English ships might equally be restrained from using it in foreign dominions. But I think this argument resolves itself into a question of national policy, and it is for the legislature and not for the Courts to deal with that question. My duty is to administer the law, and not to make it.

Upon the grounds which I have mentioned, I think that the facts stated in the affidavits and answer do not furnish sufficient grounds for refusing these injunctions. I think, however, that the defendant Rolfe having ceased to be captain of the vessel mentioned in the third suit, and being no longer in a position to infringe the patent, and there being no evidence of any intention on his part to resume the infringement, the injunction as to him ought not to be granted. I do not think that the Court would be justified in acting upon the suspicion that it is intended to re-appoint him; at all events, not without such a case being made upon the record: and I think that the injunction in the other suits must be qualified. I cannot go further than to restrain the defendants unless and until they shall have obtained the licence of the plaintiffs so to do, from using and exercising, or causing or permitting to be used or exercised within the limits of that part of the United Kingdom called England, the dominion of Wales and the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, the invention of James Lowe in the bills mentioned, or any mode or process for the propulsion of vessels merely colourably differing therefrom, and in particular to restrain the defendants unless and until so licensed as aforesaid, from propelling the vessels in the bills mentioned, or causing or permitting the same to be propelled within the limits aforesaid with or by means of the propeller now attached thereto, and from propelling the same vessels or any other vessels or vessel, or causing or procuring or permitting the same to be propelled within the limits aforesaid, with or by means of any propellers or propeller constructed and applied according to the form and mode respectively described in the specification of the said James Lowe's patent, or merely colourably differing therefrom.

The orders were accordingly so made, on the usual undertaking of the plaintiffs to bring actions. Liberty for either party to apply. No order as to costs.

PELLY v. WATHEN.

Solicitor and Client—Lien on Deeds.

*A. contracted to buy the equity of redemption of the L. estate, and immediately contracted to sell part. He then mortgaged the other part and his other estates to B. for securing 10,000*l.* He then mortgaged the part of L. he had before mortgaged, to C. for securing 3,000*l.* and the same part to D. for securing 1,000*l.* The legal estate in L. was then conveyed by the vendor to a trustee for A, and a term of years was assigned to another trustee to attend the inheritance, the original mortgages affecting the same being paid off. Before the mortgage for 10,000*l.* was created, A. was indebted to solicitors in a bill of costs, and became indebted to them for the conveyance of the legal estate. On the occasion of that conveyance, the title deeds of the L. estates were handed over by the vendor to the solicitors, as solicitors for A. Subsequently one of the firm of solicitors, having no notice of the mortgage for 10,000*l.*, took an assignment of the 3,000*l.* and 1,000*l.* mortgages, and made a further advance on the same security:—Held, that the deeds, if in the hands of A, be would subject to the right of B, and they were so subject in the hands of the solicitor.*

Held, also, that the deeds being delivered by the vendor to the solicitors and not to A. and by him to the solicitors, made no difference.

Held, also, that there was no distinction between the costs due before the mortgage to B. and the costs of getting in the legal estate, the solicitors in that matter being employed by A, and he alone being responsible for them.

A client cannot give a lien to his solicitor of a higher nature than the interest which he himself has in deeds.

This was an appeal from an order of the late Vice Chancellor Sir James Wigram, made on the hearing of the cause, on exceptions to the Master's report, and on further directions.

The facts of the case are fully stated in the report (1), and a mere recapitulation of them only will now be necessary. They are as follows:—Previous to the month of September 1839, Mr. William Lewis had contracted to purchase the equity of redemption of certain property in Gloucestershire, designated as the Lyppiatt estate, and which was subject to two mortgages for 18,000*l.* and 6,000*l.* In order to enable him to raise money for completing the purchase, he agreed to sell part of the property to two gentlemen, who agreed to become purchasers; and by an indenture dated the 14th of September 1839, he conveyed to Mr. Robert Parker Pelly, the plaintiff in the suit, all his real estates, including so much of the Lyppiatt estate as had not been so agreed to be sold; to hold the same to the plaintiff by way of mortgage, for securing a running account, not exceeding 10,000*l.* By another indenture, dated the 14th of December 1840, Mr. Lewis mortgaged that part of the Lyppiatt property comprised in the plaintiff's mortgage, to Mr. Horatio James, to secure 3,000*l.*; and afterwards, by another mortgage, dated the 3rd of September 1841, he mortgaged the same property to Mr. Charles Barton, to secure 1,000*l.* The purchase of the property by Mr. Lewis had not, up to this time, been completed; but in the month of January 1842, the transactions were brought to a close in the following manner:—The parts of the property which had been agreed to be sold had been conveyed to the purchasers; and by means of their purchase-money, or otherwise, the two old mortgages of 18,000*l.* and 6,000*l.* were paid off, and the legal fee in the parts not sold to the two sub-purchasers was conveyed to Mr. Thomas Bassett in trust for Mr. Lewis; and an outstanding term of 1,000 years was at the same time assigned to Mr. John

(1) 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 281.

Gurney, in trust, to attend the inheritance. At this time Mr. Thomas Bassett and Mr. John Gurney carried on business as attorneys and solicitors, in partnership with the defendant, Mr. George Wathen, under the firm of Wathen, Bassett & Gurney; and that firm acted as the solicitors for Mr. Lewis in the matter of the purchase, Mr. George Wathen, in fact, having so acted for many years previously. Upon the completion of this purchase the title deeds were handed over to Messrs. Wathen, Bassett & Gurney, as solicitors of Mr. Lewis. After the execution of these deeds in January 1842 the only outstanding interest, exclusive of the plaintiff's mortgage, were the two mortgages vested in Mr. James and Mr. Barton, and Mr. George Wathen agreed with Mr. Lewis to pay off those charges and to take assignments of them to himself. This was accordingly done by two indentures, both dated and executed on the 14th of February 1842, so that Mr. George Wathen became a mortgagee for the two sums of 3,000*l.* and 1,000*l.* In the following month of August he advanced a further sum of 673*l.* on security of the same premises, and thus became an incumbrancer for a principal sum of 4,673*l.*

This bill was filed by Mr. Pelly against Mr. George Wathen, Mr. Lewis and others for redemption and foreclosure. A decree was made, directing inquiries as to mortgages on Mr. Lewis's estates and their priorities, and what lien existed on any deeds, and other matters. The Master reported the existence of the mortgages above enumerated, and that those in the hands of Mr. George Wathen had priority over that of Mr. Pelly. He also reported that the solicitors had a lien on the deeds mentioned in the schedules to his report in priority over Mr. Pelly's mortgage. Mr. Pelly filed exceptions on these points.

The cause came on, before Wigram, V.C., in the month of March 1849, when he overruled the exceptions as to priority, declaring that Mr. George Wathen's security had priority over that of Mr. Pelly, by reason of the conduct pursued by the latter; but he allowed those relating to the lien. From this decree, so far as it related to the question of lien, the representatives of the defendant, Mr. George Wathen, appealed.

Mr. Rolfe and Mr. Basalgette, for the appellants, argued that the case of a solicitor's lien was different from the lien of any other party; that a solicitor might claim a lien on the deeds in his possession for all that was due to him; and here, moreover, the debt due to the firm of solicitors was mainly contracted before the date of the mortgage security to the plaintiff. Here originally there was no legal estate in any of the parties now disputing; the solicitor got in that legal estate, and thereupon the deeds came into his possession and invested him with the lien of a solicitor for all his costs, whether for business before done or then transacted; and as the getting in of that legal estate was as beneficial to the mortgagee, the plaintiff, as to the mortgagor, the solicitor was entitled to his costs of that transaction as against both, even supposing he was not held to be so entitled as against the mortgagee in respect of the former costs. The former costs, however, were incurred before the plaintiff's mortgage, and ought to be included in the lien, and more especially as his conduct in not disclosing his mortgage and his activity in procuring the loan of the 3,000*l.* and the 1,000*l.* had operated to make his own charge an inferior one in point of priority to that of the defendant the solicitor, in his character of mortgagee.

That a depositor might obtain a priority over a former mortgagee was clear from the case of Wiseman v. Westland (2), where on a mortgage the deeds were not delivered, and afterwards they were deposited for a loan; and there no notice was given to the depositor of the mortgage, and he was held to be entitled to priority.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—There the mortgage was for a term, and not in fee.]

The case was then argued on the question of the lien remaining to successive firms of solicitors, as it had been in the Court below; but as the judgment does not touch that point the argument is omitted. On the general question of lien the case of Bernard v. Drought (3) was cited, in addition to many of those cited in the court below. It was also argued that the deeds were delivered to the solicitors, not by Mr. Lewis the mortgagor, but by the vendor himself.

The Solicitor General and Mr. Bevir, for the respondent, contended that the deeds, having come into the possession of the solicitor as solicitor for the mortgagor, were in his possession subject to all the rights to which they would have been subject in the hands of the mortgagor himself, and that it mattered not that they were delivered by the vendor and not by the mortgagor. They relied, on the appeal, on the same cases as were cited on the original hearing, more particularly on the decisions of Sir Edward Sugden. The cases were as follows:—

Blunden v. Desart, Ibid. 405.

Mr. Chandless, for the representatives of Mr. Lewis, the mortgagor.

Mr. Bazalgette, in reply.

Nov. 25.—LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH delivered the judgment of the Court.—After observing that the facts of the case were very complicated, but might be stated in a comparatively narrow compass, so far as it was necessary for the due understanding of the question before the Court, he proceeded to detail them as before set forth, and then continued as follows.—It must be taken as a fact not in dispute that the plaintiff, Mr. Pelly, so conducted himself towards Mr. James, Mr. Barton and Mr. Wathen, the parties entitled to the securities of December 1840, of September 1841 and of February 1842 for 3,000*l.*, 1,000*l.* and 673*l.*, thus amounting to 4,673*l.*; that his mortgage, though prior in point of date, would be postponed to theirs. He had actively assisted Mr. Lewis in obtaining the loans from Mr. James and Mr. Barton, and neither to them nor afterwards to Mr. Wathen did he communicate the fact of the existence of his mortgage of September 1839, of which Mr. George Wathen had no notice till a few days before the institution of this suit, on the 19th of March 1843. Upon the completion of the purchase by Lewis in January 1842 the title deeds were all handed over to Messrs. Wathen, Bassett & Gurney, as solicitors of Mr. Lewis; and they claim a lien on those deeds against the plaintiff, Mr. Pelly, for the amount of their bill of costs against Mr. Lewis, and whether this claim is valid is the point we have to decide. Sir James Wigram decreed against the lien, and against his decision the solicitors have appealed. The argument for the appellants divided itself into three heads:—First, it was contended that independently of any special circumstances the lien of the solicitors must prevail. Secondly, if this were not so, still that there were circumstances which would give such a lien independently of any general right; and, thirdly, it was argued, that even if there is no lien for the general costs due to the solicitors, still there is such a lien for the costs of and incident to the procuring the conveyance.

On the first point, we think it clear that no such lien as that contended for exists. The general lien of a solicitor is merely a right to keep back from his client the deeds and papers which he holds as solicitor until his bill of costs is satisfied. It is a right derived entirely through the client; and therefore, on the most obvious principles of justice, cannot go beyond the right of the client himself. If the client's right to the deeds which came to the hands of the solicitor is absolute, so will be the right of the solicitor. If the deeds in the hands of the client are subject to any rights outstanding in third parties, such rights will follow them into the hands of the solicitor. These consequences flow so immediately from the nature of the relation subsisting between the client and his solicitor, that even independently of authority we should have felt bound by the principles on which they depend. But we have the most ample authority in support of the view we take on this part of the case, in the three cases before Sir Edward Sugden, so much dwelt on in the argument. We allude to the cases of Smith v. Chichester, Blunden v. Desart and Molesworth v. Robbins. In the last of these cases it was expressly decided that the claim of a party having an equitable right against the client must prevail into whosoever hands the deeds have come after such equitable right has arisen. Indeed, the principle is obviously the same, whether the right affecting the client's interest is legal or equitable. "No man," as was stated by Sir Edward Sugden in his judgment, "can give a lien to a solicitor of a higher nature than the interest he himself has in the deeds."

Applying, then, these principles to the facts of the present case, it appears to us clear, that, laying aside all consideration of particular conduct, the solicitor did not on the completion of the contract acquire any lien on the deeds against the plaintiff. If, on the completion of the contract and execution of the conveyance in January 1842, the title deeds had been all handed over to Mr. Lewis himself, and not to his solicitors, he would then have had them subject to an equitable claim on the part of the plaintiff as mortgagee, by virtue of his mortgage of September 1839. And if Mr. Lewis had then put them into the hands of his solicitors, they could only have held them subject to the same rights as attached to them in the hands of Mr. Lewis himself. It can make no difference that instead of coming first into the hands of Mr. Lewis and from him to the solicitors, they were at once handed over by the vendors to the solicitors; for the solicitors, on their obtaining them, obtained them not by any title paramount to that of their client, but as his agent, and of course with all the liability which would have attached on them if they had passed first into the hands of the client and from him to the solicitors. This disposes of the first head of the argument.

But then, it was said, secondly, that whatever may be the general doctrine, here the conduct of the plaintiff was such as to preclude him from insisting on his title against the lien of the solicitors of

Mr. Lewis; but we can discover nothing whatever in the plaintiff's conduct to warrant such a proposition. When the plaintiff advanced his money and obtained his mortgage-deed in September 1839, he, of course, employed his own solicitor to act for him. All that can be alleged against him by the solicitors of Mr. Lewis, the mortgagor, is that he did not inform them of his security. But he was under no obligation to give them any such information, nor was it in the ordinary course of business that he should do so. There is no suggestion that he meant or wished to mislead them. There was nothing to suggest to his mind that it could be of importance to the solicitors that he should give them notice of his security. Cases may undoubtedly occur in which parties by standing by and remaining silent may give to others rights against them in the same way as if they had been active in making representation, but that can only be where it has been the duty of the party not to be silent, or where the party remaining silent might reasonably infer that such silence would be taken by others as sanctioning a particular course of conduct. No such circumstances exist here. The conduct of the plaintiff, for aught at least that appears, was just what might be expected from a man intending to deal with perfect fairness. He became mortgagee, employing his own solicitor, and took it for granted that the mortgagor and his solicitor would settle their own rights among themselves. There does not, therefore, appear to us to be anything in the conduct of the plaintiff depriving him of his ordinary rights.

The only remaining question is on the point, whether the solicitors may not have a lien against the plaintiff, though not for their whole demand on Mr. Lewis, yet for so much as relates to the obtaining the conveyance of the Lypkiatt estate from the vendors? As to this the argument was, that these costs were incurred for the common benefit of the plaintiff and Mr. Lewis, and so that the lien of the solicitors ought to prevail against both the one and the other. On this minor point, Lord Justice Knight Bruce entertains some doubt, and I can, therefore, express my own opinion only.

In my opinion these costs do not differ from the rest. I think the solicitors have no lien against the plaintiff for the costs of obtaining the conveyance any more than for any other part of their bill. The lien of the solicitor is a right to retain deeds as a mode of enforcing payment of a debt due by the party whose deeds are retained. It is essentially a right arising between the party employed and his employer. The right when once constituted may, under circumstances, prevail in favour of the solicitor, not only against his employer but also parties deriving title under his employer. But it always originates from the relation of client and attorney,—that is, the employer and the employed. Taking that to be a correct view of the law, the question here is, who employed Messrs. Wathen, Bassett & Gurney to obtain and perfect the conveyance? No doubt when they had completed the conveyance their services enured to the benefit not only of Mr. Lewis the purchaser, but also of the plaintiff who claimed under him. But I do not think that this is material. If the case could be brought to the point, that the solicitors were acting not only for Mr. Lewis but also for the plaintiff, then neither Mr. Lewis nor the plaintiff could take the deeds of conveyance out of their hands without paying them the full amount of their costs incurred in preparing and perfecting them. But this certainly was not so. The solicitors were the solicitors of Mr. Lewis and of him only. He alone employed them. He alone was liable to pay them for their services, and against him alone, therefore, was this lien available when the deeds came into their hands. Their right is, as I think, precisely what it would have been if on the final settlement of the purchase, and execution of the deeds, the vendors had delivered the deeds to Mr. Lewis, and he had handed them over to the solicitors. In such a case the right of the solicitors would be only, as I think, to hold the deeds subject to all the rights legal and equitable affecting them in the hands of Mr. Lewis; and therefore their right was, as I conceive, subject to a prior right in the plaintiff in respect of his mortgage of September 1839. I do not, therefore, think there is any disinction between these deeds and the other deeds in the hands of the solicitors.

The result, therefore, is, that the decision of Sir James Wigram will be affirmed in every respect, and this appeal must therefore be dismissed; and Lord Justice Knight Bruce concurs with me, that the costs of the appeal must in this case follow the event, and so be paid by the appellants, because the appeal reproducing litigation on points manifestly in the opinion of both members of this Court properly decided by the Vice Chancellor, has taken a range widely beyond the narrow and restricted part of the case on which alone my learned Brother entertains any doubt. It is unnecessary to say anything on the question raised at the bar, whether if the lien had been established it would have extended to the debts due to all the successive firms, or only to that due to the last firm? Whether, in short, according to the doctrine laid down in In re Forshaw (4), the lien of a solicitor is affected by his taking a partner? That question does not arise in this case. On that point we express no opinion.

New Trustees—Death of Trustee in the Lifetime of the Testator—Appointment of Trustees by a Trustee declining to act.

A testator, by his will, appointed A. and B. to be his trustees; he then directed that "if the trustees hereby appointed or to be appointed as hereinafter is mentioned, should die," &c. it should be lawful for other trustees to be appointed as therein mentioned. A testator, by his will, appointed A. and B. to be his trustees, and directed that if his trustees thereby appointed should die, or desire to be discharged from, or refuse or decline to act, it should be lawful for the surviving or continuing trustee or trustees, or if there should be none such, then for the a description of the persons appointed trustees of the will. I can see no difference between her describing them as "trustees hereby appointed," and the naming them, and, if she had named them, there could not have been any doubt. I apprehend that it is clear that if a testator gives an interest to A, B, C, and D, to continue up to a certain time, and then provides that if A, B, C, and D. shall die, this interest shall go over, this provision will apply to the event of A, B, C, and D. dying in the lifetime of the testator, as well as after his death. I think that the cases referred to establish the principle that a contingency is not less a contingency because it operates in the testator's lifetime. I may also observe that this construction is a convenient one. It would be extremely inconvenient if it were to be held that, where a testator has directed the appointment of new trustees in case of the death of his trustees, this provision should be defeated by the death of a trustee in the testator's lifetime.

As to the question whether the power could be exercised by the trustee who declined to act, except for the purpose of appointing new trustees, it is to be observed that the testatrix has herself distinctly said "that it should be lawful for the surviving or continuing trustee, or, if there was no surviving or continuing trustee, then for the trustee so desirous of being discharged, or refusing, or declining to act, to appoint." Hence a person refusing to act is not prevented from exercising the power of appointing a new trustee. The case of Sharp v. Sharp (8) was much narrower than this. There the appointment of new trustees was given to the "survivors or survivor acting in the trusts." The trustees disclaimed, and it was held that the persons disclaiming were not to be considered as "the survivors or survivor of persons acting in the trusts." Here there is a power enabling the person refusing to act to appoint trustees. Being of opinion that the power was properly exercised, I think that this petition must be dismissed.

ROBINSON v. ROBINSON.

Trustees—Investment—Real Securities Tenant for Life—Cestui que Trust—Rate of Interest—Payment of Money out of Court without Petition.

Trustees under a will had an option to invest the testator's estate either in 3l. per cents. or on real security, but neglected to do so, leaving the fund in some other state of investment:—Held, overruling a decree at the Rolls, that the cestui que trust had not the option of charging them with the money and interest, or to claim the amount of 3l. per cents. because the cestui que trust never had the right to compel the purchase of 3l. per cents. and that the trustees were chargeable only with the money and interest.

The trustees having this option to invest either in 3l. per cents. or on real security,—Held, overruling the same decree, that the tenant for life was entitled to interest for one year after the death of the testator at 4l. per cent. on the money the property would have produced if sold at the end of that year, until the produce was invested in the 3l. per cents., not exceeding the amount of interest actually received.

Turnpike road bonds, secured by a mortgage or charge on tolls and toll-houses, are real estate, and held so to be, overruling the same decree; and although the tenant for life was declared entitled to the interest on them, the Court, considering the social changes resulting from the formation of railways, directed a reference to the Master, to inquire whether it was expedient to leave assets so invested.

A party having paid in money, in obedience to a decree of the Court below, and the decree being varied in such a way that he is entitled to have that money paid out, the same can be directed in the order on the appeal to be so paid out without any petition being presented for that purpose.

Semble—that where trustees are bound to invest in 3l. per cents. and 3l. per cents. have fallen instead of risen in value, they are chargeable with the money and interest, instead of 3l. per cents., at the option of the cestui que trust.

The Court also, after reviewing the former decisions, laid down the following propositions :—First, where trustees improperly retain balances or cause or permit trust money to be lost, they are chargeable for the same with interest at 4l. per cent. Secondly, where trustees have money in their hands, which they are bound permanently to invest for the benefit of their cestui que trust, the rule of the Court is generally that they shall invest in 3l. per cents.; therefore, if they neglect to do so, and there is no express direction not to do so, or there is an express trust that they shall do so, in the latter case, and semble as to the two former cases, it is in the option of the cestui que trust to charge them either with the principal sum retained and interest, or with the amount of 3l. per cents. which would have been purchased if the investment had been made. Thirdly, where trustees lend, or use trust money in trade, they are chargeable not only with the money and interest, but with the profits made in the trade, the interest generally being 5l. per cent.

This was an appeal from part of a decree of the late Master of the Rolls, Lord Langdale. The facts are fully set forth in the report of the case, 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 73, but may be sufficiently stated for the understanding of the judgment on the appeal, as follows:—Matthew Robinson, by his will, gave his residuary personal estate to trustees, upon trust, with all convenient speed to collect, get in, and dispose thereof, or to continue the same in or upon any of the parliamentary stocks or funds of Great Britain, or on real securities in England, at interest, or to alter and vary the same for others of a like nature, when and so often as it should be expedient, and to pay the interest and dividends unto his son Augustin Robinson, for his life, and after his decease to pay and transfer the said residuary estate, and the stocks, funds, and securities, in which the same should be invested among the children of his son in equal shares as therein mentioned. The trustees were appointed executors, who, after the testator's death, proved the will. A large part of the estate consisted of London Dock stock, Bank stock, and money due to the testator from the trustees of the Surrey and Sussex roads, and on bonds from the Commissioners of Sewers of Surrey and Kent, and these were allowed by the trustees to remain unconverted for several years after the testator's death, and a loss accrued to the estate from the sale of the Bank stock and the Sewers bonds, but a gain was made from the London Dock stock. Some turnpike bonds, part of the estate, were never converted at all. The dates were as follow :—the testator died in July 1837, and his will was proved in August following; in December in the same year two of the Surrey and Sussex road bonds were paid off; in July 1845, the Bank stock and London Dock stock were sold, and in August following the tenant for life bought the debt due to the testator (5,000*l.*) from the Commissioners of Sewers for 5,000*l.*, and the money in each case was invested in 3*l.* per cent. consols; and in November 1846 another of the road bonds was paid off at par. The sewers bonds were secured by the rates and assessments which the Commissioners were authorized by certain acts of parliament to levy, and the road bonds were secured on the toll-houses and the tolls payable thereat. Lord Langdale was of opinion and held, that the turnpike bonds were not such real securities as were contemplated by the testator in his will, and were, at best, only mixed securities; and after stating that it could not reasonably be contended that the sewers bonds were real securities, held that they were not so; his Lordship also held that the loss which had arisen on the sale of the sewers bonds and Bank stock could not be set off against the gains that arose from the sale of the London Dock stock, and that Augustin Robinson, the tenant for life, was entitled to the whole of the dividends and annual income that actually accrued due from the residuary estate, including therein the dividends and income that accrued due on the Bank stock, the London Dock stock, and the money secured on the sewers bonds and road bonds; during and up to the end of the first year from the testator's death, and that he was entitled to the dividends and annual income of so much of the residuary estate as was in a proper state of investment at the end of such first year, and to so much only of the dividends and annual income that since the end of such first year had actually accrued due on the Bank stock and London Dock stock, and the money secured on the Sewers bonds and road bonds as should not exceed the amount of the dividends which would have accrued on the 3*l.* per cent. consols, which should have been purchased at the end of such first year with the monies arising from the sale or conversion or receipt of the same respectively, if the same had been sold or converted or received and invested in the purchase of 3*l.* per cent. consols. And it was also ordered that the trustees and executors should make good to the estate of the testator such an amount of Bank annuities as could have been purchased with the proceeds of such sale or conversion or receipt, in case the same had been sold or converted into money, or raised at the end of such one year. And it was declared that the gain which had accrued in respect of the London Dock stock had accrued for the benefit of the estate. From so much of this decree as related to the road bonds, and the amount of interest to be paid to him, the tenant for life appealed. There was also a petition of appeal by the executors and trustees, as to the refunding by them.

The plaintiffs in the suit were infant children of Augustin Robinson, the tenant for life; the defendants were Augustin Robinson the tenant for life, the two surviving executors and trustees, and the personal representatives of the deceased executor and trustee, and the object of the suit was the administration of the testator's estate and a declaration of the rights of all parties in the clear residue. It was in evidence that in order to indemnify the executors and to secure the full benefit of the rights of his children, Mr. Augustin Robinson, the tenant for life, had bought three sums of 3*l.* per cents. in the names of the executors, to meet the excess of his receipts beyond what he would have been entitled to from the dividends of 3*l.* per cents. if the same had been purchased at the end of a year from the testator's death. These sums were 289*l.*, 225*l.* and 1,213*l.* consols.

Mr. Walpole and Mr. Kent, for the appellant, the tenant for life, stated that the question of the Sewers bonds was not raised, but as to the road bonds it was clear they were real securities; and the only point for consideration on them was whether they were so within the meaning and intention of the testator's will. The case of Doe d. Banks v. Booth (1) shewed that the money being secured on the toll-houses, ejectment could be brought; therefore, in the abstract, these road bonds were real securities, and as the form of the bonds was in pursuance of the local act (and the acts continuing that statute), by which the road trustees were authorized to mortgage, among other things, the "toll-houses;" and as the testator himself had so invested his money, and had directed his trustees either to call in or to continue his property on their present investment in the funds, or on real securities, or to alter and vary, and so on, it was plain the road bonds were real securities within the contemplation of the testator himself. Had money been at the time of the testator's death invested in railway shares, and had such a discretion been given to trustees as was here conferred, no doubt could have been entertained but they were real securities, and real securities within the meaning of the testator's will. As to the rate of interest to be given to the tenant for life, the judgment of the Master of the Rolls was fallacious, for it seemed to go upon the ground that there was an improper investment, and that there ought to have been a sale and an investment in 3*l.* per cent. consols, that being most advantageous to the cestuis que trust. In the first place, there was a fallacy as to investment; for the complaint here was, that there had been no investment; and, secondly, that the option should be treated as belonging to the cestuis que trust. In truth, the option was given to the trustees, and they not having exercised it, they were answerable, but not for an investment or assumed investment in stock; if it were otherwise, in case the will had contained a power of investing in railway shares, and the trustees had neglected so to invest, as well might the cestuis que trust select shares in any particular railway which were most expensive to be purchased. The cases of Marsh v. Hunter (2), Hockley v. Ban- tock (3), Watts v. Girdlestone (4), Ames v. Parkinson (5), Ouseley v. Anstruther (6), Shepherd v. Moulds (7), and Rees v. Williams (8), were also cited and commented on, on behalf of the tenant for life, as to the foregoing points. That the interest should be 4l. per cent., the cases of Caldecott v. Caldecott (9) and Sutherland v. Cooke (10) were referred to.

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. Elmsley, for the surviving trustees and executors and representatives of the deceased trustee and executor, argued that the case of Dimes v. Scott (11), relied on in the argument in the court below, was no longer an authority. It was a confusion in principle to consider the present case as governed by those where the trustees had used the trust fund, and to say that, because an investment had not been made, 3l. per cents. were to be bought. The case of Buxton v. Buxton (12) was also cited.

Mr. G. Druce, for other defendants.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Dickinson, for the plaintiffs, contended that the principal security of the road bonds was on the tolls, and they could not be real securities within the testator's meaning; and, moreover, the tolls were only to be collected during the continuance of each act of parliament, as it was successively passed authorizing the collection of such tolls. The charge on the toll-houses could not be relied on, for they were of very trifling comparative value. The case of Doe v. Booth, cited by the appellants, was an authority in favour of the plaintiffs, as was that of Mills v. Mills (13). The question before the Court, as to real securities, was very different from that which arose under the Mortmain

Act. In this case the Court would use its discretion; in those cases the only question was, whether the money given was charged on real estate. Here the Court would see, first, whether the security was a real security; and, secondly, whether it was of such a character as was contemplated by the testator. Road bonds were not of such a nature. The cases of Dimes v. Scott and Ex parte Lewis (14), and some of the later cases before Lord Langdale, and which had before been cited, shewed, whatever was the weight now given to the first-mentioned case in other respects, that the tenant for life was entitled to no more than 3l. per cent. On both grounds, therefore, the appeal should be dismissed, and with costs.

Dec. 22.—LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH, after stating the will, the suit and its object, the reference to the Master on the original hearing, the Master's report, and the decree of Lord Langdale on further directions, particularly as to those parts which relate to the tenant for life, and his title to interest as before set forth, and as to the executors and the tenant for life being bound to refund so much of the interest, after the first year of the testator's decease, on the Bank stock, the London Dock stock, the road bonds, and the Sewers bonds, as had been paid to the tenant for life, over and above the dividends on consols, if such consols had been purchased at that time, proceeded with the judgment of the Court as follows:—Against this part of the decree Augustin Robinson, the tenant for life, and the executors, have severally appealed, on the ground that the decree is erroneous in charging the executors with the amount of 3l. per cents. which might have been realized at the end of the year, and also in declaring that the tenant for life was entitled to no more than the amount of the dividends that would have arisen from such 3l. per cents. in case they had been purchased. The executors contend that they are chargeable only with the money which the securities in question, if sold at the end of a year from the testator's decease, would then have produced, and with interest thereon at 4l. per cent.; and that, as in fact the securities produced more than could have been obtained in 1838, the plaintiffs have no demand against them. The tenant for life contends that he is entitled to have credit from July 1838 to July 1845, not for the amount of the dividends which would have been produced if the 3*l.* per cents. had been purchased, but interest at 4*l.* per cent. on the sums which the securities, if sold in July 1838, would then have produced, not exceeding of course the amount of dividends or interest actually realized.

The case was very fully argued before us a few days since, and as there has been a difference of opinion in different branches of the Court on the subject of the duties and liabilities of executors, and the rights of a tenant for life in cases like the present, we desired a short time to look into those authorities before we came to a decision. In the present case, it will be observed, the executors had the option of investing the trust money at their discretion in real or government securities; and in such a case Sir John Leach held, in the case of Marsh v. Hunter, that the trustees by whose default the money was lost were chargeable, not with the amount of stock which might have been purchased, but only with the principal money lost; and, of course, although the report is not so expressed, with interest thereon. That decision occurred in 1822. Four years later, namely, in 1826, occurred the case of Hockley v. Bantock, before Lord Gifford. There the executors had a similar discretion of investing either in real or government securities; and upon a bill seeking to charge them with balances improperly retained in their hands, Lord Gifford directed an inquiry as to the price of 3*l.* per cents. at the several times when the balances ought to have been invested. Such an inquiry would have been improper if the executors could not have been charged with the value of the stock; and that case, therefore, is an authority that, in the opinion of Lord Gifford, they might be so charged. Notwithstanding this last case, however, Sir John Leach adhered to his own view of the law, and acted upon it in an unreported case of Gale v. Pitt, at the Rolls, on the 10th of May 1830, which we referred to in the Registrar's book. Lord Gifford's authority has been followed by Lord Langdale in several reported cases, to which we were referred in the course of the argument, namely, Watts v. Girdlestone, Ames v. Parkinson and Ouseley v. Anstruther. On the other hand, Sir James Wigram, in Shepherd v. Moulis, and my learned Brother, in Rees v. Williams, have refused to follow the authority of Hockley v. Bantock, and have acted on the earlier case of Marsh v. Hunter. In this irreconcilable conflict of authority, it is absolutely necessary for us to look to the principle on which the doctrine rests.

There can be no doubt but that where trustees improperly retain balances in their hands, or by want of due care cause or permit trust monies to be lost, they are chargeable with the sums so retained or lost, and with interest thereon at 4*l.* per cent.; and it may also be true that where the trustees have in their hands money which they are bound to secure permanently for the benefit of their cestuis que trust, there, in the absence of express authority or direction to the contrary, they are generally bound to invest the money in the 3*l.* per cents. This obligation, not the result of any positive law, has been imposed on trustees generally by the Court as a convenient rule, affording security to the cestui que trust, and presenting no possible difficulty to the trustees. Supposing, then, the trustees have improperly retained in their hands balances which they ought to have invested in the 3*l.* per cents., either by reason of this general rule of the Court or because such a duty was expressly imposed upon them by the terms of their trust, or have by neglect allowed such balances to be lost, what, in such a case, is the right of the cestui que trust? In all such cases, or, at all events, in all cases where there has been an express trust to invest in the 3*l.* per cents., the cestui que trust has the option of charging the trustee, either with the principal sum retained and interest, or with the amount of the 3*l.* per cents. that would have arisen if the investment had been properly made. The doctrine of the Court, where it implies this rule is, that the trustee shall not profit by his own wrong. If he had done what he was bound to do, a certain amount of 3*l.* per cents. would have been forthcoming for the cestui que trust; and, therefore, if called on to have such 3*l.* per cents. forthcoming, he is bound to do so; just as in an ordinary case every wrongdoer is bound to put the party injured, as far as the nature of the case allows, in the same situation in which he would have stood if the wrong had not been done. All this is very intelligible. Again, suppose the trustee has not improperly retained balances, but has lent or used them in trade; there the cestui que trust, if it is for his interest to do so, has a right to charge the trustee, not only with the sum retained and interest, but also with the profits made in the trade. The ground on which that right rests is this: the employment in trade is unwarrantable, but if it turns out to be profitable the cestui que trust, in such a case, has a right to follow the money that is used in trade and the profit, because in such a case the trade profits have, in fact, been produced by the employment of the money of the cestui que trust; and it would be manifestly unjust to permit the trustee to rely on his own misconduct in having exposed the fund to the risks of trade as a reason for retaining the extra profits beyond interest for his own benefit. Even where no such extra profits have been made, the cestui que trust is, in general, at liberty to charge the trustee who has allowed the trust money to be employed in trade with interest at 5*l.* per cent., that being the ordinary rate of interest paid on capital in trade. This right depends on principles the same, or nearly the same, as those which enable the cestui que trust to adopt the investment and take the profit actually made. But the ground on which, in all these cases, the right of election in the cestui que trust rests, wholly fails in the case where a trustee, having an option to invest either in the 3*l.* per cents. or in real securities, neglects his duty and carelessly leaves the trust fund in some other state of investment. In such a case, the cestui que trust cannot say to the trustee, "If you had done your duty, I should have had a certain amount of 3*l.* per cents.;" or, "the trust fund would now consist of a certain amount of 3*l.* per cents." It is obvious that the trustee might have duly discharged his duty, and yet no such result would have ensued. Where a man is bound by covenant to do one of two things and does neither, there an action lies by the covenantee; the measure of damage is the loss arising by reason of the covenantor having failed to do that which is most, not that which is least, beneficial to the covenantee; and the same principles may perhaps be applied, by analogy, to the case of a trustee failing to invest in either of two modes, equally lawful by the terms of the trust. It was contended at the bar that in such a case the trustee has, by his neglect, lost his right of electing between the two modes of investment,—that he was always bound by the trust to exercise his discretion in the mode most beneficial for the objects of the trust,—and that having omitted to do so at the time when the option was open to him, he can no longer do it when he is called on to account for his neglect, and when he can no longer exercise an unbiassed and impartial option. The fallacy of this argument consists in assuming that, in the case supposed the trustee is called on to exercise any option at all. He is not called on to exercise any option retrospectively, but is made responsible for not having exercised it at the proper time; for not having made one of two several kinds of investment: and a reason for his being in such case chargeable only with the money which should have been invested, and not with the 3*l.* per cents. which might have been produced, is, that there never was any right in the cestui que trust to compel the purchase of the 3*l.* per cents. The trustee is answerable for not having done what he was bound to do; and the measure of his responsibility should be, what the cestui que trust must have been entitled to, in whatever mode that duty was performed.

The grounds on which Lord Langdale proceeded in the several cases before him appear to have been, that when the trustee has failed to discharge his duty in either of the ways which were open to him, the cestuis que trust may then exercise an option which certainly did not belong to them by the terms of the trust; that is to say, that if the trustee has failed to exercise his option, then the right of election passes to the cestui que trust, though not given to him by the instrument creating the trust. But on what foundation does this supposed right of the cestui que trust to exercise such an option rest? No such right can be derived from the principle that the cestui que trust is entitled to compel the trustee to do what he was bound to do, for he was not bound to purchase the 3l. per cents.; nor from the principle that he may follow the trust funds into their actual state of investment, or charge a higher rate of interest in consequence of such investment; for the foundation of the complaint is, that the funds have not been invested at all. The only plausible foundation for the doctrine which occurs to us is this: the trustee was bound to exercise his option, not capriciously, but in the mode likely to be most beneficial to the cestui que trust; and their interests appear, in the result, to be best served by requiring the investment of the 3l. per cents. But this reasoning seems founded on a fallacy; the selection of the 3l. per cents. is thus made to depend, not on any option in their favour which the trustee was originally bound to exercise, but upon the accident of their subsequent rise in value; a principle of decision from which, with all deference, we differ. If such a principle is to be applied, then, as it was well put at the bar, if in the present case there had been a discretion to invest in railway shares, the cestui que trust might perhaps now fix on shares in some particular railway which have risen very highly in value, and say the investment might have been and so ought to have been made on that particular security. Upon the whole, therefore, we cannot discover any such right of option as is contended for in the cestui que trust; not on the ground of his being entitled, by the terms of the trust, to compel the trustees to make an investment in the 3l. per cents., for no such obligation was imposed on them,—not on the ground of his being bound to adopt or insist on any actual investment, for no investment was made,—not on the ground of any obligation on the part of the trustees to select the 3l. per cents. as the most beneficial mode of investment, for the advantage of the 3l. per cents. arises from the accidental subsequent rise in value, and not from any necessary superiority at the time when the investment ought to have been made.

The consequence is, that the decree should, we think, be varied by striking out so much of it as declares that the produce arising from the sale of the Bank stock, London Dock stock and Sewers bonds ought to have been invested in the 3l. per cents., and that the defendant, Augustin Robinson, was entitled to so much only of the income arising from those funds from the end of one year after the testator's decease, as should not exceed the amount of the dividends which would have accrued due on the 3l. per cents. if purchased. And it must be declared that he is entitled, from the end of the first year after the testator's decease up to the time of the sale and investment in the 3l. per cents. in July and August 1845, to interest at 4l. per cent. on the amount which the Master has found that those funds would have produced at the end of the year, not exceeding the amount of interest and dividends actually produced. This disposes of the question as to the Bank stock, London Dock stock and Sewers bonds. But before we quit this part of the subject we think it right, by way of caution, to remark that our decision does not at all go to exonerate trustees who, by the express terms of the trust, are bound to invest in the 3l. per cents., but who have retained the balance in their hands, from the obligation to account for those balances, with interest, instead of making good the amount of 3l. per cents., whenever the 3l. per cents. have fallen instead of risen in value. In such a case, the same principle applies which authorizes the cestui que trust to adopt any investment in trade or otherwise which has been actually made. He may insist on having the 3l. per cents., for, by the very terms of the trust, it was the duty of the trustee so to invest the trust money; or he may, on the other hand, if no such investment has been made, treat the money as being, according to the fact, in the hands of the trustee, to be accounted for by him. No such question arises in the present case, and we only advert to it now because an argument principally founded on such a possible state of things was advanced by counsel.

It now remains to consider the question as to the turnpike road bonds. The Master found that the testator was at his death entitled to 6,000*l.* due from the trustees of the Surrey and Sussex roads, secured by a mortgage or charge on the tolls and toll-houses, which the said trustees were by act of parliament authorized to make. Of this sum 1,000*l.* was paid off by the road trustees to the executors on the 2nd of December 1837, which was duly applied as part of the testator's assets. The interest on the remaining 5,000*l.* was regularly paid to the tenant for life up to the 23rd of November 1846, when a further sum of 500*l.*, part of the 5,000*l.*, was paid off and was invested by the executors in the purchase of 3*l.* per cents., so that a sum of 4,500*l.* only now remains secured on those road securities. Lord Langdale's order puts these road bonds, as they have been not very accurately designated in the argument, on precisely the same footing as the Bank stock, London Dock stock, and Sewers bonds, and treats the 5,000*l.* road bonds which were in the hands of the executors at the end of the year from the testator's decease, as assets left by them improperly invested, and as to which, therefore, the executors ought to be charged with the amount of 3*l.* per cents. which, if they were sold, they would have produced. If these securities are not real securities within the meaning of that expression contained in the will,—by which it is to be recollected, the testator authorizes his executors to invest in real securities, or to leave any money in real securities ;—if these securities are not real securities within the meaning of that expression, then of course the same rule must be applied to them as to the other securities sold in July and August 1845. But we think that these road bonds, as they have been called, are real securities, in which, by the terms of the will, the executors were justified in leaving the testator's assets invested. There cannot be any doubt that they are real securities. Indeed they are so, perhaps, even more emphatically than an ordinary mortgage. The security is merely a security on the tolls and toll-houses, that is to say, on certain corporeal and certain incorporeal hereditaments. They give no personal right against any one. The remedy of the mortgagee or bondholder is merely against the real property made the subject of the charge, and if the testator had given to any one by way of specific legacy all such real securities as he should die possessed of or entitled to, we consider it perfectly clear these turnpike road securities would have passed. The question then is, whether the executors were justified in leaving these securities as they found them? That is to say, treating them as being not improper investments to be continued under the authority given by the will? We think they were. There was nothing to fetter the discretion of the executors; they were at liberty to leave any part of the assets which they might find invested in real securities, in the same security in which they might find it. The 5,000*l.* in question was invested in that which we consider to be a real security, permanent in its nature and approved by the testator. To hold that it was a breach of duty in the executors to leave that sum as they found it, would, as we think, be to deprive them of the discretion given to them by the testator, without any sufficient warrant for our so doing. The circumstances, however, connected with the great social changes resulting from the formation of railways, may now have made these turnpike mortgages ineligible as a security in which longer to leave the assets invested; and we think it reasonable that the Master should inquire whether it may not be expedient that they should now be called in? But, in the mean time, we do not feel warranted in treating them as securities which the executors were bound to realize. The order, therefore, must, as to these mortgages, be varied by declaring, if necessary, that they were real securities in which the executors were justified in leaving the assets of the testator invested, and the interest on which, therefore, has been properly paid to the tenant for life. We desire not to be understood as giving any opinion on the point, not arising in the present case, whether the executors would have been justified in laying out any part of the general assets in turnpike securities similar to those now in question.

It appears that, in order to cover the deficiency in the 3*l.* per cents. purchased by the investment of 1845, with the money produced by the sale of the Bank stock and Sewers bonds, Augustin Robinson, the tenant for life, has purchased in the names of the executors two sums of 289*l.* 3*l.* per cents. and 225*l.* 3*l.* per cents., and he has in like manner purchased in their names 1,213*l.* 3*l.* per cents. to meet the excess of his receipts as income beyond what he would have been entitled to in the way of dividends on the 3*l.* per cents. if purchased at the end of the first year. An account must be taken of what Augustin Robinson ought to have received as interest at 4*l.* per cent. on the value of the Bank stock, the London Dock stock, and Sewers bonds, at the end of the year from the testator's decease, and he must pay into court the excess of his receipts of the dividends and interest on those funds beyond the amount of such 4*l.* per cent. Those three sums of 289*l.*, 225*l.* and 1,213*l.* 3*l.* per cents. will stand as a security for what shall be found due from him in respect of that excess, and on his paying into court what, if anything, shall be found due from him on taking the account, those sums of stock must be re-transferred to him. That disposes of the whole case.

At the close of the judgment, counsel for the appellant, Augustin Robinson, stated that that gentleman had paid into court, in obedience to the decree of the Master of the Rolls, a considerable sum of money, much more than, now the decree had been varied, would be payable by him. It was, therefore, desirable that the expense of a petition to get any balance due to him out of court should be saved, if that could be arranged in the decree on the appeal. All parties admitted that the balance would be in his favour.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE, as all parties agreed, directed the Registrar to enter the decree now pronounced thus:—Vary the decree in the manner stated by Lord Cranworth, and then go on—"Counsel on all sides representing" so and so (the facts now stated), "the Court doth order" so and so (the payment of the balance out to the tenant for life). That would save the expenses of a petition, and if the parties could come to an understanding, the amounts could be verified by affidavit.

Trustees Relief Act—Pauper Lunatic —Order for Payment to Guardians of the Poor for past Maintenance.

A fund belonging to a pauper lunatic was paid by the trustees into court under the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96. On the petition of the guardians of the poor, an order was made for the payment to them out of the fund of the expenses incurred by the parish in the support of the lunatic.

Andrew Upfull, by his will, dated the 29th of March 1831, gave to his wife, Mary Upfull, to her own use, and for the care and support of his son, Charles Upfull, all the Bank stock which he might be possessed of at the time of his decease, with power to his wife to sell out of the principal stock every year so much as would, with the dividends, amount to 45*l.*, and to raise an additional 10*l.* if required; and the testator also empowered his wife by will to bequeath to such trustees as she might choose what should remain of the stock at her death.

At the time of the testator's death, in 1833, he was possessed of 800*l.* 3*l.* per cent. annuities.

Mary Upfull died in April 1850, and, by her will, after directing payment of her debts, &c., gave all her personal estate to her executors in trust, to apply the same towards the maintenance of Charles Upfull in such manner as they should think fit; and she appointed the respondents, Thomas Dawes and H. G. Day, her executors, who duly proved her will. On the 7th of February 1851, the executors transferred into the name of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery to an account entitled "In the matter of Upfull's Trust," the sum of 350*l.* 3*l.* per cent. Bank annuities, being the residue of the said sum of 800*l.* stock, after sales made at different times by Mary Upfull.

Charles Upfull, at the time of the testator's death, was a person of unsound mind, and had ever since so continued; and in February 1844, he was placed by Mary Upfull in the workhouse of the Brentford Union, whence he was shortly afterwards removed to the Middlesex county lunatic asylum at Hanwell, where he now resided at the cost of the parish of Isleworth; but no commission of lunacy had been taken out against him.

The present petition was presented by the guardians of the poor of the Brentford Union, stating that, at the time Charles Upfull was placed in the workhouse, it was not known to the parish authorities that either he or his mother was entitled to any property; that various sums had been paid by the guardians of the poor of the Brentford Union to the treasurer of the said county lunatic asylum for the maintenance of the said Charles Upfull, which sums amounted on the 31st of December last to the sum of 155*l.* 14*s.*; and that the parish authorities were liable to pay yearly to the said treasurer the sum of 22*l.* so long as the said Charles Upfull should continue an inmate of the said asylum. The petition prayed that it might be referred to the taxing Master to tax the costs of the petitioners and respondents relating to this application, and that so much of the said sum of 350*l.* stock might be sold as would be sufficient to raise the sum of 155*l.* 14*s.* and the said costs, and the proceeds applied accordingly; and that no part of the residue of the said stock, after such sale as aforesaid, might be sold or transferred without notice to the petitioners or the guardians for the time being of the Brentford Union.

Mr. S. Miller, for the petition.—The 27th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101. enacts, that expenses incurred for insane paupers may be levied on their estates, and authorizes any person having property of a lunatic to defray such charges; and by the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103. s. 16, the guardians of the poor are authorized to take the property of a pauper for the expenses of his maintenance. In this case, there is a direct trust in favour of the lunatic, and the fund is in court; and the question is, whether the Court will, in analogy to the statute, direct payment of these expenses out of the fund, and without a reference.

Mr. Nichols appeared for the trustees, and submitted that the next-of-kin ought to have been served.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The act of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101. authorizes the trustees of a lunatic, out of property in their possession, to defray certain expenses incurred by the parish in respect of such lunatic, and makes the receipt of the overseers a good discharge to the trustees for the money so paid; and the act of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103. empowers the guardians of the poor to levy for maintenance on the property of paupers generally; but neither of those acts refers to the jurisdiction of the Court. The 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96, the act under which the fund has been paid in, empowers trustees, having money belonging to a trust, to pay the same into court in the matter of the particular trust, to attend the orders of the Court; and the second section empowers the Court to make orders on petition for the administration of the trust, such orders to have the same effect as if made in a suit. Assuming the money to be properly paid in, and the application to be properly supported, the question still remains, how far the act applies to the case of a lunatic cestui que trust? For the act supposes the party interested to be served, but here the lunatic is not represented. Now, before payment of the fund into court, the trustees might, under the authority of the 27th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, have paid this money to the guardians of the poor, and their receipt would have been a sufficient discharge to the trustees. By the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96, the Court is placed in the position of a trustee; and, therefore, I am of opinion that I may properly make the order.

Trust, Breach of—Parties—Proof of Title in Plaintiffs.

By an ante-nuptial settlement the trustees were empowered, with consent of the parties, to sell out the trust fund, and invest the proceeds upon real securities. By a memorandum executed contemporaneously with and indorsed on the settlement, the parties requested the trustees to advance the trust monies to the owners of Vauxhall Gardens upon mortgage as first, second, or third mortgagees:—Held, that "the owners" meant owners at the date of the settlement and memorandum, and that an advance to the three owners originally without security, and the subsequent acceptance of a mortgage with a joint and several covenant from two of the three owners, one having then retired, was a breach of trust, and the trustees were ordered to bring the fund into court.

The bill alleged that some of the plaintiffs were children of another plaintiff, and that they and certain defendants were the only children of the marriage. The answer did not deny the allegation, but stated that the defendants did not know that these were all the children, and raised no objection for want of parties on this ground; no evidence was gone into to prove the relationship. The Court refused to entertain an objection taken for the first time on the rehearing that some of the plaintiffs had not proved their title.

By an indenture, dated the 15th of January 1825, made between Thomas Bish and Frances Elizabeth Bish, spinster, his daughter, of the first part, Robert Hodgson Fowler of the second part, and George Thomas Robert Reynal, George Webb, William Fowler, and Chappel Fowler of the third part, being a settlement made previously to the marriage of Mr. Fowler with Miss Bish, after reciting, that 8,450*l.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities, had been transferred, by Thomas Bish, into the names of the said G. T. R. Reynal, G. Webb, W. Fowler and C. Fowler, it was declared that they, the said four trustees, should stand possessed thereof, after the then intended marriage, upon trust out of the dividends to pay the premium on a policy of assurance, and subject thereto, to pay the residue to the intended wife during her life, for her separate use, without power of anticipation; and after her decease, in case there should not be any child or issue of the marriage living at her decease, the said trustees were directed to stand possessed of the capital stock in trust for the said T. Bish; but in case she should have any issue of the marriage living at the time of her death, then upon trust to pay the dividends to the intended husband for life, or until his bankruptcy; and after the determination of the preceding interest, the said trustees were directed to stand possessed of the capital stock and dividends in trust for the children living at the decease of the intended wife, who should live to attain the age of twenty-one years, or who should die leaving issue. And there was a power for the trustees, with the consent and approbation of R. H. Fowler and F. E. Fowler, in writing, during their lives, to sell out the 8,450*l.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced Bank annuities, or any part thereof, and invest the proceeds upon any other public stock or funds, or upon real security or securities at interest; and also from time to time to vary the securities on which the trust monies should be invested.

Contemporaneously with or shortly after the execution of the settlement, and before the marriage, the intended husband and wife and Mr. Bish signed a memorandum indorsed on the settlement to the following effect:—

"We hereby request the trustees within named to advance, pursuant to the power within contained for that purpose, the sum of 8,450*l.*, 3*l.* per cent. reduced Bank annuities, or any part thereof, to the owners or lessees of Vauxhall Gardens, in the county of Surrey, upon mortgage, either as first, second, or third mortgagees, for such time and at such rate of interest as the said trustees may in their discretion think fit."

At the date of the settlement, Mr. Bish, with two partners named Frederick Gye and Richard Hughes, were proprietors of Vauxhall Gardens (which were of copyhold tenure) and were entitled to the fee according to the custom of the manor, as tenants in common.

The marriage having been solemnized, the trustees soon after sold out the stock, and on the 24th of February 1825 lent the proceeds, amounting to 8,000*l.* to Thomas Bish, Frederick Gye, and Richard Hughes, on the understanding that a mortgage of Vauxhall Gardens should be executed, but without taking any present security.

On the 30th of July 1825, Mr. Bish retired from the partnership concern, and all his interest in the copyhold premises was thereupon transferred to and became vested in Messrs. Gye & Hughes, who continued to carry on the concern.

The 8,000*l.* lent remained unsecured until the 29th of November 1826, when, by an indenture made between Messrs. Gye & Hughes of the one part and the four trustees of the other part, Messrs. Gye & Hughes covenanted to surrender the property (subject to two prior mortgage securities therein specified, and also subject to redemption on repayment of the 8,000*l.* and interest) to the four trustees.

The interest on the 8,000*l.* was regularly paid, and in the year 1837, Messrs. Gye & Hughes, upon the application of Reynal for repayment of the 8,000*l.*, repaid 1,000*l.* in part thereof.

In May 1840, Messrs. Gye & Hughes became bankrupts; and on the 9th of September 1841, in pursuance of an order made in the bankruptcy by the Court of Review, upon the petition of Mr. Reynal and of the three other trustees, and of certain other persons interested in the two other prior mortgages, the mortgaged premises were put up for sale by auction, but they were not then sold.

The premises were afterwards nominally sold to Mr. William Fowler, one of the trustees, at a nominal price of 22,339*l.* 7*s.* 7*d.*, and were conveyed to him by an indenture, dated the 16th of February 1843, in consideration of the payment of that sum to the several mortgagees; but no part of the sum was ever in fact paid by him.

No part of the balance of 7,000*l.* was ever afterwards realized.

On the 30th of June 1847, Mrs. Fowler with other plaintiffs described as her children, by their next friend, filed a bill against Mr. Reynal, one of the trustees of the settlement of her husband, and other cestuis que trust under the settlement; but Mr. Webb, Mr. William Fowler, and Mr. Chappel Fowler, the three other trustees of the settlement, were not made parties.

The bill detailed the facts and circumstances above stated, and various transactions from which it appeared that the security had been deficient for many years. The bill charged that the plaintiff Mrs. Fowler and her husband had made certain specified requests to the trustees to realize the security, and to enforce the payment of the mortgage debt of Messrs. Gye and Hughes, long previous to their bankruptcy, but that the trustees had not done so. It also charged that all the transactions relating to the trust funds, and the security, and the mortgaged premises, were managed and conducted by and under the direction of Mr. Reynal alone; and that after the bankruptcy of Messrs. Gye and Hughes, Mr. Reynal entered into possession of the mortgaged premises, and took upon himself the sole management thereof; and that he had ever since continued in the possession thereof; and that he had constantly represented that the whole was unprofitable and unproductive.

The bill prayed a declaration that by varying the investment of 8,450*l.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities, and by selling the same and lending the proceeds to Messrs. Bish, Gye & Hughes, the defendant Reynal was guilty of a breach of trust, and became personally liable to make good the amount of the Bank annuities; and that he might be charged with the same, or that he might be declared liable to make good the amount of the loss, which had or should have arisen to the trust estate by the depreciation in value of the mortgage security from the time when he ought to have realized, or to have concurred in realizing the same.

The defendants, by their answers, admitted the principal facts charged in the bill, and evidence was also gone into. But as regarded the infant plaintiffs being children of Mrs. Fowler, or what children she had, the only evidence against the defendant Reynal was a statement in his answers, that he could not state whether the co-plaintiffs were all the children then living of Mrs. Fowler. Mr. Reynal also stated in his answers, that the plaintiff Mrs. Fowler, by receiving the increased rate of interest on the mortgage, as tenant for life, or otherwise, had acquiesced in the investment, and the acts of the trustees; and that the defendant Reynal was under no liability, at all events as regarded her. The bill was subsequently amended by making the three other trustees parties to the suit.

The cause coming on for hearing, before Knight Bruce, V.C., his Honour held that there had been no waiver of the breach of trust, if any had been committed; that, independently of the memorandum, the loan originally would have been clearly a breach of trust, but that the memorandum was to be taken as part of the settlement, being entered into by Mrs. Fowler when unmarried and of age; that "the owners or lessees of Vauxhall Gardens" must be construed to mean the persons who were such at the time of executing the memorandum; and that the trustees were bound to have taken from the three a joint and several liability for the money; and an order was made for the stock to be brought into court by the four trustees, and an inquiry was directed as to the state of the family of Mrs. Fowler.

From this order the defendant Reynal appealed.

Mr. Bacon, Mr. Malins, and Mr. Humphreys, for the plaintiffs, in support of the decree.—In the first place, there was a clear breach of trust in advancing the trust money without security; and in the next place in taking an insufficient security—Stickney v. Sewell (1). The memorandum authorized a loan to the then proprietors of Vauxhall Gardens, and the money was advanced to the three, and a year afterwards a security was taken from Gye & Hughes alone, with a covenant by the two only for the repayment of the advance; and thereby the simple contract debt of Bish was extinguished. A married woman can only be bound by acquiescence, when such acquiescence is in accordance with the deed creating her rights—Bateman v. Davis (2), Cocker v. Quayle (3), Nail v. Punter (4), Hopkins v. Myall (5), Kellaway v. Johnson (6), Brice v. Stokes (7), Ryder v. Bickerton (8). An infant's title cannot be affected by acquiescence—Buckeridge v. Glasse (9).

Mr. Wigram and Mr. Drewry, for the defendant Reynal.—First, there is no evidence that the co-plaintiffs are the children of Mrs. Fowler and interested in the suit. All the plaintiffs must be interested in the subject-matter of the suit, and every plaintiff's title to sue must be proved—The King of Spain v. Machado (10), Makepeace v. Haythorne (11), Cowley v. Cowley (12), Anderson v. Wallis (13), Hudson v. Maddison (14), Padwick v. Platt (15); and the evidence in this case is insufficient to make a case for inquiries—Marten v. Whichelo (16), Miller v. Priddon (17), Jope v. Morshead (18), Simmons v. Simmons (19). The loan originally was authorized by the settlement and memorandum; and if that is so, the decree is wrong in directing the trust fund to be brought into court; but inquiries ought to have been directed as to whether the defendants might, by due diligence, have got in the money sooner, and what loss has ensued in consequence of their laches—Mucklow v. Fuller (20),

Mr. Osborne, Mr. Goldsmid and Mr. Freeling appeared for other parties.

Mr. Bacon replied.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The bill in this case is filed by the plaintiff, Frances Elizabeth Fowler, the wife of the Rev. Robert Hodgson Fowler, and by several other persons, alleged to be the children of Mr. and Mrs. Fowler, as parties interested under a marriage settlement, for the purpose of making the trustees accountable for the trust fund, upon the ground of certain acts, on the part of the trustees, which are alleged to have amounted to breaches of trust. The facts of the case, so far as they are material, are the following:—On the 15th of January 1825, a deed of settlement was executed, by which a sum of 8,450*l.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities, was settled on the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Fowler, upon trust, to apply the dividends to various purposes, and among them a certain portion to the separate use of Mrs. Fowler during her life, with a trust as to the principal for the benefit of the children of the marriage, in certain events, which have happened. The particular trusts are not, in other respects, material to the consideration of the present case. The parties to that settlement were, Thomas Bish, the father of Mrs. Fowler, who gave the 8,450*l.* stock, by way of marriage portion, Mrs. Fowler and her intended husband, and the defendants, George Thomas Robert Reynal, George Webb, William Fowler and Chappel Fowler, the trustees. The settlement contained a power to the trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, with the consent of the plaintiff and her intended husband, or the survivor of them, and after the decease of such survivor at their own discretion to sell the said trust fund, or any part thereof, and to invest or place out the monies to arise by such sale on any other public stock or funds or upon real security, and from time to time to call in the monies so placed out on security, or to sell the stock in which the same might be invested, or any part thereof, as they should think fit.

The four trustees named in the settlement accepted the trusts, but the defendant George Thomas Robert Reynal has throughout been the acting trustee. It was understood by the parties, previously to the execution of the settlement, that the funds about to be settled should be lent to the said Thomas Bish, the settlor, and Gye and Hughes, who were joint lessees of Vauxhall Gardens, and who were also joint equitable owners of the same property, under a purchase contract, dated the 6th of December 1824, and the loan was proposed to be secured by a mortgage upon the property, which was of copyhold tenure. With the view of carrying into effect the proposed arrangement, contemporaneously with the execution of the settlement, a memorandum was accordingly indorsed upon the deed of settlement, and signed by Mr. Bish, and Mr. and Mrs. Fowler, which was as follows: "We hereby request the trustees within named to advance, pursuant to the power within contained for that purpose, the sum of 8,450*l.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced Bank annuities, or any part thereof, to the owners or lessees of Vauxhall Gardens, in the county of Surrey, upon mortgage, either as first, second, or third mortgagees, for such time and at such rate of interest as the said trustees may, in their discretion, think fit. (Signed) T. Bish, R. H. Fowler, and F. E. Bish." The stock was transferred to the trustees, and the whole was shortly afterwards sold, and the produce of the sale amounting to about 8,000*l.*, was, on the 24th of February 1825, advanced to Bish, Gye and Hughes, but no written security was then taken for the repayment. On the 25th of March 1825, the purchase of Vauxhall Gardens was completed by a surrender to Bish, Gye and Hughes. On the 30th of July 1825, Thomas Bish retired from the partnership with Gye and Hughes, and his interest in the property in Vauxhall Gardens was surrendered to, and became vested in Gye and Hughes.

By an indenture, dated the 29th of November 1826, Gye and Hughes covenanted with the trustees of the settlement to surrender Vauxhall Gardens, by way of mortgage, subject to two charges of 7,000*l.* each created in favour of the defendant Reynal and others as trustees under the will of Thomas Bish the elder. Whether this mortgage was an adequate security, at the date of this mortgage deed, it is not necessary to determine. The defendant Reynal admits that it is now wholly inadequate. Consequently a loss has clearly arisen, and which there is reason to fear may prove a total one, and the present suit is instituted to compel the trustees to reinstate the stock. There are several acts of the trustees which are imputed to them as breaches of their trust, which in equity subject them to the liability with which it is the object of this suit to fix them. The Vice Chancellor held that the trustees were bound to replace such stock, and ordered the amount of the produce to be paid into court. The present appeal is against that decision.

As before stated, the defendants are charged with various breaches of trust. The first, and most important, is alleged to arise out of the following circumstances:—that the authority given to them to advance the trust fund, which, as before stated, was signed contemporaneously with the execution of the settlement, was to advance it to the owners or lessees of Vauxhall Gardens upon a first, second or third mortgage—while the trustees, in fact, advanced the money without having any mortgage or written security, until November 1826, the loan having been made in March 1825—and that although the advance in March was made to Bish, Gye & Hughes, who were then the lessees and equitable owners of Vauxhall Gardens, yet the mortgage security, which was in the form of a covenant to surrender and a covenant for repayment of the mortgage-money, was taken from Gye and Hughes only, without Bish. Mr. Bish has been long since dead, and his estate administered. Gye & Hughes have become bankrupts, with a very insufficient estate, and it is doubtful whether Vauxhall

Gardens will produce more than sufficient to pay off the first and second mortgages, and it is alleged that the defendants' conduct, as above stated, amounted to a breach of trust. First, because the money was originally lent without taking any security whatever. Secondly, that although the trustees were authorized to lend the money, upon the security of Vauxhall Gardens, yet that was subject to an implied condition that the security was adequate, which it was not. Thirdly, that the trustees improperly, not only forebore taking any security whatever until many months after the loan, but that when they did take the security, it was taken from Gye & Hughes only, and Mr. Bish was discharged by the trustees choosing to take covenants from two only of the joint debtors. Fourthly, that the trustees improperly forebore to recall and enforce payment of the mortgage-money for an unreasonable time; and by these means it is alleged that a great part, if not the whole, of the trust fund will be lost.

In answer to the first alleged breach, it is said that no loss has arisen from the circumstance of the mortgage not being procured until November, several months after the loan. The effect of this objection and the sufficiency of the answer to it may be subject to the same observations as will arise in respect to the second alleged breach; and with regard to that breach, it is contended that the memorandum indorsed on the deed expressly authorized the loan to be made to the owners or lessees of Vauxhall Gardens; and the security taken in November was, in fact, taken from the then owners of the property. Their conduct, it is therefore said, was sanctioned by the terms of the memorandum, the authority or direction expressly pointing to Vauxhall Gardens. In estimating the effect of this charge and the answer to it, it will be necessary to consider what will be the proper construction of the memorandum. It is contended, on the part of the plaintiffs, that the authority was to advance the money to the owners of the property at the date of the memorandum, and not to persons who might become the owners at some indefinite future time; that the owners at that time were persons whose credit and solvency were known; whereas, according to the defendants' construction, the trustees were authorized to make the advance to any persons who might fill the character of owners in future, without regard to their condition or responsibility; which, it is said, cannot be reasonably intended to have been the meaning of the parties.

It is argued that the memorandum operated as an imperative direction to the trustees, which they were bound to obey by advancing the money within a convenient time; and that they were not at liberty to postpone such advance at pleasure, one object of the advance being to obtain an increase of income, and if (the owners of the Gardens being ready to take the money on loan) the direction referred to a present advance, it necessarily pointed to the owners for the time being. The property, from its peculiar nature, must be considered as likely to fluctuate in value, according as the public taste and fashion might adopt the place as one of public resort and amusement. The loan was also authorized to be made on a first, second, or third mortgage. Both these circumstances strengthen the supposition that the known personal responsibility of the owners of the gardens might influence the discretion of those who directed the investment.

Upon these grounds, it is contended, that the conduct of the trustees was in no respect sanctioned by the terms of the settlement and memorandum, and that, by advancing in March, without any written security, and having advanced to the then three owners of the property, and afterwards by accepting a covenant from two only, they made an investment unauthorized by the trust reposed in them, and accepted a less and different security from that which upon the true construction of the memorandum they were directed to do.

As I understand the judgment of the Vice Chancellor, he was of opinion that the construction of the memorandum contended for on the part of the plaintiff was a correct construction, and that under such circumstances the trustees must be considered, in making the advance without security and in afterwards accepting the covenant of two only of the three joint debtors, as having misapplied the fund and subjected themselves to replace it when called upon by the Court. I am of opinion that the judgment and order made by his Honour, was the proper judgment to be given in the case, and must be affirmed.

It is necessary that I should observe upon a point which has been raised in the argument before me, but which I understand was not made in the court below. The plaintiffs in this suit, besides Mrs. Fowler, are alleged to be her children; but it has been said, that although the bill contains such an allegation, there is no admission on the part of the defendants of the identity of those plaintiffs, nor any evidence in support of it in the cause; and it was said that a bill ought to be dismissed, in which it shall appear at the hearing that persons having no interest in the subject-matter of the suit are joined with others who are properly made plaintiffs. The plaintiffs contended that such an objection, if valid, was too late at the hearing of the cause, and after the plaintiffs' case had been heard; but that, at all events, the pleadings raising no issue in regard to the identity of the alleged children, but such identity being assumed throughout, up to the rehearing, the Court would allow the objection to be repelled by an affidavit.

Several cases were referred to as authorities in support of the argument; but, in all the cases referred to, the alleged interest of the plaintiffs, to whom the objection applied, was either disproved by evidence or denied. In the present case, the answer contains no denial, nor uses any expressions importing a doubt upon the fact, that the plaintiffs, other than Mrs. Fowler, were her children. The answer rather proceeds upon the assumption that they in truth possessed the character ascribed to them by the bill.

Supposing the objection to have been taken at the proper time, and in proper form, its validity is very doubtful; but as it is in fact taken, I think it cannot be sustained; and it is so obvious from the course of the pleadings, and from the fact that it is urged for the first time upon the rehearing, that it is an entire afterthought, occurring probably for the first time after hearing the plaintiffs' case, that if I thought the objection, when taken, was open to the party, I should feel it my duty to receive an affidavit to repel it.

I have not come to the conclusion upon the merits which I have stated, without an anxious and laborious consideration of the case, and of the authorities which bear upon it, because I have felt that under the circumstances disclosed in the pleadings, the case bears very hardly upon the defendant Reynal, who has been influenced solely by kindly feelings and confidence to fail in the observance of his strict legal duty. But as he became a trustee for the benefit and security of the children of the marriage, and the loss of the trust fund to those children has been the consequence of his departure from his duty towards them, they are entitled to the remedy for that loss which the decree secures to them.

As regards Mrs. Fowler being a party to all the departure of duty committed by the defendant Reynal, he, being a professional man, must have been aware that her authority and sanction, being a married woman, would afford no excuse or justification of such conduct. This appeal must, therefore, be dismissed, with costs.

Nov. 14. } GOODE v. WEST.

Claim, Allegations in—Trustees Indemnity Acts (10 & 11 Vict. c. 96. and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 74.)—Jurisdiction.

A claim not stating all the facts of the case within the plaintiff's knowledge is liable to be dismissed, with costs, and if the plaintiff withholds those facts and takes the chance of relief from what may turn up from the affidavits, the Court will not adjudicate upon the claim.

When trustees have paid any monies into court under the Trustees Indemnity Acts, the remedy of a plaintiff as to the sum paid in can be prosecuted only under those statutes, and not under the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court by bill or claim.

This was a claim for the administration under the direction of the Court of a certain trust fund, amounting to the sum of 1,777*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, and of certain arrears of interest thereon, and was filed against the trustees of the fund by a cestui que trust entitled to one fourth part of it. The claim stated the title of the plaintiff under a settlement of the 20th of December 1844, a deed of appointment of the 6th of June 1845, and certain dealings with the settled property, whereby he became entitled in January 1850 to one fourth part of the above sum (which had been invested by the trustees on mortgage), and of the arrears of interest thereon from October 1849.

It appeared from the affidavits that the amount due to the plaintiff had been agreed upon by himself and the trustees in November 1850, and that the latter had offered to pay the amount upon having a release from the plaintiff, and the delivery to them of the deed of appointment, or an attested copy and a covenant to produce the original, executed at the expense of the plaintiff. The latter declined to deliver up the deed of appointment, or to pay the expense of the attested copy and covenant, and the trustees then paid the amount of his share (444*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* for principal, and 17*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* for interest) into court under the provisions of the Trustees Indemnity Acts (10 & 11 Vict. c. 96. and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 74.) less the sum of 25*l.*, retained by them for their costs. The claim contained no statement of this dealing with the plaintiff's share.

*The Solicitor General and Mr. Younge, for the plaintiff, submitted that he was entitled to have the whole fund administered under the direction of the Court; that he disputed the right of the trustees to deduct so large a sum as 25*l.* for costs, on the grounds that one of them, who was a solicitor, could only charge for costs out of pocket in matters in which he had acted professionally; and that the plaintiff could not raise the question of such deduction if he proceeded under the Trustees Indemnity Acts, because they did not contain any provision in that behalf.*

They cited—

In re Bloye's Trust, 1 Mac. & Gor. 488; s.c. 2 Hall & Twells, 140; 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 89.

Mr. John Baily and Mr. Simpson, for the trustees, argued, first, that the plaintiff ought to proceed under the Trustees Indemnity Acts, and that by those acts the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court by bill or claim in respect of the sum paid in by the trustees was superseded; and secondly, that the claim was substantially for the amount deducted for costs by the trustees, in respect of which the claim contained no statement, and ought therefore to be dismissed, on the authority of his Honour's decisions in Johns v. Mason (1), Penny v. Penny (2) and Eccles v. Cheyne (3).

The Solicitor General replied.

TURNER, V.C.—A claim recently came under my consideration, in which I expressed an opinion upon a point which is also involved in the case now before me (4). It was a claim for the redemption of a mortgage, and upon the hearing it came out upon the affidavits that there had been a release of the equity of redemption. The plaintiff in that case had filed the claim without noticing the release of the equity of redemption, and I on that occasion expressed an opinion which I still adhere to, viz., that parties resorting to the summary jurisdiction of the Court upon claims are bound to state all the facts of the case which are within their knowledge, and that they are not justified in bringing a case before the Court, not as it really stands, but as it would have stood in the view the parties may entertain of the relief to which they are entitled. If they put before the Court a case not fully stating the facts, the Court ought not to entertain the claim but dismiss it, whatever course it may pursue to preserve the rights of the parties on a claim if properly brought.

The claim before me is filed stating a settlement under which a sum of 1,777*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* was settled upon trust as to one-fourth for a certain person for life, and subject to the life interest for the appointee of the tenant for life, and as to the remaining three fourth parts of the fund, subject to distinct and separate trusts. Before this claim was filed, it was known to the plaintiff that the three-fourths had been severed from the one-fourth, and that the one-fourth had been paid into court under the Trustees Indemnity Acts. The claim takes no notice whatever of this application of the fund, but seeks to have the whole sum of 1,777*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* administered under the decree of the Court. Until set right by a higher authority, I must entertain a strong opinion that a claim of this kind should state to the Court the actual facts of the case; and that if the plaintiff withholds those facts and takes the chance of relief resulting from what may turn up from the affidavits, the claim ought not to be adjudicated upon. It is the duty of the plaintiff upon a claim to proceed secundum allegata et probata, and as the case suggested by the claim is not the case the Court is asked to adjudicate upon, I think, on that ground, the claim must be dismissed. The question is, whether it should be dismissed with or without costs; but however that may be, it will be dismissed without prejudice to any other proceeding the plaintiff may be advised to take.

With regard to what has been done by the trustees, no doubt the jurisdiction of the Court by bill is gone as to the fund paid by them into court under the above acts, which enact to the effect that trustees may pay into court any monies, and that such payment into court shall be a discharge of the trustees as to what they shall so pay in. If the acts had said all monies, and part only were paid in, it might be well contended that the original jurisdiction of the Court by bill remained. The distinction, however, is, that the acts say "any" monies, and that payment into court shall be a discharge as to those monies. I am of opinion that the remedy of the plaintiff as to the sum paid in can be prosecuted only under those statutes, and not under the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court by bill or claim. The effect of this is, that the case appearing upon the claim, if indeed it can be entertained at all, is reduced to a claim for 25*l.* retained in hand by the trustees for their costs.

For the reason already given I do not think I can entertain the claim, and the only question is, whether it shall be dismissed with or without costs as to the trustees. Trustees are undoubtedly entitled in all cases to apply under those statutes for protection; and I am of opinion, looking through the correspondence in evidence, that they have in the present case unanswerable grounds for coming to the Court for that protection. However, although so entitled, they are not entitled to settle their own charges against the estate. What I have to consider is, whether, if the trustees had paid over the whole trust fund, less the amount retained for costs, without prejudice to the right of the cestui que trust to dispute the amount so retained, a bill could be filed by the cestui que trust to recover the amount which the trustees had retained. Now, if it should appear on the result of a bill of that kind that the trustees are truly entitled to a certain amount of the costs retained by them, and there being no fraudulent conduct on their part, that they had retained an amount beyond that which the law will strictly allow them for their costs, I do not think that the fact of having retained an amount beyond what they are entitled to would be a ground for depriving them of their costs of that suit. That being so in the case of a suit by bill, the same reasoning will apply to the case of a suit by claim. I cannot, therefore, refuse the trustees their costs, although I give them with reluctance, seeing that by a little forbearance on their part they might have prevented the claim from being filed. I, therefore, dismiss the claim with costs, but without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to proceed as he may be advised in respect of the sum retained by the trustees.

TOFT v. STEPHENSON.

Lien for Unpaid Purchase-money—Statute of Limitations—Trustee and Cestui que Trust—Acknowledgment.

A testator devised his real estates to A. B.

NEW SERIES, XXI.—CHANC.

in fee, charged with the payment of his debts. A. B. in 1811 contracted with C. D. to sell part of the real estate, the purchase-money to be paid two months after. C. D. was immediately let into possession. The purchase-money was not paid. In January 1812, A. B. was declared a bankrupt. In October in the same year, C. D. contracted to sell part of the same real estate to E. F., who was let into possession, but his purchase-money was not paid. C. D. made his will in 1817, by which he devised his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to pay his debts, and then upon trust for his children, and died in 1827. The trustees refused to act, and the widow of C. D. and her children filed a bill for the appointment of trustees, and in that suit J. S. and W. R. were appointed new trustees. In 1834 the attorney for J. S. and W. R. gave notice to the assignees of A. B. (J. T. and J. C.) that the purchase-money for the property comprised in the contract of 1811, and interest, or rent in respect of the land, were ready to be paid, for the express purpose of completing the agreement. In 1844, the money not having been paid, the assignees filed a bill against J. S. and W. R., the trustees of the will of C. D., and against the parties beneficially interested thereunder, and against E. F. the sub-purchaser and others, praying a declaration that the plaintiff had a lien on the estate for the unpaid purchase-money.—Held, that the notice from the attorney of J. S. and W. R. was an acknowledgment in writing within the meaning of the 40th section of the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27: that a person by whom "the money is payable," means, in the case of a claim by equitable lien, the person entitled to the land on which the charge is sought to be fixed, and that this acknowledgment being by devisees in trust for payment of debts was good as against the cestui que trust under the same will.

There being no proof as against the cestui que trust that the attorney who wrote the notice was in fact the agent of the devisees in trust, the Court granted an inquiry.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, from a decision of the late Vice Chancellor Sir James Wigram which is reported in 7 Hare, 1. In the court below several questions were raised to which it is not necessary now to advert; they are referred to in the judgment. On that occasion the notice or letter of acknowledgment, produced and admitted in evidence on the appeal, was not tendered. The admission of that document as against the trustees on whose account it was written was resisted on the ground that it did not form part of the evidence on which the Court below had founded its judgment; but that objection was at once overruled, both their Lordships concurring in that determination. The suit was instituted by Joseph Toft and John Chapman, the assignees of the estate and effects of Thomas Marris, a bankrupt, against Joseph Stephenson and William Read, the trustees of the will of John Stephenson, and against the parties beneficially interested under that will under the following circumstances:—Joseph Marris, who died in 1808, by his will, dated a short time before, devised his real estates to Thomas Marris in fee charged with the payment of his debts. By an agreement in writing, dated the 4th of March 1811, Thomas Marris agreed to sell to John Stephenson lands in Owston, in the county of Lincoln, containing 151 acres and something more, parcel of the lands devised by the will of Joseph Marris, in consideration of a sum of 6,300*l.* to be paid on the 13th of May then next; and immediately on the execution of the agreement John Stephenson was let into possession, though no part of the purchase-money was paid. In January 1812, a commission of bankruptcy issued against Thomas Marris and his then partner Richard Nicholson, under which they were duly found and declared bankrupts, and the plaintiffs, Joseph Toft and John Chapman, were, at the institution of the suit, their assignees. In October 1812, John Stephenson agreed to sell to Cornelius Sandars 63 acres or more, part of the Owston estate, so purchased from Thomas Marris, and thereupon Cornelius Sandars was let into possession, and he and those who derived title under him ever since remained in possession. John Stephenson, by his will dated in 1817, devised all the lands so contracted to be purchased, together with all his personal estate, to two trustees in fee, in trust for payment of his debts and subject thereto upon certain trusts for the benefit of his children. John Stephenson died in July 1827, without having revoked or altered his will, and the two trustees named in the will having refused to accept the trusts thereof, the defendants, Joseph Stephenson and William Read, were duly appointed trustees in their place by virtue of a decree of this Court in a suit instituted for that purpose by the parties interested under the will. The bill was filed in 1844 by the assignees of Thomas Marris against Joseph Stephenson and William Read and the parties beneficially interested under the will of John Stephenson, and also against the representatives of Cornelius Sandars (the sub-purchaser) for the purpose of establishing a lien on the property comprised in the original contract of the 4th of March 1811, and for that purpose it prayed as follows:—“That it may be declared that the plaintiffs have a lien upon the said hereditaments and premises comprised in the said agreement of the 4th day of March 1811, for the said sum of 6,499*l.* 18*s.* (1), with interest thereon after the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum from the 13th day of May 1811, and the said defendants Elizabeth Stephenson, Joseph Stephenson and William Read, and Frances Sandars and William Brocklehurst Stonehouse and Elizabeth his wife (the representatives of Cornelius Sandars), or some or one of them, may be ordered to pay the same to the plaintiffs as this honourable Court shall think fit at an early day to be named for that purpose, and in case the said defendants shall not pay the same to the plaintiffs, then that the same may be raised by sale or mortgage of the said hereditaments and premises as to this honourable Court shall seem meet, and that in the mean time some proper person may be appointed as receiver,” and so on. The case was heard in the court below several days in the month of March 1848, and on the 20th of March the Vice Chancellor Wigram held, that the right of the vendor to recover the purchase-money as a lien or charge on the lands was barred by the 40th section of the Statute for the Limitation of Actions and Suits (3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27): that the lien was not saved by the 25th section of the same: and that the lien was not kept on foot by a suit for the administration of the devisee's estate, nor by suit by the residuary devisees and legatees of the will of the purchaser for the administration of his estate. The bill was retained for twelve months, and leave was given to the surviving plaintiff to proceed in ejectment for the recovery of the property, as he might be advised (2).

Mr. Lee, Mr. Glasse and Mr. Fooks, for the appellant, the plaintiffs, argued that the statute did not apply, and if it did the time at which the suit would be barred had not arrived; that the defendants, the trustees claiming under the will of John Stephenson the purchaser, were constructively trustees of the purchase-money, and they were such trustees for the plaintiffs, the assignees of Thomas Marris the devisee in trust under the will of Joseph Marris the deviser. Lord Hardwicke, in Green v. Smith (3), laid down "that the vendor of the estate is, from the time of his contract, considered as a trustee for the purchaser, and the vendee, as to the money, a trustee for the vendor." Lord Loughborough, in Blackburn v. Gregson (4), citing the words of Lord Camden, used by him in Chapman v. Tanner, there referred to, said, the vendor "has a natural equity," and added, "it struck me always that there was such a lien, and that it was so from the foundation of the court." And again, "if an estate is sold and no part of the money paid, the vendee is a trustee." The time had never arrived for payment, for the title had never been completed, and therefore the statute could not operate—Burrell v. the Earl of Egremont (5), Grant v. Ellis (6); and if so, relief might be had notwithstanding the statute. Mestaer v. Gillespie (7), which was first heard before Lord Eldon, and afterwards by him assisted by Sir William Grant, shewed that the mere formality required by an act of parliament would not stand in the way of this Court doing justice, and that the purchaser or those representing him could not by the neglect to do what should have been done long ago, vary the rights of other parties. Independently, however, of that point, the objection on which Sir James Wigram had mainly decided the case, namely, that the plaintiff's claim was barred by the 40th section of that statute, no longer existed, for the answers of the defendants Stephenson and Read having stated that a correspondence had passed between Mr. Cartwright, their solicitor, and Mr. Holgate, the solicitor of the plaintiff, an investigation took place and a search was made, the result of which was the production of the following letter, dated in 1834, and therefore within the time prescribed by the 40th section. That letter was as follows:—"To Messrs. Joseph Toft and John Chapman, assignees of the estate and effects of Thomas Marris, a bankrupt, and to Mr. Patteson Holgate, their attorney.—As attorney for and on behalf of William Read, of Epworth, in the county of Lincoln, draper, and Joseph Stephenson, of Everton, in the county of Nottingham, farmer, the persons appointed by the High Court of Chancery to carry into execution the trusts of the last will and testament of John Stephenson, late of Craiselound, in the parish of Haxey and said county of Lincoln, land surveyor, deceased, I do hereby give you notice that the amount of the purchase-money for all those several pieces or parcels of freehold

(2) The 40th section of the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. is as follows:—"And be it further enacted, that after the 31st of December 1833, no action or suit or other proceeding shall be brought, to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment, or lien, or otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land or rent, at law or in equity, or any legacy, but within twenty years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same, unless in the mean time some part of the principal money, or some interest thereon, shall have been paid, or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given in writing signed by the person by whom the same shall be payable, or his agent, to the person entitled thereto or his agent; and in such case no such action or suit or proceeding shall be brought but within twenty years after such payment or acknowledgment, or the last of such payments or acknowledgments if more than one, was given."

and copyhold land situate in the parish of Owston, in the said county of Lincoln, mentioned in a certain agreement in writing, bearing date the 4th of March 1811, and made between the said Thomas Marris of the one part, and the said John Stephenson of the other part, and all interest due in respect of the said purchase-money, or rent in respect of the said land, are ready to be paid, and that the amount of such purchase-money and interest or rent is lying at bankers' interest; and as attorney as aforesaid, I further give you notice, that the said William Read and Joseph Stephenson are willing to invest at your expense the amount of the said purchase-money and interest or rent in any security or securities to be approved of by them and you for the express purpose of completing the purchase under the said agreement; and as attorney as aforesaid, I further give you notice, that unless the said purchase be immediately completed, or the said investment be made, the said William Read and Joseph Stephenson will only allow bankers' interest on the amount of the purchase-money from the date hereof to the time of completion of the said purchase. Witness my hand this 13th day of March 1834." That was an acknowledgment within the 40th section of the statute.

Cator v. Croydon Canal Company, 4 You. & C. 405, 420.

Mr. Teed and Mr. Rogers, for the trustees, Stephenson and Read, objected to the reception of this paper as not having been used in the court below; but their Lordships, as already stated, overruled it, and the same was proved vidé voce; they however decided that counsel should be heard at the proper time, as to the weight to be attributed to it.

Mr. Kenyon Parker, Mr. Bacon, Mr. Willcock, Mr. Follett, Mr. Goodeve, Mr. Osborne, Mr. Faber, Mr. Smythe and Mr. Lean also appeared for the defendants.

On behalf of the trustees, as well as of the cestuis que trust, it was argued that the admitted document was not an acknowledgment within the meaning of the 40th section; for, in the first place, the legal personal representatives of Sandars as to part of the money, and the legal personal representatives of John Stephenson as to the remainder, were the only parties by whom the same was "payable;" and, secondly, Stephenson and Read, the trustees, were not such representatives; and, on behalf of the cestuis que trust, it was contended that, even if the general objection to the acknowledgment failed, still as to them, or at any rate as to such of them as had insisted on the bar of the statute, it could not be made available, for it was not referred to in the bill, and was not known to them at the hearing in the court below; and even if it had been, there was no proof as against them that Mr. Cartwright when he wrote the letter was the agent for the trustees; and, lastly, that if he were the agent for those trustees, still their acknowledgment could not bind the cestuis que trust. For the same parties, it was also argued, that the possession was clearly adverse, and that the 15th section of the act applied, the application of the 25th section relating to trustee and cestuis que trust being out of the question.—Christophers v. Sparke (8).

Mr. Lee, in reply, argued that the contract clearly constituted a legal debt, a simple contract debt, which effected a charge on the land, which charge was not defeated by the statute. It was, in effect, an equitable mortgage or equivalent to it. It was a debt provided for by the debtor by a charge made by him. In reply, the cases after mentioned were cited—

Howell v. Price, Prec. Ch. 423.

Bulwer v. Astley, 1 Phill. 429; s. c. 13 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 329.

Longuet v. Scawen, 1 Ves. sen. 402.

Nov. 25.—LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH now delivered the judgment of the Court; and after recapitulating the facts of the case, proceeded as follows:—There could be no doubt as to the right of the plaintiffs to the relief which they ask, if they had proceeded within a reasonable time after the date of the contract. The question in the cause is, whether by not proceeding more promptly they have forfeited that right. The defendants Stephenson and Read, the trustees, by their answer, say they submit to the Court whether the right of the plaintiffs to the relief sought by the bill is not barred by laches and by lapse of time, and whether the same is not barred by the Statute for the Limitation of Actions and Suits. Of the persons entitled beneficially under the will of John Stephenson, some do and some do not insist on the Statute of Limitations. The parties claiming under Mr. Sandars do not insist on the statute, but say that they are ready to pay to Stephenson's representatives the money due to them in respect of the subsale to Mr. Sandars, on having a good title made to them. Upon the hearing of the cause before the Vice Chancellor Wigram, he held that the answers sufficiently set up and insisted on the Statute of Limitations and that the 40th section of the statute, 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. expressly applied to the case, and presented a complete bar to the relief sought by the bill, unless the plaintiff could by ejectment establish a legal title to possession of the lands in question. The 40th section is as follows:—[His Lordship here read the section as before set out, to the effect that money charged upon land and legacies were to be deemed satisfied at the end of twenty years, if there shall be no interest paid, or acknowledgment in writing in the mean time]. The Vice Chancellor, by his decree, ordered to the following effect:—"That the bill be retained for twelve months, with liberty for the surviving plaintiff, in the mean time to proceed at law touching the matter in question as he shall be advised." (That was with reference to the point, that if there was a legal title to the land then the judgment of the Court could not apply.) "But in case the plaintiff shall not proceed at law, and proceed to trial within the time aforesaid, the plaintiff's bills are from thenceforth to stand dismissed out of this court, with costs to be taxed by the Master," and so forth. In the argument of the case before the Vice Chancellor, it was contended that, even admitting the 40th section to apply to the present case, still there were a variety of circumstances that made the statute inapplicable. His Honour decreed against those arguments, and we do not feel ourselves called upon to consider that part of the case, because assuming the view taken by His Honour to have been perfectly correct, as to which we express no opinion whatever, yet, upon the hearing before us there was evidence not before the court below, which puts the case arising on the statute wholly out of the question.

That evidence is as follows: the defendants Stephenson and Read, the trustees, by their answer, state that a correspondence passed between Mr. Cartwright, their solicitor, and Mr. Holgate, the solicitor of the plaintiffs, in reference to some of the matters in question. At the hearing before us, one of the letters constituting that correspondence was proved and read in evidence, being a letter from Mr. Cartwright as solicitor of Read and Stephenson, to Mr. Holgate as solicitor of the plaintiffs. The letter was dated the 13th of March 1834, and, I must state, was not in evidence before the Vice Chancellor Wigram, and was as follows.—[His Lordship here read the letter before set out.]—Now, this letter appears to us to come precisely within the very terms of the 40th section, and to be a document taking the case out of the operation of the statute. It is an acknowledgment in writing of the right to the money in question, signed by the agent of the persons by whom it was payable, and given to the agent of the person entitled thereto; and is within the express words of the clause. It was indeed attempted to be contended before us, though but faintly, that Read and Stephenson were not the persons by whom the money was payable, for that no one was liable to pay the money but the legal personal representatives of Mr. Sandars the purchaser. Read and Stephenson, it was said, though entitled to the land upon which the plaintiffs sought to enforce a lien, were not personally liable to pay anything; but this argument evidently proceeds on an erroneous interpretation of the statute. The person designated in the 40th section as "the person by whom the money is payable," must evidently mean in the case of a claim by equitable lien, the person entitled to the land on which the charge is sought to be fixed; the money is payable by him in the only sense in which it must of necessity be payable by some one, and unless he pays it he will lose his land. It is obviously in that sense that the statute speaks of the money as payable.

It was further contended that this acknowledgment by Read and Stephenson ought not to affect the cestuis que trusi; but this again is a mistake. The acknowledgment of the executor in an ordinary case will keep a debt alive against all parties beneficially interested, and the same principle prevails in the case of devises of real estate in trust for the payment of debts, as was decided by Sir Lancelot Shadwell, in the case of Lord St. John v. Boughton (9). We are aware that Read and Stephenson were not the trustees named in John Stephenson's will, but that appears to us to be immaterial. They were appointed trustees by a decree of this Court in the place of the original trustees, and have ever since been in possession in that character. This letter of Mr. Cartwright's displaces altogether the bar of the statute so far as respects Read and Stephenson, the trustees. But though conclusive as against them, yet the other defendants who have insisted on the statute are not in the present state of the record bound by it; for as against them there is no legitimate proof that Mr. Cartwright, when he wrote the letter, was the agent of the trustees, and those other defendants have a right to insist on this proof being properly made; and even as against Read and Stephenson themselves, the document, though as we stated at the hearing clearly receivable in evidence, is not specifically referred to in the bill. It is, therefore, not unreasonable that an opportunity should be given to them, as well as to the other defendants, of offering any further proof touching the genuineness and nature of the paper. The only course open to us for the present, is to direct an inquiry on this point: that is, an inquiry "whether any acknowledgment in writing of the right to the money payable by virtue of the contract of the 4th of March 1811, was ever and when given by Read and Stephenson, or their agent, to the plaintiffs, or their agent." There can be little doubt as to what will be the result of such an inquiry, and assuming it to be established that Mr.

Cartwright did write the letter of the 13th of March 1834, as agent and by the authority of Read and Stephenson, then the bar of the statute will be removed, and the plaintiff will be clearly entitled to relief. No further inquiry can in such a case be of any advantage; but with a view to the possibility of a report as to the document unfavourable to the plaintiff, we are willing, if any parties desire it, to direct a further inquiry in conformity with what was suggested at the bar as giving rise to a possible equity even against the statute, namely "by whom the estate comprised in the contract of 1811 and the rents and profits thereof have been held, received, and applied since the date thereof, and under what circumstances, and whether any and what payment or payments has or have been ever and when made, and by and to whom, for or in respect of the purchase-money in the said contract mentioned or the interest thereon, and whether the title of the vendor has been ever, and when and under what circumstances, accepted." But any such inquiry must be made at the risk of costs to be paid by the parties desiring it, and we must not be understood as giving any opinion as to its importance. There must be a general liberty to the Master to state special circumstances, and of course further directions and costs will be reserved.

No counsel asking the additional inquiries, the order made was to direct the inquiries originally mentioned in the judgment, whether there was any acknowledgment made by Read and Stephenson, or their agent, to the plaintiffs, or their agent.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The original decree in other respects fails by reason of the evidence now adduced, which was not adduced before. We give no opinion what we should have done without that evidence. We, instead of the decree as it stands, direct that inquiry, with liberty to state circumstances specially, no counsel asking for the whole or any part of the additional inquiries which we have stated our readiness to grant if desired. It must be distinctly remembered that this letter was not before the Court below, and that the judgment of Sir James Wigram did not

KINDERSLEY, V.C. { Ex parte DAVIES, in re
Nov. 6, 10. { THE WILTS, SOMER-SET AND WEYMOUTH
RAILWAY COMPANY.

Will—Construction—Estate Tail—Executory Devise.

A testator gave the residue of his property, both real and personal, to his son Matthew, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, with a proviso that in case his son Matthew should die without leaving any lawful issue of his body, such part of his residuary estate as might be in the nature of freehold should, at his death, be divided into two equal parts, one half part whereof he gave to his son Charles and the other half to his daughter Frances:—Held, that the testator's son Matthew took an estate in fee in the freeholds, with an executory devise over to take effect in the event of his dying without issue living at the time of his death.

In this case it appeared that the Wilts, Somerset and Weymouth Railway Company having required, for the purposes of their railway, certain pieces or parcels of land devised by the will of Matthew Davies, amounting to two acres and two roods, and being desirous of purchasing the same,—in pursuance of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, it was agreed by the petitioner, Matthew Davies, the son of the testator, and the solicitor of the company, that the purchase-money to be paid for the same should be determined by the valuation of two surveyors, and that such purchase-money should be paid into the Bank for the benefit of the several parties interested according to the provisions of the said act; and that, thereupon, the petitioner should execute a conveyance of the said pieces of land to the company in pursuance of the powers of the said act; that accordingly, a valuation was made, and the purchase-money to be paid for the said land was determined at the sum of 525*l.*, which amount was shortly afterwards paid into the Bank by the company and a conveyance of the land was executed by the petitioner.

This petition was now presented by Matthew Davies, the son, praying that the said sum of 525*l.* might be paid out to him: but a question was raised under the will of Matthew Davies the father, as to whether the petitioner was entitled to an estate tail in the property so taken by the railway company or to an estate in fee, subject to an executory devise over in the event of his dying without leaving issue living at his death.

It appeared by the will of Matthew Davies, dated the 23rd of October 1832, that the testator gave the residue of his property in the following terms:—"And as to the remainder of my residuary estate, both real and personal, not hereinbefore disposed of, I give, devise, and bequeath the same (subject to the proviso hereinafter contained) unto my said son Matthew, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns; provided also, and it is my will that in case he, my said son Matthew, shall die without leaving any lawful issue of his body, that such part of my said residuary estate so given to him as before mentioned, as may be in the nature of freehold situate in Warminster aforesaid, and Westbury in the said county, shall, at his death, be divided into two equal parts or shares: one equal half part or share of such freehold property I give, devise, and bequeath unto my said son Charles, his heirs and assigns, and the other half part or share thereof I give, devise, and bequeath unto my said daughter Frances, her heirs and assigns; he, my said son Matthew, having it in his power to give sufficient to the children of my said daughter Anne, out of the personal estate which he has and will have at the death of his mother."

Mr. Malins and Mr. Berkeley appeared in support of the petition, and contended that the estate limited to Matthew Davies the son under the will was an estate tail. The following cases were cited:—

Doe d. Cock v. Cooper, 1 East, 229.

Dunk v. Fenner, 2 R. & M. 557.

Mr. Selwyn, contra, submitted that the petitioner took an estate in fee, with an executory devise over, to take effect in the event of his dying without issue living at his death, and cited—

Nichols v. Hooper, 1 P. Wms. 198.

Baker v. Tucker, 3 House of Lords Cases, 106.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—This petition depends upon the construction of the will of Matthew Davies, and the question is, whether the devise of the testator, who was his son, takes an estate in fee with an executory devise, to take effect in the event of his dying without issue living at the time of his death, or whether he takes an estate tail with a remainder limited upon it. By the will, the testator, after giving certain specific gifts, not material to the present question, devises in this way. He devises all the rest, residue, and remainder of his money, securities for money, goods, chattels and effects, and of all his estates, both real and personal, to his wife and his two sons Matthew and

Charles, and his daughter Frances, on the following trusts: To permit and suffer his wife to take the rents, &c. during her life, subject to the proviso after mentioned; then at her death he gave the sum of 2,500*l.*, part of his residuary estate, to his son Charles on certain conditions as to executing the trusts of the will, and then he gave another sum of 4,000*l.* to his trustees and executors upon certain trusts for the benefit of his daughter Frances; and another sum of 3,000*l.* among the children of his deceased daughter Anne, and then follows the devise upon which the question immediately turns, "and as to the remainder of my residuary estate both real and personal not hereinbefore disposed of, I give, devise, and bequeath the same (subject to the proviso hereinafter contained) unto my son Matthew Davies, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns,"—so that it is a devise of all the residue: a gift of the realty and personalty to Matthew Davies. "Provided also, and it is my will that in case he, my said son Matthew Davies, shall die without leaving any lawful issue of his body, that such part of my said residuary estate so given to him as before mentioned as may be in the nature of freehold, situate in Warminster and Westbury, shall at his death be divided into two equal parts or shares; one equal half part or share of such freehold I give, devise, and bequeath unto my said son Charles Davies, his heirs and assigns, and the other half part or share thereof I give, devise and bequeath unto my said daughter Frances, her heirs and assigns;" then he adds this clause, which was, after the arguments had taken place, and when I was prepared to give my judgment, called to my attention. Although I still continue of the same opinion as I then was, it is still of service as I shall hereafter shew. "He, my said son Matthew, having it in his power to give sufficient to the children of his said sister Anne out of the personal estate which he has and will have at the death of his mother." The question is, whether Matthew in respect of the freehold part only of the general residue devised to him, takes an estate in fee with an executory devise to take effect only in the event of his leaving issue living at his death, or an estate tail?

The general principles applicable to the construction of a will with respect to a question of this sort is this, as I understand the cases that were cited upon it: that you are to look at the whole will, to see whether you are satisfied upon the general effect of the will that the period to which the testator is pointing, when he speaks of the dying without any lawful issue of his body, was meant by him to be the precise period of the death of the devisee, or whether upon the context of the will, his intention was that it should take effect after an indefinite failure of issue. Now, in the case before me there is no question but by the first devise, Matthew Davies would be tenant in fee of the freehold as well as absolute owner of the personal property. If he has an estate tail, it is by these words: "lawful issue of his body," and no doubt according to the law before the Will Act, as far as relates to real estate in distinction of personalty, these words, "In case he shall die without leaving any lawful issue of his body," made him tenant in tail, and the word "leaving" did not fix the time to his death; but that was not the case with personalty. I am now, however, to interpret the law as it stood before the Will Act, and without reference to that at all.

With respect to the cases cited I will refer to two or three principal ones to see how they help us in the matter. Walter v. Drew was a case in Comyns, in which a testator devised "in case his eldest son should die and leave no issue of his body," then after his decease he gave the lands to the youngest son and his heirs. It is to be observed that there was no direct devise to the eldest son at all, and he would take no estate unless the Court gave it him by implication. The Court considered that he did take an estate by implication, until he should die and leave no issue of his body—in other words, an estate tail, and the other words used were not considered sufficient to shew that the time of his decease was the time pointed out by the testator. We know it is clear that a contingent remainder or executory devise, if it can take effect by way of remainder at all might do so by way of executory devise, and the Court came to the conclusion that there was an estate tail in remainder to the youngest son and his heirs,—not that I think that case at all governs the present. There was another case of Broadhurst v. Morris, and that arose upon a case that was sent from a court of equity for the opinion of a court of law, in a suit for specific performance, and the question was whether the vendor had such an estate as to make a good title to a purchaser. The limitation there was this: a devise to "William Broadhurst and to his children lawfully begotten for ever." Stopping there for a moment, it was decided, and I think rightly, to be an estate tail; the same thing as if he had devised to William Broadhurst, and the heirs of his body; then came this, "but in default of such issue at his decease to Alexander Bridgok;" now that sentence might be read two ways by altering the comma: thus, "but in default of such issue at his decease, to Alexander Bridgok," or "in default of such issue, at his decease to Alexander Bridgok." No opinion was given what estate the devisee over took; the only question was, what estate did the first devisee William Broadhurst take? And, on looking at the arguments of counsel, the case having been very ably argued by Mr. Cowling and Mr. Preston on either side, it did not appear to turn on whether it was an executory devise or not, but whether William Broadhurst took an estate for life only or an estate tail? The Court thought that it was an estate tail, and it appears to me to be extremely probable, as no reasons are given at all for the decision, which in opinions from a court of law is often the case, that coming to the conclusion as they rightly did, that it was an estate tail in William Broadhurst, the question would be this: whether the limitation over to Alexander Bridgok was a limitation to take effect by way of executory devise in defeazance of the estate tail at his death, or whether it was to take effect by way of contingent remainder, contingent upon the event of the estate tail determining in a particular mode by the dying without issue living at his death; the only difference would then be, that that would be a contingent remainder; no reasons being given I can only surmise; if there had been any comment upon it, very likely it would have been of the nature I have mentioned; but that authority does not appear to me to govern this case. The only other case that was referred to, and which in my opinion is the most material to the present one, and upon which I think it necessary to make an observation, is that of Doe v. Frost. There the limitation was to "William Frost and his heirs for ever," that was a clear devise in fee; then there was this limitation over, "if William Frost should have no children, child, or issue, the said estate is on the decease of the said William Frost to become the property of the heir-at-law, subject to such legacies as he, William Frost, may leave by will." The words there were "on the decease," and here "at the decease," and I confess I do not see any distinction between the two. The decision in that case was that William Frost took an estate in fee, with an executory devise in the event of his dying without leaving children at his decease. The words "subject to such legacies," &c. were said to be the reason for the decision, but when I look at the judgment of all the learned Judges who decided it, Chief Justice Abbott, Justices Bayley, Holroyd and Best, I see that as regards Bayley and Holroyd, each of them thought it was an estate in fee with an executory devise, independently of the clause relating to the legacies. Mr. Justice Bayley says, the clause as to the legacies corroborates the rest of the gift. Holroyd does not refer to the clause, but puts it entirely upon the words "on the decease;" it satisfied his mind that the testator intended to give a fee, but the fee so far limited that if the devisee died without issue living at his death, then there was an executory devise over. Chief Justice Abbott expressed the same opinion, and Justice Best merely said, that he concurred with the other Judges.

If from the will in Doe v. Frost you expunge the clause as to "legacies," I confess I do not see any distinction between that case and this; and I must conclude that the Judges would have decided as they did in that case, in this, had it come before them, and I confess I feel strongly satisfied that the testator was referring to the period of the death of the devisee, as the period at which he thought of failure of issue, and that then there should be a devise over. There is a different clause here as to the subject of the devise, if the devisee gave something to other parties. The testator had three children living at his death, and the children of a deceased daughter "Anne," and no other member of his family was referred to. Now, what is he doing? He has first given the whole real and personal estate to his wife for her life, and the whole residue after her death to other parties, and certain sums are to be appropriated upon certain trusts for the benefit of his issue, and he devises all the rest and residue to his son Matthew, and 3,000*l.* is given to one and 4,000*l.* to another for the benefit of his other children, and all the rest to the eldest son, and it is given to him absolutely, in terms, and he does not put any limit to the absolute gift as to the estates at Warminster and Westbury in the former part of the will: "If he should die without leaving lawful issue," then a valuable estate is to go to his son Charles and his daughter Frances, and not giving any share to the children of Anne. Then, he adds this: "He, my said son Matthew, having it in his power if he thinks proper out of the personal estate, which he will have on the death of his mother;" he does not say by will, nor does he refer to its being out of the estate which he is devising over, but when he had put in the clause, gave an additional power because he had given the whole of the personalty to him: but inasmuch as he gave half to Charles and half to Frances, and not any to the children of his daughter Anne, it is the same as if he said, I do not include the children of my daughter Anne, because Matthew has it in his power out of the personal estate to make such provision as he thinks fit for the children of Anne. That I think was in his mind. It might also have been in his mind that Matthew might die without issue; if he died leaving issue, then of course you could not expect him to give; having the means, of course points to "by will," though he has not said so with respect to the children of Anne.

I do not decide this case on the last clause. The matter which influenced my mind in coming to the conclusion was on the whole will, and particularly that part to which the testator points by reason of the failure of issue of Matthew on the precise period of the death of Matthew. The order, therefore, cannot be made in the terms of the prayer of the petition, as my opinion is, that Matthew Davies takes an estate in fee subject to an executory devise over in case he shall die without issue living at the time of his death.

LORDS JUSTICES } THE ATTORNEY GENERAL
 1851. } v. THE CORPORATION OF
 NOV. 3, 4. } NORWICH.

Municipal Corporation Act—Borough Fund.

The 92nd section of the statute 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. enabled the surplus of the borough fund to be applied for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough. By an act subsequently passed, the corporation of the city of N. were authorized to levy certain tonnage dues to be applied in a specified manner, and after they were satisfied, the remainder to be applied to certain purposes, some of which were the same as those to which the surplus of the borough fund was made applicable; and distinct accounts were directed to be kept of the tonnage dues and borough fund. The treasurer mixed the two funds at his bankers. The corporation proposed to obtain an act of parliament for improving a river flowing through the city, and applied money from the funds at the bankers in paying certain expenses. An information was filed by the Attorney General, at the relation of rate-payers, praying an injunction to restrain this application to parliament at the expense of the borough fund, and the same was granted: and on appeal from that decision, the appeal motion was refused, with costs.

The borough fund is a trust fund, and is so constituted by the Municipal Corporations Act.

This was an information filed by the Attorney General, at the relation of three rate-payers of the city of Norwich, against the mayor, aldermen and citizens of that city, and against the treasurer and the town clerk, setting forth (among other things) that the corporation was subject to the regulations of the statute 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76. (the Municipal Corporations Act), and that it had then and since and at the time of filing the information (1848) had real and personal estate, and funds, dues and revenues; and according to the said act the rents and profits, interest, dividends and annual proceeds of such real and personal estate, funds, dues and revenues, and such other income as in the said statute mentioned, formed and constituted the fund called "the borough fund," applicable only to the purposes of the payment of such expenses as in the said statute mentioned in connexion with the said city; that the borough fund had never been sufficient for such purposes without the aid of borough rates, which, from time to time, had been levied for such purposes; that the navigable river Wensum, Wenon or Yare passed or flowed through or near the city, and thence to Great Yarmouth, and that a branch thereof, called the Trowse Hithe, was within a mile from the city; that over part of this river and the branch the corporation had jurisdiction; that the corporation were promoting a bill in parliament for enabling them more effectually to improve and maintain the navigation of the said river and branch, to levy tolls, &c., to alter, amend and enlarge the powers of certain acts, and among them to repeal so much of the statute of the second year of the reign of Queen Victoria as related to tonnage dues thereby authorized to be levied, and to provide a new mode of application thereof and other purposes; that the corporation had expended 2,662*l.* out of the borough fund in paying the expenses of surveys, &c. for the purpose of procuring the intended act. The information then prayed (among other things) an injunction to restrain the defendants from promoting the said bill, or any other bill for the purposes aforesaid, by means or at the expense of the borough fund.

The injunction was granted on notice of motion, and after a discussion (1). The answer was put in on the 20th of April 1848, and it stated that the projected improvement would tend greatly to the benefit of the inhabitants of Norwich by facilitating the access of shipping to that city, and increasing the trade thereof; and that the defendants were authorized by a local act of parliament (2 & 3 Vict. c. lxii.) to levy certain tonnage dues, and to apply them for the purposes specified in that act, and after the performance of those purposes, for widening the streets of Norwich and removing projecting buildings and other obstructions therein, and for removing projecting buildings and banks on the sides of the river, and other obstructions to the navigation thereof; and that there was a surplus arising from the tonnage dues which was applicable to the improvement of the city, and the navigation of the river, but there was not, nor had there been, since the passing of the Municipal Corporations Reform Act, any surplus of the borough fund; and that the treasurer of the corporation was in the habit of receiving the tonnage dues as well as the other revenues of the corporation which formed the borough fund, and of paying them to his bankers in such manner that the same were all blended in one account; and that he had paid 2,662*l.* by cheques on his bankers to engineers and surveyors whom the corporation had employed to make surveys and plans of the river, and of the intended improvements in order to enable them to procure the passing of the proposed bill through parliament; and the answer submitted that as the improvements intended to be made under the powers of the proposed act would tend greatly to benefit the city and the inhabitants thereof, and as the local act contemplated the improvement of the navigation of the river as one of the objects to which the surplus of the tonnage dues should be applied, and as there was a surplus arising from those dues, the obtaining of an act for the improvement of the navigation was an object to which the borough fund, and more particularly the fund arising from the dues, might be properly applied, it being intended that the amount so applied should be repaid out of the first monies to be raised under the powers of the proposed act.

The 92nd section of the Municipal Corporations Reform Act enacts that the borough fund shall be applied towards payment of the salaries of the mayor, recorder, town clerk and treasurer of the corporation, the expenses of preparing burgess lists, ward lists, and notices, and of prosecuting, maintaining and punishing offenders, &c., and in case it shall be more than sufficient for those purposes the surplus shall be applied under the direction of the council for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough.

The local act relating to the tonnage dues, after mentioning the purposes to which those dues are to be applied in the first instance, concludes thus—"Lastly, after the performance of all the purposes hereinbefore mentioned, for or towards making any improvements in the said city of Norwich, and particularly for widening the streets and the roads and ways in and leading to the said city and removing projecting buildings and other obstructions therein, and for removing projecting buildings and banks on the sides of the river running through the said city and other obstructions to the navigation thereof."

On the 4th of May 1848, the case came before Sir Lancelot Shadwell, when, in support of the injunction, the following cases were cited:—

The Attorney General v. the Mayor, &c. of Liverpool, 1 Myl. & Cr. 171; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 51.

The Attorney General v. the Corporation of Lichfield, 13 Sim. 547.

On behalf of the corporation, their treasurer and town clerk, the following cases were relied on:—

The Attorney General v. the Mayor, &c. of Norwich, 2 Myl. & Cr. 408.

Ware v. the Grand Junction Waterworks Company, 2 Russ. & M. 470; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 169.

Bright v. North, 2 Phill. 216; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 255.

Parker v. the River Dunn Navigation Company, 1 De G. & Sm. 192.

The Attorney General v. the Manchester and Leeds Railway Company, 1 Rail. Cas. 436.

On that occasion, the Vice Chancellor of England, after referring to the 92nd section of the Municipal Corporation Act and to the clause set forth of the local act, said, he considered that the same observation might be made with respect to both those enactments, namely, that they had reference to the state of the law as it existed when they were made, and that they did not authorize the corporation to apply the funds in obtaining powers which were not then vested in them, and could not be vested in them except by an act of parliament specially passed for the purpose.

His Honour then, upon the question of costs, declared that if this Court had sanctioned the application to parliament, it would have allowed the corporation the expenses of the application; but if trustees, whether they are a public body or private individuals, thought proper to apply to parliament without the sanction of the Court to enable them to carry into effect a project which, however beneficial it might be, might eventually fail, the Court would not allow them to retain their expenses out of the trust fund; and his Honour continued the injunction.

Mr. Stuart, Mr. Lee and Mr. Brooksbank now appeared in support of an appeal from this order, and contended that as, by the local act, the corporation had authority to levy tonnage dues, and to apply them to certain specified purposes, and afterwards "in removing projecting banks on the sides of the river and other obstructions to the navigation thereof;" and there being a surplus of the tonnage dues, which surplus formed part of the borough fund, the proposed works, if sanctioned by parliament, would be both legitimately within the intention of the local act and most beneficial to the inhabitants of Norwich. The ground of the Vice Chancellor of England's judgment seemed to be erroneous; for treating the tonnage dues on the same footing as part of the borough fund, his Honour held that as there was no surplus of the borough fund so constituted, there was no power in the corporation to apply the money as they proposed to do. The tonnage dues themselves, except as to any surplus of them, were, however, no part of the borough fund. Besides the cases referred to in the Court below, the case of The Attorney General v. Andrews (2) was observed on and distinguished from the present. The effect of obtaining the act would be, to create a surplus of the borough fund, the absence of a surplus of which at this time the Vice Chancellor of England made the ground of refusing permission to go to parliament. It was not a wise or prudent exercise of the discretion of the Court of Chancery to restrain the subject from going to parliament for its sanction to the performance of a great public work, and if the relators were to succeed in such a case, as well might any two out of ten thousand rate-payers have prevented the application for the local act already in existence.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Walker and Mr. Rogers were for the relators, and in answer to a question from Lord Justice Knight Bruce, submitted to a declaration that, without prejudice to any question of costs and without prejudice to any question whatever, the order and injunction were not to be considered or treated as restraining or relating to the expenditure or application of the borough fund or any part thereof to or for any other purpose than for seeking or applying for or endeavouring to obtain the act of parliament for the purpose of enabling or authorising the widening, &c. of the river Wensum, and, &c. It was also declared that the injunction did not relate to the expenditure or application in any manner of the tonnage dues.

Mr. F. S. Williams appeared for the treasurer and the town clerk, but did not support the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The declaration being agreed to, that Sir Lancelot Shadwell's order only prevents the application of the borough fund to the purpose of soliciting their act of parliament; and it being admitted that that order does not relate to the tonnage dues or their expenditure, the case is reduced to one of costs, and to whether the corporation are justified in applying any part of the borough fund in soliciting such an act as this? What would have been our decision if there had been a surplus of that fund we do not say. There is no surplus of the borough fund. We are of opinion that, in the absence of such a surplus, the proposed application of the borough fund to the purpose of soliciting the act of parliament, the subject-matter of dispute, would be substantially in contravention of the Municipal Corporations Act, which act created that fund and constituted it a trust fund. We think that the application of any part of it to the proposed purposes would be a misapplication of that trust fund; and, constituted as the fund is, it is the province of the Court to restrain such application, and on account of the particular nature of the trust and of the property, to do so at the instance of the Attorney General. With such a declaration, therefore, as I have mentioned, the motion, we think, ought to be refused; but whether with or without costs we shall presently determine.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—As I entirely concur in the view of the nature and constitution of this fund which has been expressed by my learned Brother, and as upon these points the general result of my judgment would be the same as his, it would be a waste of time were I to repeat his observations in any language of my own. I may, however, say, that cases, as well before the Court of Queen's Bench as before Lord Cottenham, shew that, under certain circumstances, there are purposes, not enumerated in the 92nd section of the Municipal Corporations Act, to which the corporation are entitled to apply the borough fund; but then those are purposes which, although not enumerated or expressed in the section, are plainly and of necessity within the scope and spirit of the act.

The several counsel for the corporation then addressed the Court, contending that, although the motion was refused, still, as the order below had been, in effect, varied by the declaration now made by the Court, a variation which could not have been made without an appeal, the motion ought, therefore, to be refused, without costs. The Vice Chancellor of England had treated the borough fund and the tonnage dues on the same footing, in which this Court did not agree. Then, the corporation might not be able to pay the costs, and a distringas might issue, and the effect of the decree of the Court would be, that the funds of the corporation could not be applied in payment of the costs, leaving the members of the corporation liable.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Expressing my own individual opinion only, I think that although I consider the words of the Vice Chancellor of England's judgment have rendered the declaration now made necessary to prevent all future disputes on this particular matter,—to shew that the question of the borough fund was that only in contest,—yet the motion ought to be refused, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I quite agree with the decision as to the costs; but I go still farther, for I cannot say I see any reason for the declaration which has been made. It has been argued that the surplus of the tonnage dues forms ipso facto part of the borough fund; but that is a fallacy, for every shilling of the tonnage dues is made applicable to certain specified purposes, not as part of the borough fund, but as tonnage dues applicable to purposes some of which are identical with the destination of the borough fund. On the whole, I agree that the appeal, having entirely failed, must be dismissed, with costs.

In re KNOWLES.

Payment of Money out of Court—Administration, whether Diocesan or Prerogative—Trustees Relief Act.

Trustees and executors of personal estate situate wholly in the diocese of C. sold and realized the same. The will was proved in the diocesan court. One of the trustees and executors died in the lifetime of the other, and on the death of the other trustee and executor letters of administration to his estate were taken out in the same court by A, B. and C. One of the parties entitled to a share, under the will of the testator, died intestate, possessed of no other property, and letters of administration to his estate were taken out by his next-of-kin in the same court. A, B. and C. paid the share into court, under the statute 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96. The person entitled to the share petitioned for its payment out of court, and the same was directed, notwithstanding that prerogative letters of administration were not taken out.

This was a petition presented in the matter of the statute 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96, the "Trustees Relief Act," and in the matter of the trusts of the will of Thomas Knowles, deceased. The facts were these:—Thomas Knowles, of Walton-on-the-Hill, Lancashire, by his will, dated the 16th of February 1810, after directing the payment of all his debts, funeral expenses, and charges of probate, gave, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate and effects to William Harvey and James Harvey, both of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, upon trust to sell the same, and out of the produce to pay certain legacies, and to divide and distribute the residue into four equal parts, and put and place them out at interest, and pay the dividends, interest and annual produce of one share to his son Michael Knowles for his life, and after his death upon trust to divide the capital among all his children, who being sons or a son should attain the age of twenty-one years, or die under that age leaving issue at their or his decease, or born in due time afterwards; or who being daughters or a daughter should attain that age, or marry, in equal shares; and if but one such child, in trust for that one child; and if no child, then the share was to be divided among his, the testator's two other sons and daughter in the same manner. The trusts of the other three-fourths were in favour of the other two sons and the daughter, with similar cross-trusts over for the benefit of the testator's sons and daughters in each case where there should be no child who took a vested interest.

William Harvey and James Harvey were appointed executors. The testator died in April 1811, and his will was proved by both executors on the 30th of May following in the Consistory Court of the Bishop of Chester. The trustees and executors realized the assets, paid all the debts and legacies and testamentary expenses. All the four children of the testator, three sons and one daughter, had issue living at their deaths, and all but Michael received their respective shares of the residue. William Harvey died in 1838. James Harvey died in 1841, and letters of administration of his goods, chattels and credits were on the 3rd of June in that year granted by the Consistory Court of the Bishop of Chester to Robert Ellison Harvey, Thomas Mather and Thomas Harvey.

Michael Knowles had seven children, three of whom died in his lifetime under the age of twenty-one years and without having been married, the other four attained the age of twenty-one years. Michael Knowles died in September 1834. Thomas Knowles, one of the four surviving children of Michael, left England during his father's lifetime, and never afterwards returned to this country, and he died in America without issue, and letters of administration in August 1848 of his goods, chattels, credits and effects were granted by the Consistory Court of the Bishop of Chester to William Knowles, his brother, and one of his next-of-kin.

The share of Thomas Knowles, the son of Michael, one of the four children of the testator, amounted, after some deductions, to 378*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.*; and that sum Robert Ellison Harvey, Thomas Mather, and Thomas Harvey, the administrators of James Harvey, the surviving executor of the testator's will, paid into court on the 10th of March 1851, under the provisions of the Trustees Relief Act, and the same was placed to an account particularly designated.

William Knowles, another brother and a sister of Thomas Knowles, were his only next-of-kin. William Knowles and the other next-of-kin, all of whom resided in the county of Lancaster, presented their petition entitled in the matter of the act and in the matter of the trusts of the will of Thomas Knowles, praying that the sum of 378*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.* then standing in the Bank books to the credit of the Accountant General, in the matter of the act and of the trusts of the will, might be paid to the petitioner, William Knowles, as the administrator and sole legal personal representative of the intestate Thomas Knowles.

At the hearing of the petition, on the 26th of July 1851, Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce directed the production of certain evidence, and on the 1st of August made the order as prayed. The Registrar, however (Mr. Colville, jun.), required the production of prerogative letters of administration to the estate of Thomas Knowles the intestate. This point was mentioned to His Honour, who agreed at that time in the view of the Registrar, and observed that if the practice of requiring prerogative letters of administration before paying money out of court, was to be altered, it ought to be done by the Lord Chancellor, and suggested that the question might be mentioned to His Lordship, and his opinion taken, or be put into his paper on some stated day for argument. During the long vacation of 1851 the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce was appointed one of the Lords Justices of Appeal. On the 5th of November 1851 the matter was mentioned to the Lord Chancellor, when his Lordship said, that as Lord Justice Knight Bruce was now in a different jurisdiction to that which he exercised when he made the order, and as the Court of Appeal exercised the same jurisdiction as his Lordship, he, the Lord Chancellor, considered that the question had better be considered and adjudicated on by the Lords Justices. Accordingly, on the 22nd of November, the matter was brought before the notice of the Court of Appeal, when the petition was directed to be in the paper of the 24th of the same month, and Mr. Colville, jun. to attend the Court.

Mr. E. F. Smith now appeared in support of the petition, and submitted that a prerogative administration was wholly needless. It was to be observed that the administration was taken out before the money was paid in, and, in fact, was taken out with a view to satisfy the trustees that the title was complete; but they on some suggestion of others or ideas of their own, considered that the title was not completed by that act, and paid the money into court.

Mr. Colville, jun. (the Registrar), in answer to a question from the Court, stated, that it was the universal practice of the office to require the production of prerogative probates or prerogative letters of administration, before money once in court could be paid out. The money paid in was always considered as bona notabilia out of the diocese in which the testator or intestate died.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—All things being as they are stated on these affidavits to be, this fund being from first to last, and wholly and entirely Cestrian, if ever there was a case in which the rule requiring prerogative probates and prerogative letters of administration might be relaxed, that is the present case. I think that rule, strict as it is, and perhaps properly strict, may be dispensed with, and that this fund may be paid out on these diocesan letters of administration. In agreeing to make such an order, it must be most distinctly understood that it is made on the particular state of circumstances of this case, and that the general rule as to prerogative probates and letters of administration being requisite remains in all respects untouched.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I agree in that course. The diocesan letters of administration were, in fact, taken out before the money was paid into court; and I confess that, in agreeing with my learned Brother in the order now to be made, I should have been willing to make it even if the letters of administration had been taken out after, instead of before, the payment of the money into court. It is, however, unnecessary now to decide that; and the order, therefore, will be that the fund be paid to the petitioner on the diocesan letters of administration.

Payment of Money out of Court—Motion.

The Court will not make an order for payment of money out of court, except upon petition, however small the sum may be.

In this case a small sum, amounting to about 90l., had been carried over to the separate account of an infant. The infant had attained the age of twenty-one; and

Mr. Rasch now applied, upon motion, to have the money paid out to the infant. It was submitted that the Court could make such an order, on the authority of Heathcote v. Edwards (1). It was true that a similar motion had been refused in another case of Garratt v. Niblock (2), but the sum in this case was very small, and the right of the infant was perfectly clear, and if the Court could make the order on motion, instead of petition, it would be a material saving in so small a fund. The expense of obtaining the money out of court upon motion would be about 7*l.*, and on petition as much as 13*l.*

LORD CRANWORTH, V.C. said it was contrary to the practice of the Court to allow money to be paid out on motion. The case of Heathcote v. Edwards only shewed what the practice was in the time of Lord Eldon, but it was very clear that a contrary rule had prevailed in this court for a great many years. He could not therefore, make an order for payment of money out of court, except upon petition.

Baron and Feme—Petition—Payment of Money to Husband.

A sum of money had been paid into court to the account of a female infant, a ward of court. The infant married, and a petition was presented by her and her husband for payment of the money out of court to the husband, upon the authority of two cases cited. The Court disapproved of the principle upon which the previous cases had been decided; but allowed the petition on affidavits that it would be beneficial for the husband to receive the money.

In this case a sum of money had been paid into court under the Legacy Duty Act to the account of an infant, and guardians had been appointed upon petition, to whom the income had been regularly paid for the maintenance of the infant. The infant married one year before she came of age, with the consent of her guardians, but without any application having been made to the Court for its sanction to the marriage.

A petition was now presented by the husband and wife for payment of the fund out of court to the husband, with the consent of the wife.

LORD CRANWORTH, V.C. said as the young lady was a ward of court, the consent of the Court ought to have been obtained to her marriage, and under these circumstances he thought the money ought to be settled upon the wife.

Mr. Younge, in support of the petition, cited Leeds v. Barnardiston (1) and Bennett v. Biddles (2), in which similar orders had been made, and also read affidavits by the husband and the guardians, shewing that it was desirable that the money should be paid to the husband. The amount of the fund was 227*l.*

LORD CRANWORTH, V.C. said he could not approve of the principle upon which the two cases of Leeds v. Barnardiston and Bennett v. Biddles had been decided. He could only suppose that they went upon some facts not stated in the reports. He thought, however, upon looking at the affidavits filed in this case it would be beneficial that the husband should receive the fund.

The order was made accordingly.

Outlawry—Plea—Court of Bankruptcy.

Upon a plea of outlawry, it was held that an order of the Court of Bankruptcy directing the plaintiff to prepare and file his accounts by a certain day, and the certificate and proclamation of the Court, that he had failed to surrender himself on that day, did not amount to a formal judgment of outlawry such as would support the plea.—Plea overruled.

(1) Jac. 504.
(2) 5 Beav. 143.

(1) 4 Sim. 538.
(2) 10 Jurist, 534.

This was a bill filed by the plaintiff against his solicitor for an injunction to restrain the defendant from continuing an action at law, commenced against him for an alleged balance of an account. The defendant put in a plea of outlawry to the bill, alleging that on the 29th of June 1848, the plaintiff was outlawed by the Court of Bankruptcy in London, as by the said outlawry, on proceedings in the said Court of Bankruptcy filed as of record or the office copy thereof, would appear, and which said outlawry still remained in full force and unreversed; and the defendant, therefore, submitted that he was not bound to answer the plaintiff's bill.

The evidence as to the outlawry was, that by an order made on the 13th of June 1848, by the Commissioner of Bankrupts under the act of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111. entitled 'An act for facilitating the winding-up the affairs of joint-stock companies unable to meet their pecuniary engagements,' the plaintiff and another gentleman, who were two of the directors of a company called "The Merchant Traders' Ship Loan and Insurance Association," were ordered to prepare the balance sheets and accounts of such association, and to file the same in the said court, and deliver a copy thereof to the official assignee ten days at least before the 29th of June, or such other day as the Court should appoint for the last examination of the fiat against the above association. It further appeared that, on the 29th of June, a proclamation was issued by the Court of Bankruptcy, declaring that the plaintiff and the other gentleman included in the above order of the 13th of June did not surrender themselves on the day appointed for that purpose. An order for winding up the affairs of the above company had since been made by the Court of Chancery, and the proceedings under the fiat in bankruptcy had, in pursuance of the provisions of the Winding-up Act of 1848, been transferred from the Court of Bankruptcy to the Master in Chancery who was charged with the winding-up order.

Mr. W. Cooper appeared in support of the plea, and contended that the order of the Court of Bankruptcy directing the plaintiff to file his balance sheets and accounts and the proclamation, in consequence of his failing to surrender upon the day appointed by the Court, were equivalent to a judgment of outlawry at law. The Court of Bankruptcy had power under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. and the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act of 1849, to declare a bankrupt who did not surrender a felon, and he was liable to be punished as such.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Glasse appeared for the bill, and contended that the above proceedings of the Court of Bankruptcy did not constitute an outlawry such as would support the plea.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The grounds upon which this plea has been put in are, that the plaintiff has been outlawed by the Court of Bankruptcy for not surrendering, as appears by the order and proclamation of the Court of Bankruptcy. The question is, whether the matters stated in the plea do constitute an outlawry or state of facts from which an outlawry can be inferred. I cannot understand that there can be any outlawry which is not a formal judgment of outlawry; and it does not appear to me that what is here stated amounts to a judgment of outlawry. There is nothing more than an order for the plaintiff to pass his accounts on a certain day, and then there is a certificate that the plaintiff did not surrender himself in pursuance of such order, and to that certificate the words "proclaimed, H. Stacey," are added. I cannot think that this is equivalent to the formal proclamations consequent upon a judgment of outlawry; the plea must, therefore, be overruled, with costs.

Solicitor and Client—Privileged Communications—Depositions, Suppression of.

The rule which protects from disclosure confidential communications between solicitor and client is not founded on the ground of confidence between them, but on that of necessity for the existence of the rule to enable the client properly to defend, or prosecute his rights and interests. Therefore, the rule is inapplicable in cases of testamentary dispositions, and as between parties claiming under the testator; and where a question is raised, whether the executors are or are not trustees for the next-of-kin, the evidence of the solicitor who prepared the will as to what passed between himself and the testator, or his agent on the subject of the will, is admissible, on behalf of the next-of-kin, and will not be suppressed on the application of the executors on the ground of privilege; but all communications between the executors and the same solicitor, acting as their solicitor, on the subject of the will of the testator and after his death, are privileged.

Evidence otherwise admissible will not be rejected on the ground that it may disclose an illegal purpose.

Semble—The existence of an illegal purpose will, as in a case of fraud, prevent the privilege attaching; because it is as little the part or duty of a solicitor to advise his client how to evade the law, as it is to contrive a fraud.

This was a motion by the defendants, William Jackson and Thomas Acton Jackson, the executors of J. Russell the testator in the cause, to suppress the depositions of the solicitor of the executors, and formerly of the testator. The bill was filed by one of the testator's next-of-kin, and stated that the testator, by his will, of the 8th of July 1850, gave the residue of his property to the defendants, the executors, as a testimony of his regard and esteem for them, and as a compensation for the trouble they would have in the execution of his will. The bill alleged that the residue was given to the executors upon a secret trust to found a socialist school at Birmingham, and upon an understanding that the executors would carry such trust into execution. The solicitor of the testator, who prepared the will, and continued to act as the solicitor of the executors, was examined as a witness under a commission issued in the cause, and in answer to the 13th interrogatory under that commission deposed that the testator had given the residue of his property to the executors upon a secret trust; but the witness demurred to that part of the interrogatory which inquired into the nature of the trust, and also to other parts of the interrogatories relating to the instructions from which he had prepared the will, and to communications on the subject between himself and the testator, and subsequently between himself and the executors. The ground of the demurrer was, that the witness had acted in the matter as solicitor for the testator and the executors. The demurrer was set down for argument, and overruled in the absence of counsel to support it. A second commission was then issued, under which the witness was again examined, and he then stated to the effect that the general purport and effect of the instructions received by him from the testator for the preparation of his will were declaratory of his intention to leave his property for the purpose of establishing a school at Birmingham for the education of children in the doctrines of socialism, so far as the witness recollected, according to the principles of Robert Owen; that the instructions contained a scheme upon which the testator intended the proposed school to be conducted; that on receiving the instructions (which as appeared from his examination under the first commission were brought to him by the defendant W. Jackson) the witness intimated a doubt whether the law would permit such disposition of the testator's property as contemplated by the scheme; that, on subsequently seeing the testator in the presence of the defendants, W. Jackson and T. A. Jackson, the witness referred to the written instructions of the testator, and repeated his doubts of the legality of the intended disposition of the testator's property; that the testator then stated that having confidence in the two defendants, he would leave his property to them absolutely, being satisfied that they would carry out his intention; that the defendant, W. Jackson, assented to this, and the defendant, T. A. Jackson, did not dissent from it; that in preparing the draft the witness inserted powers of sale in the will which would not have been necessary, but for the purpose agreed upon between the testator and the two defendants, the executors; that at the time the witness delivered the original instructions and the will to the defendant, W. Jackson, the witness told the latter that he would require the instructions to enable him (the defendant) to carry out the testator's intentions.

The present motion was for the suppression of the above depositions.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. White, for the executors, in support of the motion.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Speed, for the plaintiff; and—

The Solicitor General, Mr. Walker and Mr. W. M. James, for the several next-of-kin of the testator, opposed the motion.

On behalf of the trustees, and in support of the motion, it was argued, first, that the above communications between the testator and his solicitor were privileged and ought not to be disclosed; that this privilege never ceased—Wilson v. Rastall (1); that it extended to every purpose—Cromack v. Heathcote (2), Doe d. Shellard v. Harris (3), Herring v. Cloberry (4); and survived after the death of the client for the benefit of those claiming under him—Earl Cholmondeley v. Lord Clinton (5), Chant v. Brown (6). Secondly, that the trustees were not bound to disclose the trusts—Wheatley v. Williams (7), Turquand v. Knight (8); and that if there had been any fraud or attempt to evade the law, the facts must be proved aliunde.

Upon the general question of privileged communications between client and solicitor the following authorities were cited—that the doctrine of privilege did not apply, because it was not part of a solicitor's duty to contrive an evasion of the law, or a fraud—Follett v. Jefferyes (9); that the depositions related to matters of fact, and not to confidential communications between solicitor and client for the purpose of obtaining legal advice—Walker v. Wildman (10), Bramwell v. Lucas (11) and Desborough v. Rawlins (12); and that if the privilege existed, it would prevail for the benefit of all claiming under or adversely to the testator, not merely in favour of the executors and trustees to the exclusion of the next-of-kin, and therefore in suits for establishing wills or rectifying settlements, the solicitor might be examined by the heir-at-law, or parties claiming under the settlement—The Duke of Bedford v. the Marquis of Abercorn (13).

Dec. 2.—TURNER, V.C.—This was a motion on behalf of the trustees of the will of J. Russell, the testator in the cause, to suppress the depositions of the witness, under the following circumstances.—[His Honour detailed the facts to the effect above stated.]—The question is, whether the statements thus made by the witness, or any of them, ought to be received in evidence against the defendants, the Jacksons. The question must be considered separately with respect to the communications had in the lifetime of the testator, and to those had after his decease; but I do not think, with reference to the communications had in the testator's lifetime, that any distinction can properly be made between those had with the testator, and those had with the defendant, W. Jackson; for I think the latter, in the communications had with the solicitor, must be considered to have acted as the agent of the testator, and to have been the channel of communication between him and the witness, and that the protection which the law throws around communications of this nature extends to those had through the medium of an agent, as far as it would extend to those had with a principal.

As to the communications had with the solicitor in the lifetime of the testator, I think the evidence ought to be admitted. It is evident that the rule which protects from disclosure confidential communications between solicitor and client, does not rest simply upon the confidence reposed by the client in the solicitor, for such rule does not exist in other cases, in which at least an equal confidence is reposed—in those cases, for instance, of a medical adviser and his patient, and a clergyman and a prisoner. The rule seems to rest, not on confidence, but upon the necessity there is for carrying out the rule. Lord Brougham, in Greenough v. Gaskell (supra), has given the true foundation of the rule. His Lordship, in his judgment in that case is reported to have said, "The foundation of this rule is not difficult to discover. It is not (as has sometimes been said) on account of any particular importance which the law attributes to the business of legal professors, or any particular disposition to afford them protection, though certainly it may not be very easy to discover why a like privilege has been refused to others, and especially to medical advisers. But it is out of regard to the interests of justice, which cannot be upholden, and to the administration of justice, which cannot go on without the aid of men skilled in jurisprudence, in the practice of the courts, and in those matters affecting rights and obligations which form the subject of all judicial proceedings. If the privilege did not exist at all, every one would be thrown upon his own legal resources; deprived of all professional assistance, a man would not venture to consult any skilful person, or would only dare to tell his counsellor half his case" (14).

This, then, being the foundation of the rule, the Court, when called upon to apply it, must have regard to the foundation on which it rests, and must not extend it to cases which do not fall within the mischief it was designed to meet. When the rights and interests of clients, or those claiming under them, come into collision with the rights and interests of third parties, there is not any difficulty in applying the rule. If it were not applied in those cases, the client could never safely state to his solicitor the true position of his case, but would be driven to speculate as to what it would be his interest to conceal or divulge. The prosecution or defence of his rights would not be adapted to the circumstances as they really existed, and courts of justice would be embarrassed by imperfect information arising from imperfect communications. But when we pass from cases of conflict between the rights of a client and parties claiming under him, and those of third persons, to cases of testamentary disposition, do the same reasons apply? The disclosure in such cases can affect no right or interest of the client, and the apprehension of it can present no impediment to a full statement of his case to his solicitor (unless he were contemplating an illegal disposition, a case to which I shall presently refer), and the disclosures when made would expose the Court to no greater difficulty than it has in all cases where the views and intentions of persons, or the objects for which the disposition is made, are unknown. In the case, therefore, of a testamentary disposition, the very foundation of the rule seems to be wanting, and, in the absence of any illegal purpose being entertained by the testator, there does not appear to be any ground for applying the rule to such a case.

Can it be said, then, that the communication is to be protected, because it may lead to the disclosure of an illegal purpose? I think not, and that evidence otherwise admissible cannot be rejected on such a ground. On the contrary, I am very much disposed to think that the existence of an illegal purpose would prevent any privilege attaching to the communications. When a solicitor is a party to a fraud, there is no privilege attaching to communications between the client and him upon the subject of the fraud, because to contrive fraud is no part of a solicitor's duty; and I think it can as little be said that it is part of a solicitor's duty to advise his client as to the means of evading the law.

Another view of the case is, that the protection which the rule gives is the protection of the client ; and it cannot be said to be for the protection of the client that evidence should be rejected, the effect of which would be to prove a trust created by him, and to destroy a claim to take beneficially by the parties accepting the trust.

One argument for the defendants (the executors) was, that the privilege did not terminate with the death of the client, that it belonged to a purchaser from the client, and that this must equally apply to the case of a volunteer under him ; in fact, that the privilege followed the legal interest, and vested in the executors claiming under the will, and not in the next-of-kin claiming adversely to it. That the privilege does not in all cases terminate with the death of the party I entertain no doubt, and that it belongs to parties claiming under the client as aforesaid and those claiming adversely to him I entertain as little doubt, but it does not therefore follow that it belongs to the executors of the party as against his next-of-kin in such a case as the present. In the one case where the question is, whether the property belongs to the client or his estate, indeed, the rule may well apply for the protection of the client's interest ; but in the other case where the question is, to which of two parties claiming under the client the property in question belongs, it seems to me arbitrary to hold that the privilege belongs to one rather than to the other. The privilege being one which follows the legal interest, it must be subject to the same incidents to which the legal interest is subject, and if the legal interest is subject to a trust the privilege must be subject to it also ; and in that view of the case, to permit the defendants (the executors) to avail themselves of the privilege would be to permit them by the use of the privilege to exclude the question, whether they are trustees of it or not.

These are the views I entertain of the question without reference to the authorities. Those which were cited on the part of the defendants (the executors) do not appear to me to affect the question. General remarks found in the books must, of course, be understood with reference to the cases in which they are found, and none of the cases at all approach the present, and were all cases arising between the clients or parties claiming under them and adverse claimants. There are, however, cases which I think approach more nearly to the present case, and in which the Court received and acted upon such evidence as that objected to without hesitation. Thus, in The Duke of Bedford v. the Marquis of Abercorn (supra), the Court received and relied upon the evidence of the solicitor as to the intention of the parties to marriage articles, and directed a settlement differing from the articles, mainly on the faith of such evidence ; and in Nourse v. Finch (15), where the question was, whether the executors were trustees for the next-of-kin of undisposed-of residue, the evidence of the solicitor who had prepared the will as to what had passed between him and the testator was received and minutely commented upon in the judgment. Those cases, and particularly the latter, have a strong bearing on the present ; and on the authority of them, or of the principal of them, my opinion is, that the evidence of communications which took place in the testator's lifetime must be received.

With respect to the evidence as to the communication which passed between the solicitor and William Jackson upon the occasion when the instructions were delivered to him after the death of the testator, I think the case stands upon a different footing. That was clearly a communication between solicitor and client in the course of professional business, and all principle and all authority are against the reception of the evidence in respect of it. The depositions to this extent ought to be suppressed.

I grant the motion so far as it relates to the communications between the witness and the defendant W. Jackson after the death of the testator ; but refuse it so far as it respects the communications had in the lifetime of the testator. The question is one of great importance. I give no costs.

Order accordingly. Costs of the motion to be costs in the cause.

Power—Appointment—Wills Act—Residuary Legatee.

*A testatrix, having a general power of appointment, upon her death, over a sum of 2,000*l., after referring to the power, directed and appointed that the said sum should, after her death, be paid to her four daughters and her two sons, John and Joseph; and the testatrix appointed her son Joseph her executor, and constituted him her residuary legatee. Before the death of the testatrix, her son John died, whereby his sixth share lapsed:—Held, that such sixth share passed by the residuary clause in the will to Joseph, under the provisions of the Wills Act.

This petition stated that Thomas Spooner, deceased, by his will, dated the 4th of March 1833, amongst other bequests, directed his executors to invest 2,000*l.* in Bank 3*l.* per cent. annuities, and to pay the dividends thereof to Mrs. Ann Duncan, a widow, for her life, and after her decease to transfer the annuities unto such person or persons or in such shares or proportions as Ann Duncan should, by her will or any codicil thereto, to be respectively signed in the presence of at least one witness, direct and appoint; and the testator appointed four persons executors of his will, and he declared that at present he left the residue of his personal estate undisposed of. The testator died in March 1839, without having revoked or altered his will, leaving Mary Spooner, his widow, Jane Turner, Hannah Middleton and Ann Duncan his next-of-kin. After the death of the testator, his executors invested the sum of 2,000*l.*, part of his personal estate, in the purchase of 2,209*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.* 3*l.* per cent. consols, in their names, and paid the dividends thereof to Ann Duncan during her life.

Ann Duncan, by her will, dated the 13th of August 1841, after referring to the power in that behalf given to her by the will of Thomas Spooner deceased, directed and appointed that the sum of 2,000*l.*, in which she had a life interest under such will, and the said Bank annuities on which the same might be invested, should, after her decease, be paid and transferred to her daughters, the petitioner, Isabella Mountz, widow, Mary Ann Duncan, Rachel Duncan and Dora Duncan, spinster, and her son, John Duncan, and her son, the petitioner, the Rev. Joseph Duncan, share and share alike, reserving, nevertheless, out of the said bequests, the sum of 300*l.* to make provision to produce an annuity of 30*l.*, to be paid by her executors unto her son James Duncan. And as to any farther or other sum of money or other property to which she then was or might thereafter become entitled under the will of the said Thomas Spooner, the said testatrix left the same to be divided amongst such of her children as might be then living, share and share alike. And the said testatrix appointed her said son, the Rev. Joseph Duncan, and John Woolsey, Esq. executors of her said will, and she constituted her son, the Rev. Joseph Duncan, her residuary legatee.

Ann Duncan died in August 1850, and at that time her estate was entitled to a proportionate part of the dividends which became due at the half-yearly day of payment next after her death. The executors of Thomas Spooner paid to the petitioner, Joseph Duncan, as the executor of Ann Duncan, the sum of 9*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.* as the proportionate part of such dividends from the last day of payment up to the day of her decease, and the sum of 23*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.*, the balance of the said dividends, amounting to 32*l.* 3*s.* 7*d.*, remained in their hands. John Duncan, one of the sons of the testatrix Ann Duncan, died without issue in her lifetime, and thereby the sixth share of the said sum of 2,209*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.* lapsed, and fell into the residue bequeathed to the petitioner Joseph Duncan; that the executors of Thomas Spooner then paid into court, under the act for the relief of trustees, the said sums of 23*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* and 2,209*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.* The petitioners, who were the surviving children of Ann Duncan, prayed that the residue of the said two sums, so paid into court, after setting apart the sum of 300*l.* for the purchase of the annuity given by Ann Duncan to her son James Duncan, and after payment of costs, should be paid over to the petitioners in equal sixth parts, and that the sixth part given to John Duncan, deceased, might be paid to Joseph Duncan, the residuary legatee.

The question raised upon this petition was, whether the sixth part of the fund given by Ann Duncan to her son John Duncan, and which lapsed by his death during her lifetime, was payable to the persons entitled to the residuary personal estate of the testator, Mr. Spooner, as having been unappointed by Ann Duncan, or whether it went to Joseph Duncan, who was the residuary legatee under the will of Ann Duncan.

Mr. Lewin appeared for the petitioners, and contended that the share appointed to John Duncan, by the will passed under the residuary bequest contained in Mrs. Duncan's will, to her son Joseph Duncan; that this was the result of the 27th section of the Wills Act, 1 Vict. c. 26, which provided that any bequest of personal estate of a testator, or of personal property described in a general manner, should include personal estate which the testator might have power to appoint in any manner which he might think proper, unless a contrary intention should appear by the will; that such sixth part, which Mrs. Duncan had ineffectually appointed to her son John, being personal estate, which she had power to appoint in any manner she might think proper, passed under her residuary bequest; that no contrary intention appeared by the will of the testatrix, who must be taken to have known that by a general rule applicable to wills, any bequest which failed by the death of the legatee in her lifetime, would pass under the residuary gift, if any such were contained in the will. The following cases were cited in support of this argument:—

Easum v. Appleford, 10 Sim. 274; s.c.

5 Myl. & Cr. 56; 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 81.

Carter v. Taggart, 16 Sim. 423.

Jenour v. Jenour, 10 Ves. 562.

Mr. Chandless appeared for the widow and next-of-kin of Mr. Spooner, and contended that they were entitled to the sixth part of the fund which lapsed by the death of John Duncan, such share having been unappointed by his will.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The first question is with reference to the residuary bequest, and upon every authority I apprehend that the words "constituting my son, the Rev. Joseph Duncan, my residuary legatee" must mean the same thing as if the testatrix had said, "I give all the rest and residue of my personal estate to my son, the Rev. Joseph Duncan," and if a testator gives all the rest and residue of his personal estate to A. B, he intends to give and does give everything he has not disposed of by his will. If by any reason a gift is rendered inoperative, the effect of the residuary bequest is to give everything not disposed of. It is no argument to say he has only given to the residuary legatee after the particular bequests. That is the case irrespective of any power. Now, the effect of the Wills Act is to make a general bequest operate the same as if the testator, referring to the power, had purported to make the bequest under it. Therefore, even if the testatrix had not referred to the power at all, or made any specific gift of the 2,000*l.*, the residuary bequest of her own personal estate would have operated as a gift of the 2,000*l.*, over which she had a general power of appointment. If it would do so, it appears to me on the universal construction of a residuary bequest, it must carry every part of the particular fund over which she has power of appointment, and which, although she has attempted to appoint, she has not effectually appointed by reason of the death of the party. I do not see any expression of intention that the residuary bequest was not meant to carry all; and I think that Ann Duncan having made an appointment of the 2,000*l.* in favour of several persons as tenants in common, one of whom has died in the lifetime of the testatrix, and having appointed, by will, the Rev. Joseph Duncan, her son, her residuary legatee, he is entitled to that share which would have gone to John Duncan, but which has lapsed by his death. As to costs, I think the particular fund ought to bear the costs properly incurred in relation to the execution of the trusts.

Dec. 9, 10, 11, 23. } SOLTAU v. DE HELD.

Nuisance, Public and Private — Bell-ringing—Demurrer—Injunction.

The plaintiff, in the year 1817, became the lessee of a dwelling-house, which formerly constituted part of a large mansion, the other part of which was also occupied as a dwelling-house till the year 1848, when it was purchased on behalf of a Roman Catholic community, who converted the lower rooms into a chapel, and erected a bell at the top of the house, which bell was rung at various times every day, commencing at five o'clock in the morning. Subsequently a chapel capable of containing 400 persons was built in front of the house so adjoining to the plaintiff's house, and a belfry was erected containing six large-sized bells. These bells were also rung very frequently. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant, who was priest of this Catholic chapel, on the ground that the bells were a nuisance, and recovered 40s. damages. The bells were afterwards rung only on Sundays for five periods of five minutes each. The plaintiff filed his bill for an injunction to restrain the ringing:—Held, upon demurrer for want of equity, that a bill might be filed by an individual alleging a private nuisance, although the nuisance might at the same time be public.

Held, also, that the plaintiff, having brought his action for damages in respect of the ringing of bells, though to a greater extent than was subsequently practised, need not commence a fresh action for every modified form of bell-ringing: but that if the plaintiff had not obtained a verdict at law, that was no ground of demurrer to a bill for an injunction. The demurrer was therefore overruled.

The demurrer being overruled, the plaintiff moved for an injunction to restrain the ringing of these bells, which was granted so far as they occasioned an annoyance to the plaintiff or his family.

This case came on first upon a general demurrer for want of equity, and, upon the demurrer being overruled, a motion was then made on behalf of the plaintiff for an injunction.

The bill stated, that previously to the 25th of March 1817 the late Lord Teignmouth resided in a mansion-house, with pleasure-grounds and appurtenances thereto belonging, situate in Park Road, Clapham, then called Acre Lane, and which mansion-house, after Lord Teignmouth ceased to reside there, was converted into two dwelling-houses, but without there being any party-wall between them. That on the 25th of March 1817 the plaintiff, William Soltau, became the purchaser of one of these houses for the residue of a term of sixty-nine years, at the yearly rent of 130l. That the plaintiff had ever since resided in this house with his family. That the adjoining house, which was so separated from his, was occupied between 1817 and 1848 as a place of residence. That in July 1848, this last-mentioned house was purchased on behalf of a religious order or society of persons, professing the Roman Catholic religion, called the Redemptorist Fathers, and they determined to set apart a portion of the building for religious worship, and accordingly appropriated the ground-floor to that purpose, and appointed the Rev. Frederick De Held, the defendant to this suit, to officiate as priest, and to exercise the rites of his religion. That since the month of July 1848, the said house was called St. Mary's Catholic Chapel; that in August 1848 the said Frederick De Held, or some other person superintending the performance of religious worship in this chapel, caused a wooden frame to be erected on the roof of the house, and suspended a bell thereto; that such bell was tolled and rung for five days in the week five times every day; that it was rung six times on Saturday, and oftener on Sunday: the ringing ordinarily commenced as early as five o'clock, and continued for ten minutes or thereabouts, to the great discomfort and annoyance of the plaintiff and the other members of his family; that on the 12th of October 1848, the plaintiff wrote a letter to the superiors of the said Roman Catholic establishment, which was to the following effect:—"Sir, or Sirs,—As well on the part of myself and neighbours as the parish generally, I have to complain of the great annoyance of the bell you have caused to be erected on the roof of your house, and which is loudly tolled as early as five o'clock, and very frequently afterwards during the morning, afternoon and evening. We hope, on your receiving this representation, you will take immediate measures to abate the great nuisance, and thereby relieve me and my neighbours and the rest of the inhabitants of this parish from any further disturbance. I am Sir, or Sirs, Your obedient servant, W. Soltau." That no answer was returned to this letter; that the plaintiff had recently discovered that the said Redemptorist Fathers on the 8th of November 1848 caused a notice to be given under the provisions of the 31 Geo. 3. c. 32, that this house was intended to be used as a Roman Catholic chapel, and it was accordingly registered as directed by the act. That notwithstanding the plaintiff's remonstrance, the bell of this chapel was continued to be tolled and rung as before, to the great annoyance of the plaintiff and also of his neighbours; and thereupon the plaintiff and several other persons determined to send a notice in writing with respect to the annoyance to Dr. Wiseman, who exercised ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the defendant as priest of the chapel. That such notice was to the following effect:—"To the superiors, directors, managers, and occupiers of the Roman Catholic House and Establishment, at Park Road, Clapham, and to all others whom it may concern.—We, the undersigned occupiers of dwelling-houses in the vicinity of the house and establishment above mentioned, desire to represent that we are subjected to a great inconvenience and annoyance from the loud and frequent ringing (often at unseasonable hours) of the large and harsh-sounding bell some time since erected upon an open frame on the roof of the said house. The practice we complain of is offensive alike to our ears and feelings, disturbs the quiet and comfort of our houses, molests us in our engagements whether of business, amusement or devotion, and is peculiarly injurious and distressing when members of our household happen to be invalids. It tends also to depreciate the value of our dwelling-houses. Under these circumstances we trust you will immediately take the present complaint into your serious consideration, and voluntarily redress the grievance instead of constraining us to have recourse to the law to abate what we all from experience deem a very grave, indeed intolerable, nuisance. Dated, 21st of December 1848." That a copy of this document was served on Mr. Harting, the solicitor of Dr. Wiseman and of the defendant. That on the 1st of February 1849, the plaintiff's solicitor had an interview with Mr. Harting, who stated that he had seen Dr. Wiseman and some other persons on the subject of the complaint, and he then admitted that the said bell was rung five times a-day five days in the week, six times on Saturdays, and somewhat oftener on Sundays, but that the said bell was never rung for any but public purposes, that is to say, purposes interesting to the Catholic population, and not for any household purposes; that these public purposes were as follows, for five days in the week the Angelus bell was rung thrice as notice to all good Catholics to utter a prayer in honour of the Virgin, and twice a-day the bell sounded for mass. It was further stated that, in deference to the wishes intimated in the plaintiff's letter the hour of the early bell had been altered from five to six o'clock, and that willingly, if they could, they would meet the desires of the neighbours still further, but this they could not.

The bill then stated that in the month of May last a church capable of holding 400 persons was erected on the ground attached to the premises so used as a chapel and religious establishment, and such church was opened on the 14th of May 1851, and it had ever since been used for religious worship, and a steeple or tower 100 feet high was built as part of the church, and in March last six bells were placed in the steeple, and on the occasion of the church being opened, the bells were rung nearly the whole of the day; that this church was called the Church of our Immaculate Lady of Victories; that the bell in the chapel and the peal of bells in the new church were rung daily at the following times—the chapel bell was rung at five o'clock and a quarter to seven every morning, the steeple bell at a quarter to nine every morning and at a quarter before seven and a quarter past seven every evening, and on particular days the single bell and the peal of bells were rung much oftener, and this was continued down to the time of the plaintiff obtaining a verdict in the action after mentioned; that when the peal of bells was rung, the noise was so great that it was impossible for the plaintiff or the members of his family to read, write or converse in his dwelling-house, and if it was continued, the plaintiff would be unable to reside any longer in his said house; that in consequence of the grievance suffered by the plaintiff, he applied to the defendant to desist from tolling and ringing these bells so as to occasion any annoyance to him and his neighbours, but this request having been refused, the plaintiff on the 28th of June 1851, commenced an action against the defendant in the Court of Exchequer to recover damages for the nuisance committed by means of the before-mentioned tolling and ringing of the bells. The trial came on for hearing, and the plaintiff obtained a verdict with 40s. damages and costs on the 13th of August 1851; that the bell attached to the chapel was some time after the commencement of the action removed from the roof to one of the sides; and that subsequently to the 13th of August last until the 9th of November, neither the bells of the church nor that of the chapel were tolled or rung; but on Sunday, the 9th of November last, the defendant caused the said bells to be tolled or rung as follows: one bell at a quarter before nine in the morning for six minutes, one bell at twenty minutes past ten o'clock for the same time, three bells at a quarter before eleven for the like space of time, one bell at half past six in the evening for five minutes, and three bells at ten minutes to seven for five minutes; and the bells were rung for the same number of times and for a like period on the 16th of November, the following Sunday. The bill charged that the defendant threatened and intended, not only to continue tolling or ringing the said bells every Sunday in the manner hereinbefore mentioned, but he also threatened and intended to ring peals of the six bells, and also to toll and ring on week days. The bill then charged that the weight of the peal of six bells amounted altogether to 28 cwt. 2 qrs. 14 lb., the largest bell being 9 cwt., and their size in diameter amounted to about 3 feet each; that the ringing of these bells in the manner they were now rung caused considerable annoyance to the plaintiff and the members of his family, and during the time when some of the more weighty of the said bells were rung or tolled it was impossible for the plaintiff to read or converse without great difficulty; that the plaintiff had a daughter who for several years had been in a delicate state of health, and during the period the defendant caused the bells of the church to be so tolled and rung previously to the commencement of the action, the plaintiff was obliged to remove her to a more quiet place of residence; that the plaintiff had, since the action brought back his daughter to her home, but if the bells were now continued to be rung, he would be obliged again to remove her on account of the injury which her health would sustain by reason of such ringing and tolling. The bill charged that the ringing of the bells as they were now tolled and rung, would considerably diminish the value of the plaintiff's house, and he should be obliged to leave it, and would have great difficulty in disposing of it, except at a considerable pecuniary sacrifice. It was also stated that the distance of the plaintiff's bed-room from the bells of the chapel and church did not exceed twenty yards. The bill prayed that the defendant and all persons acting under his directions might be restrained by injunction from tolling or ringing the bell of the before-mentioned religious house or Catholic chapel, and from tolling and ringing the bells belonging to the Roman Catholic Church adjoining the said chapel called the Church of our Immaculate Lady of Victorries, or any of such bells. The bill also prayed in the alternative that, at all events, the defendant and all persons acting under his direction might be restrained from tolling or ringing the said bells so as to disturb or annoy the plaintiff, but the motion for the injunction was confined to the first part of the prayer.

Mr. Campbell and Mr. Bagshawe, in support of the demurrer, submitted, as the first ground of demurrer, that the foundation on which the plaintiff rested his case was, that the ringing of the bells constituted an annoyance to himself and a nuisance to his neighbours and the public at large, but he did not state a special instance of annoyance to himself more than would be suffered by all his neighbours. The case stated was, therefore, public, and the remedy was consequently by information filed by the Attorney General on behalf of the public. There were three grounds of nuisance: public, private, and a combination of both. In the first of these, the Court of equity would only interfere when the Attorney General prosecuted. If the nuisance were private then the remedy was by bill, but if the nuisance were both public and private then the plaintiff must file a bill, and there must also be an information by the Attorney General. This was only a bill by a single plaintiff against a single defendant, although the plaintiff stated that the nuisance affected the whole neighbourhood. To maintain this bill the plaintiff must make out that he was the only person injured, which was not the case made by him. This principle had been established to prevent a multiplicity of actions; but if the plaintiff could maintain this bill singly, so could every inhabitant maintain a similar bill. The principles were elementary and were laid down in Black. Com. vol. iii. p. 219. It was also supported in Iveson v. Moor (1), where it was held that an action would not lie for a general nuisance when a particular damage only was done; in this case the plaintiff might possibly have more inconvenience, but could have no more damage than was public. The following cases were also cited upon this point—The Attorney General v. Nichol (2), The Fishmongers' Company v. the East India Company (3), Baines v. Baker (4), The Attorney General v. Johnson (5), Squire v. Campbell (6), Crowder v. Tinkler (7), Hudson v. Maddison (8), Haines v. Taylor (9), The Attorney General v. the Foundling Hospital (10), and Coulson v. White (11). The second ground of demurrer was, that assuming the plaintiff had a single right to come to the Court to complain of a public nuisance, still he could not maintain his bill until he had established his right at law. The grievance now complained of was different from that upon which the plaintiff had brought his action. The old case was the continual ringing of bells at inconvenient hours. The Court of law decided that that was a nuisance, but now the case was simply that of the bells being rung five times and five minutes each time, and that on Sundays only. This was no greater nuisance than was caused by every parish church. The object the plaintiff had in view was evidently to stop the ringing altogether, but this was entirely opposed to the law of the land. Every class of religionists had a right to ring bells so long as they did not create an annoyance to other people, but it was not simply a personal inconvenience such as might be supposed would be suffered by a person of a nervous temperament that would give a right to stop the ringing of church bells. It was true that the bill contained an allegation that the defendant threatened to ring the bells oftener than at present, but to give the plaintiff a right to file a bill for an injunction, he must state such a case as would entitle him to sustain an action at law and to obtain substantial damages, but it could not be supposed that any jury would give damages where the case was one founded only upon threats.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Tripp, in support of the bill, said there were two objections raised by this demurrer; one as to the right of an individual alleging an injury to himself to come to this Court when the nuisance was also a public nuisance, and the other as to the plaintiff's right being established at law. On the first point, there could be no doubt that a person who had sustained an injury and conceived himself aggrieved might come to this Court to restrain a nuisance, although it was also a public nuisance. If the nuisance were only public an individual could not sue, but if it was private as well as public the individual who suffered might sue in his individual capacity. This principle was laid down in Mitford's Pleadings, 168, in Crowder v. Tinkler, Spencer v. the London and Birmingham Railway Company (12), Sampson v. Smith (13), Haines v. Taylor, The Attorney General v. Forbes (14), and Walter v. Selfe (15). On the next point, it was contended, that the plaintiff had established his right at law. The right had been tried as to the ringing of a single bell and a peal of bells. It was said that the amount of ringing was different now to what it was when the action was tried, and that therefore a new case was established, but they might as well urge that putting a new clapper to the bell would make a new case, or they might diminish the amount of ringing by a minute or more, and so establish a new case as often as they pleased: such an argument was without foundation. The constant ringing of bells was invariably a nuisance, but with respect to the parish churches the annoyance was very different, since they did not commence as the defendant's bells did at five or six o'clock in the morning. The following cases were also cited on the second ground of demurrer—Weller v. Smeaton (16), The Attorney General v. Cleaver (17), and Elmhirst v. Spencer (18).

This was not a religious question in any manner; but these bells were rung in defiance of the laws of the country and the wishes of the neighbours. For the last 300 years, the Roman Catholics had not been allowed to ring a peal of bells, and they had been very well able to do without it, but now it was contended that the ringing was necessary for religious purposes. The 31 Geo. 3. c. 32. was referred to, under which act the Catholics were subject to numerous restrictions. The 11th section provided that no priest should be allowed to officiate in a chapel with a steeple and bell. It was said that by the 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 115. permission was given to the Catholics to ring bells, but it would be found that no such power was given by that act. It was a fact that many attempts had been made by the Catholics to repeal the act of Geo. 3, but it had never yet been effected.

Mr. Campbell was heard in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—In expressing my opinion upon the demurrer, I should, under ordinary circumstances, state the grounds upon which I formed that opinion; but having arrived at the conclusion that this demurrer ought to be overruled, I think it better to abstain from making any further observations upon the case, because when the motion for an injunction is brought on, some of the expressions I should use might possibly be supposed to prejudice the arguments addressed to the motion. I shall, therefore, simply overrule the demurrer, and shall give my full opinion after the motion has been heard.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Tripp then moved for an injunction in the terms of the first part of the prayer; and several affidavits were read, which, so far as material, were commented upon by the Vice Chancellor in his judgment. The facts, however, were not controverted, and the case was precisely the same as the case upon the argument for the demurrer.

Mr. Campbell and Mr. Bagshawe opposed the motion.

Mr. Malins having been heard in reply, the Court reserved its judgment.

Dec. 23.—KINDERSLEY, V.C.—This case comes before me in the first instance by way of demurrer, and that demurrer being overruled, it comes on in the next place by way of motion for an injunction. On overruling the demurrer, I abstained from expressing any reasons for so doing at the time, from an apprehension that I might intimate some opinion or drop some expression that might prejudice the argument of the motion on one side or the other. I now proceed to state my reasons for having overruled the demurrer, and then I shall proceed to give my opinion on the motion.

The demurrer is a general demurrer for want of equity, and of course by that demurrer the defendant undertakes to shew that upon the statements contained in the bill, the plaintiff would not at the hearing be entitled to any relief. Now, the statements in the bill, which I may state in substance without reading them through in detail, are these. [The Vice Chancellor then stated the substance of the bill, which has already been fully set forth.] Now, the grounds of demurrer to this bill are these. The first ground of demurrer is, that this is a public nuisance, and therefore that the suit should have been an information by the Attorney General; and that it is not competent to the plaintiff, the nuisance being a public nuisance, to file a bill as for a private nuisance.

Now, with regard to that ground of demurrer, I confess it appears to me, to say the least, extremely questionable whether this is a public nuisance at all. In the view which I take of the case, it is scarcely, if at all, material to consider whether it be or be not a public nuisance, but, as I have said I entertain very great doubt whether it be a public nuisance—whether an indictment would lie for it as a public nuisance. I conceive that to constitute a public nuisance the thing complained of must be such as in its nature or its consequences is a nuisance, an injury or a damage to all persons who come within the sphere of its operation, though it may be in greater or less degrees. For example, take the case of the operations of a manufactory, in the course of which operations there are emitted volumes of noxious smoke or of poisonous effluvia. Now, to all persons who are at all within the reach of those operations, it is more or less objectionable, more or less a nuisance in the popular sense of the term. It is true that to those who are nearer to it, more immediately and nearer within the sphere of its operations, it may be a greater inconvenience than it is to those who are more remote from it, but still to all who are at all within the reach, it is in some degree, greater or less, a nuisance or an inconvenience. Take another ordinary, perhaps the most ordinary, case of a public nuisance, the stopping of the Queen's highway; that is a nuisance to all who may have occasion to travel that highway. It may be a much greater nuisance, no doubt, to a person who may have to travel it every day of his life, than it is to a person who has to travel that way once a year or once in five years; but to whomever may come within reach of the thing complained of, it is more or less a nuisance. But if the thing complained of be such that, although it is a great nuisance to those who are more immediately within the sphere of its operation, it is no nuisance at all, no inconvenience whatever, nay, it may be even advantageous or pleasurable to those who are more removed from it, there, I conceive, it does not come within the meaning of a public nuisance.

Now, a chime of bells may be, and no doubt is, an extreme nuisance, and perhaps an intolerable nuisance, to a person who lives within a very few feet or yards of those bells, but to a person who lives at a distance from them, although he is within reach of the sound, though he is within the sphere of their operations, within the influence of their effect, so far from its being a nuisance, or an inconvenience, it may be a positive pleasure. For I cannot concur with the proposition that in all circumstances and under all conditions, the sound of bells must be a nuisance. I am sure the mass of mankind must be conscious of very pleasurable sensations arising from the sound of village bells at a distance on a fine summer's evening, and every man's reading will supply him with passages from poets and other writers dwelling upon that as a positive pleasure. And it is rather curious that one of the very witnesses—I refer to this not for the purpose of a fact at all—but one of the witnesses who was examined on the trial on the part of the plaintiff, and who deposed strongly to its being an intolerable nuisance when he was in Mr. Soltau's house, says, "But where I live, at Clapham, which is about a furlong from the bells, and with the intervention of trees, so far from its being a nuisance to me, it is a positive gratification, and I confess I should be extremely sorry if they were done away with." I only mention that by way of illustration, that in this case to some persons within the sphere of the effect of these bells it may be no nuisance at all, and no doubt is no nuisance; and therefore I very much doubt, indeed my opinion is, that this could not be indicted as a public nuisance; but as I have said, it is of very little moment, in the view I take of it, whether it be or not. I may further make this observation, that it does not follow because a thing complained of is a nuisance to several individuals, that therefore it is a public nuisance. One may illustrate that very simply, by supposing the case of a man building up a wall which has the effect of grievously darkening the ancient lights of half a dozen different dwelling-houses. It does not follow because there are half a dozen persons or a dozen persons suffering by the darkening of their ancient light by the one act, that therefore it would be a public nuisance which you could indict at the suit of the Crown, or for which the Attorney General could file an information in this court. It is a private nuisance to each of the several individuals aggrieved.

However, in the further observations on this ground of demurrer, I will proceed on the assumption that it is a public nuisance, that is to say, that the defendant is right in his contention that it is a public nuisance, and let us see what the consequence will be if it be so. Now, of course, in the case of a public nuisance, no doubt the remedy to get rid of the public nuisance is indictment at law. The remedy at law is indictment; the remedy in equity in the case of a public nuisance, is no doubt information at the suit of the Attorney General; and so in the case of private nuisance the remedy at law is action; the remedy in equity is bill; and this is the distinction which is pointed out in those passages cited by Mr. Campbell from the 3rd volume of Blackstone's Commentaries, and from Mitford's Pleadings—a very obvious, clear and recognized distinction. But it is evident that that which is a public nuisance may be also a private nuisance to a particular individual, by inflicting on him some special and particular damage: and if it be both, that is, if it be in its nature a public nuisance and at the same time does inflict on a particular individual a special and particular damage, may not that individual have his private remedy at law by action, or in equity by bill? Because that is the question which is to be determined with respect to this ground of demurrer. The defendant's counsel insist that he cannot, and several cases were cited in support of this proposition.

Now, on referring to those cases, it appears to me they do not support that proposition. The case which was first cited, and which is a very important case, Iveson v. Moor, from Comyns's Reports, was a case in which the Judges of the King's Bench were divided in opinion; but it was considered by the counsel citing this case that they had the authority of Lord Holt—a very high authority—for the proposition, that the individual could not maintain an action at law for the damage to himself where it was the case of a public nuisance. Now, on examining the case, so far from supporting the proposition, it proves directly the contrary. I think it right just to refer to the details of that case rather particularly. The case is reported not only in Comyns, but it is reported much more fully and at large in the first volume of Lord Raymond's Reports, and it is also reported in Chief Justice Holt's own reports (19). Now what was the case? It was this—that the plaintiff and defendants were the owners of two adjoining collieries, and the action was an action on the case; the declaration alleged that the plaintiff had dug from his own colliery a considerable quantity of coals, which he had for sale, 200 loads—but the declaration alleged that the defendants, in order to alienate and seduce customers and buyers from the plaintiff's colliery, and to appropriate those customers and procure them to go to the defendant Moore's colliery, stopped up a certain place in, through, and over which, the highway led, and it so continued stopped for a month, so that the carts for conveying the plaintiff's coals could not pass that way. Now, so far, that is clearly a public nuisance, stopping up the Queen's highway. But then the declaration went on with a per quod, alleging the special damage per quod the plaintiff, during all that time, lost the benefit and profit of his colliery, and the coals dug out of his said colliery—magnopere depretiati et deteriorati devenerunt, pro defectu emptorum ex causa prædicta sic impeditorum et obstructorum,—for want of buyers, who were thus hindered by the aforesaid cause. That was the way in which he lay the special damage to himself. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and it was moved in arrest of judgment that the action could not be sustained, and a rule was obtained to shew cause why the judgment should not be entered for the defendants, instead of for the plaintiff. Now, the Judges of the Court of King's Bench were equally divided in opinion as to whether judgment ought to be for the plaintiff or for the defendants. Gould and Turton thought that judgment should be for the plaintiff. Rokeby and Holt were of a contrary opinion, and thought judgment should be for the defendants. But why? Not because either of them entertained the least doubt as to whether an individual could, although it was a public nuisance, maintain an action for the special damage to himself, but because they considered that the special damage was not laid in the declaration with sufficient accuracy and minuteness, and only on that ground. Now Rokeby, who coincided with Holt, expresses himself distinctly, and begins his judgment with the very proposition which is against the contention of the defendant. Rokeby, J. said that "he would admit that no particular person could have an action for the general stopping of a way, first, because the offender is punishable at the King's suit; secondly, because multiplicity of actions is to be avoided, and if one man may have an action, for the same reason a hundred thousand may. But if the stopping be a particular damage to a particular person, he may have an action, but then the particular and special damage must be particularly and certainly alleged, which is wanting in this action, and therefore it does not lie." So Holt in the same way gives his reasons at great length. He says he considers first the question whether an action would lie for the mere stopping the way, on the ground that the plaintiff's coal mine was situate near to the highway. He says no; it is a public nuisance. But then he considers whether there ought not to be further some special damage to support the action, and whether this damage is specially enough shewn, and so, without reading through his whole judgment, it is clear that both he and Rokeby concurred with the other Judges in opinion that the action would lie, provided the per quod in the declaration laid the special damage with sufficient accuracy and particularity. But further, when I look at Holt's own report of the matter, it is put beyond all question, but he concludes by mentioning this as the result of the whole case. He says, "In this case, it was agreed by the whole Court that where an action arises from a public nuisance there must be a special damage, for he that did the nuisance is punishable at the suit of the public by indictment or information, and to allow all private persons their actions without special damage would create an infinite multiplicity of suits." And further than this, it appears by the note which is appended to the report in Lord Raymond, by the reporter, that this took place:—there was the rule to shew cause why the verdict should not be entered for the plaintiff. The Judges being equally divided, that rule could not be discharged, and the rule could not be made absolute; neither while that rule was pending could there be judgment either way. The case was in that dilemma that it could never be disposed of at all so long as the Judges were equally divided on the point, whether the special damage would sufficiently lie, and therefore it was arranged and agreed to by Lord Holt that the case should be re-argued before the four Judges of the Common Pleas and the four Barons of the Exchequer. It was so argued before them, and the eight were unanimously of opinion that the action lay, and that the special damage was sufficiently laid, and that judgment should be for the plaintiff.

Now that case appears to be a case of no slight importance. It was the opinion of all the twelve Judges at that time, with Lord Holt at their head, that in the case of the clearest public nuisance, a case beyond all question a case of public nuisance, a particular individual may have a particular action for a damage sustained, provided in his declaration he lays that damage with sufficient particularity in the per quod, and of course supports it by sufficient evidence. Therefore, that case so far from establishing the proposi-

Another case which was cited is a case of Baines v. Baker, cited from Ambler, and reported as an anonymous case in the third volume of Atkyns, which was the case with respect to the erection of the Small Pox Hospital. It was a bill to restrain the erection of the Small Pox Hospital in Cold Bath Fields. Both the reports in Ambler and Atkyns are extremely jejune and bad, and unfortunately there is no trace of the facts of the case in the Registrar's book, and there is not one word of the facts stated either by Ambler or by Atkyns. It appears that the plaintiff contended as far as one can collect from the cases (though they are very unsatisfactory) that the intended erection of this Small Pox Hospital spread dismay and terror through the neighbourhood, and that he was the owner of some houses in Cold Bath Fields, and that his tenants—he was not himself a resident there apparently, but his tenants—were giving him notice to quit the houses. That was the only way in which any special damage was alleged at all as far as I can collect from the case. But the Lord Chancellor, Lord Hardwicke, says that is not a private nuisance. The terror of a thing is not a private nuisance, nor is it a public nuisance. It is neither one thing nor the other, and he refused the injunction. But I confess I cannot collect from that case that he expressed any opinion that if it were a public nuisance, and at the same time a special damage arose to the plaintiff from it, which he could shew, that he might not come into a court of equity to restrain that nuisance.

Another case cited was the case of The Attorney General v. the Foundling Hospital, and I really do not know why that case was cited, because it has nothing to do with either public nuisance or private nuisance; it was only the case of an information filed by the Attorney General on behalf of the charity, the Foundling Hospital, to restrain the persons who had the management of that hospital from dealing with charity property by building upon it in a way that was alleged to be a breach of trust and mismanagement of charity property. It was not a question of nuisance at all.

NEW SERIES, XXI.—CHANC.

The Fishmongers' Company v. the East India Company, cited from Dickens, only shews that the Fishmongers' Company could maintain a bill for an injunction to restrain the defendants, the East India Company, another corporation, from building a wall so as to darken ancient lights, but the distance was so great that it was considered not to amount to a nuisance. It was seventeen feet, which in a town was considered no nuisance at all.

In The Attorney General v. Nichol, that was an information by the Attorney General only because it was on behalf of a charity, not on the ground of public nuisance, for an injunction to restrain the defendants from building a wall which would darken ancient lights of the Scottish Hospital. The injunction, having been granted ex parte, was dissolved because it did not appear that there was a sufficient degree of nearness of the wall to the light to constitute a nuisance.

In Crowder v. Tinkler, which was the case of the powder mills, that was a bill by a private individual on the ground that the erection of a certain powder mill or corning mill for the manufacture of powder within a certain distance of his premises endangered the safety of his property, and the Lord Chancellor directed the plaintiff to indict the building as a nuisance—observe, that is, a public nuisance, and in the mean time he put the defendant on terms as to how he should use the mills, with liberty to apply on the result of that trial. That proves the contrary of the proposition contended for, because that was a public nuisance. Lord Eldon directed it to be tried as a public nuisance, by directing an indictment to be brought, yet he sustained the bill—ordered the motion to stand over till the result of the trial of the indictment; and any party was to be at liberty to apply. It appeared in that case that there was great conflict of affidavit as to whether it was likely to prove a nuisance or not.

Hudson v. Maddison was the case of five persons joining together to complain of an act which was a separate nuisance to each of them; and it was held that the five could not join together. That was all; but that was determined only on the ground on which Jones v. Garcia del Rio (20) was determined, which was the case of the Peruvian loan, where one person filed a bill on behalf of himself and all the other shareholders. It was decided in that case that the bill did not lie on behalf of himself and all others, because each one was a separate creditor of the Peruvian government or the individual acting for the Peruvian government. Squire v. Campbell, another case cited, was the case of the erection of the statue of George the Third near Pall Mall East; and I suppose that was cited because it appears the Attorney General was a defendant. There, Lord Cottenham held that that was not a public nuisance, because it did not obstruct the carriage-way, and it was not a private nuisance because the only private mischief was that it might diminish the value of a man's house, which was no ground of nuisance, or might shut out a pleasant prospect, which was not a ground of nuisance; but the Attorney General was made a party, not in respect of nuisance at all, but because the freehold of the spot on which the statue was erected being in the Crown, the plaintiff thought it better to make the Attorney General a party to sustain that interest, and not on the ground at all that the Attorney General was a necessary party to such a suit. The Attorney General v. Cleaver, another case cited, was an information by the Attorney General. Now, here was a public nuisance; it was to restrain the manufacture of soap on the ground of its being a public nuisance to the inhabitants of Battersea and Chelsea. That was an information by the Attorney General; but that proves nothing. It only shews that where the object is to restrain it as a public nuisance, that must be done by information; but it does not at all shew that an individual may not have a bill if he proves special damage arising to himself out of a public nuisance. There, Lord Eldon ordered the motion to stand over, and in the mean time directed an indictment to be tried. These are the cases cited in support of the proposition that the bill does not lie. Now, several cases have been referred to on the part of the plaintiff—Spencer v. the London and Birmingham Railway Company, Sampson v. Smith, Haines v. Taylor and Walter v. Selfe; in all of which and in many other cases that might be cited it has been held and acted on, over and over and over again, that if an individual sustains a special and particular damage from an act he may have a bill; if it be such a case as a court of equity will interfere in at all, he may have the interference of the Court on a bill, although the act complained of be in its nature a public nuisance. There were two other cases cited—The Attorney General v. Forbes and The Attorney General v. Johnson. These cases only shew this, that there may be both an information and a bill; that is, that the Attorney General may file an information to restrain it as a public nuisance, and the particular individual who sustains particular injury may join as plaintiff as well as relator, and have the remedy for himself also in the same suit. I am of opinion, therefore, that the first ground of demurrer is not tenable.

(20) Turn. & R. 297.

The next ground of demurrer insisted upon was that the plaintiff has not established his right at law. Now, it is true that equity will only interfere in case of nuisance where the thing complained of is a nuisance at law; there is no such thing as an equitable nuisance; but is it a ground of demurrer that the matter has not yet been tried at law? It may be ground, and is ground very often, for refusing an injunction upon the motion; but is it ground of demurrer? No, I am not aware of any cases in which it has been so determined. I find as far back as the time of Lord Hardwicke in Morris v. Berkeley (21), that was a motion in relation to the obstruction of the plaintiff's ancient lights. It had not been tried at law. So far from saying that the bill would not lie because it had not been tried at law, Lord Hardwicke actually granted the injunction, but directed a trial, and after the trial any party was to be at liberty to apply. In Elmhirst v. Spencer Lord Cottenham expresses himself thus—“The plaintiff before he can ask for an injunction must prove that he has sustained such a substantial injury by the acts of the defendants as would have entitled him to a verdict at law in an action for damages.” And then, in another part of the same judgment, he says, “This Court will not take upon itself to adjudicate upon the question whether this is a nuisance or not; that must be ascertained in a court of law, as laid down by Lord Eldon in The Attorney General v. Cleaver." Now what did Lord Eldon do in The Attorney General v. Cleaver? Why, in that case, which was a public nuisance, he directed the indictment, which had been already brought and was pending, to be prosecuted; he spoke to one of the Judges to expedite the trial and ordered the motion to stand over until the hearing of it. Therefore, Lord Cottenham, in that case, is referring to the principle that you cannot ask for the injunction if there be a question about your legal right—about its being at law a nuisance. But I do not know where it is laid down that a bill will not lie, that is, that it is ground of demurrer because the action has not yet been brought. However, whether that be so or not, in fact the plaintiff has recovered at law, the thing has been tried at law, but this ingenious argument is suggested—it is said, "True, there has been an action at law, but this which is now being done, which you call a nuisance, has never been tried at law. When the trial took place at law, we were ringing bells every day in the week, we were beginning at five o'clock in the morning and we were ringing a considerable period of time on each occasion, but now we are doing much less; we are only ringing them on Sundays; we are ringing them a fewer number of times; we are not ringing them so long at a time; therefore go and bring your action for this, and see whether this is a nuisance. You have not tried this." Now, if that argument were to prevail, only see what it would come to. Supposing that, after the trial of the action, the defendant had done this—instead of ringing seven days in the week he had rung six, or instead of beginning at five o'clock in the morning he had begun at six, or instead of ringing for a quarter of an hour he had rung ten minutes each time, and when the plaintiff came into equity to restrain him he had said, "You have not tried this; when you brought your action I rang for seven days in the week, I only ring six now; I began at five o'clock, I now only begin at six in the morning," and so on. Well, if that were yielded to and another action brought and damages recovered, he would reduce the number of days ringing from six to five. "Now you have not tried this same thing," and so on toties quoties. It is clear the argument, pushed to its legitimate conclusion, must result in that which is contrary to all reason and to all justice. The thing has been tried, because what is it you are to try at law? You are to try (if it be a question) whether the plaintiff's right in his house be such as to entitle him to come into equity at all, and you are also to try whether the ringing of these bells is in its nature at law considered a nuisance. That has been tried, but the exact extent or quantum of injury or nuisance inflicted is a question which does not require repeated trials in order to satisfy the rule of the Court; that as to a nuisance, that being a matter of law only, the law is to determine what is nuisance. But upon the demurrer the whole question upon this ground is put an end to by an allegation in the bill, which this demurrer of course admits to be true,—it is this: that whatever be the extent of the ringing now practised, that is, on the 9th and 16th of November, those two Sundays, and no doubt on subsequent Sundays, whatever be the case in that respect, the bill alleges, and the demurrer admits, that the defendant threatens and intends not only to continue tolling or ringing the last-mentioned bells on Sunday in the manner last aforesaid, but he also threatens and intends to ring peals of the said six bells, and also to toll and ring on week-days, and he also threatens and intends to toll and ring the bell of the before-mentioned chapel or religious house; so that he admits that what is now being done is only an instalment of that which he not only reserves to himself the right to do, but which he actually intends to do: to ring as he rang before, every day in the week, to ring peals on six bells, to ring just as he pleases. Therefore, upon the demurrer it is quite clear the argument that the plaintiff has not established his right at law is one which cannot be maintained.

Now, there was one point raised by the plaintiff which I do not think it necessary to go into. The plaintiff insisted that it was illegal for Roman Catholics to ring and toll bells in a steeple annexed to their place of worship. It appears to me that whether that be so or not is perfectly immaterial to this case; because, even if it be illegal, I am not to grant an injunction to restrain an illegal act merely because it is illegal. I could not grant an injunction to restrain a man from smuggling, which is an illegal act. If it be illegal, the illegality of it is no ground for my interfering. Therefore I do not at all touch upon or go into the question, whether, under the numerous acts of parliament relating to the Roman Catholics, it be or be not now lawful to have a steeple and bells. For the reasons which I have mentioned I overrule the demurrer.

Now, I proceed to give my opinion with regard to the motion, and many of the observations which I have made upon the demurrer necessarily more or less apply to the motion, for I find that almost without exception, or with very trivial exceptions, the facts as alleged by the bill are verified by affidavit, and are, in fact, not in contradiction. There are slight discrepancies; for example, the bill alleges that on some occasions the period of the ringing was six minutes, when the defendant says, in fact, it was five minutes; it was rather exaggerated by the plaintiff. Therefore, of course, in those instances I take it according to the defendant's statement, and not according to the statement of the bill. But in all respects, I think almost without exception, there is no discrepancy in the statement as to the facts of the case. I have already stated these facts, and therefore I need not repeat them. But I may observe, the six bells having been erected in the steeple about the month of May when the chapel was opened, those bells are, according to the description of the size (which is not in contradiction) and their weight, very large bells, they are not the ordinary sized chapel bells which are used in most chapels, and used perhaps in most of the district churches in and near London, but are very large, unusually large, bells; and the effect is thus described of the ringing of those bells antecedently to the trial by Mr. Soltau in his affidavit, and not in any way contradicted. He says, that "when a peal of the bells of the said Roman Catholic Church was rung the noise was so great that it was impossible for me or the members of my family to read, write, or converse in my dwelling-house. And I further say that the tolling and ringing of the said bell and bells was and is an intolerable nuisance to me; and if the said bell or bells is or are permitted to be tolled or rung in the manner in which the same was so tolled and rung as aforesaid, it will be impossible for me to continue to reside any longer in my said house." That is the description of the effect produced by the ringing of the bells as it was practised antecedently to the verdict in August last. An application having been made to the defendant to desist before an action was brought, and being refused, the action was brought, and I have already stated the result of that action. It appears that the chapel bell has been since removed from the top of the building to the side,—and to the side, as I understand, farthest away, most remote from the plaintiff's house, which is on the other side. Now, the affidavits having described as the bill describes the present ringing, that is, the ringing on the 9th and 16th of November, correcting it from six minutes to five minutes, as the defendant alleges it,—which I do, of course, taking it according to the defendant's statement,—the effect of the ringing, as it is now practised, is thus described in the affidavit of Mr. Soltau. He says, "And I further say that the tolling and ringing of the said bells of the said Roman Catholic Church, in the manner in which they were so tolled and rung on the said 9th day of November instant, and the 16th day of November instant, caused considerable annoyance to myself, and disturbed the devotions of the members of my family. And that during the time or times when some of the more weighty of the said bells are rung or tolled, it is impossible for me to read without great difficulty." Then he mentions the fact of his daughter having been removed from the house, which I do not dwell upon, and he proceeds thus: "And I further say that the tolling and ringing of the said bells on the said 9th and 16th days of November 1851 was a great annoyance and nuisance to me and my family. And I further say that, if the said bells of the said church are permitted to be tolled and rung in the manner in which they were so tolled and rung on the 9th and 16th of November as aforesaid, the value of my said dwelling-house and premises will be considerably diminished, and that if I and my family are compelled to leave, I could only dispose of it at a great pecuniary sacrifice. And I further say that, the distance of my bed-room from the bell of the said chapel and the bells of the said church does not exceed twenty yards."

There is another affidavit also, the affidavit of Mr. Gadsden, in support of the plaintiff's allegation, which thus states the nuisance as it now exists according to the present practice of ringing. "I further say that I have heard the said bells as they now ring and toll since the 13th of August, when I was in the plaintiff's residence on the 30th of November now last past—that 30th of November being a Sunday—and I consider the ringing and tolling of the said bells, both as they were rung and tolled prior to the said 13th day of August 1851, and as they are now rung and tolled, to be peculiarly annoying and distressing to any person occupying the residence of the said plaintiff, and in my opinion the value thereof is greatly decreased by reason of such ringing and tolling." Then he goes on to state, "That if the said bells were not rung and tolled as aforesaid, in my opinion the said house would still let for 130*l.* per annum, the rent which I am informed the said plaintiff now pays for it. And I say that I consider from the peculiar position of the said church with reference to the plaintiff's residence, that any ringing or tolling the bells of the said church, even on a Sunday only, as they are now rung and tolled, would have the effect of deteriorating the value thereof, because I do not believe any private gentleman or lady, or any person who could afford to pay such a rent would become a tenant thereof." That is the account given of the effect of the present nuisance. Now, it struck me at the time, that I should have expected more persons to have been brought forward to depose to the fact of the nuisance. There is the affidavit of the plaintiff, and the affidavit of Mr. Gadsden; but when I consider that, in fact, there is no controversy about it, and that there is no contradictory evidence, then it appears to me that the plaintiff was perfectly justified in saying if there had been witnesses brought to contradict it, I might then have brought forward half a dozen more witnesses, as I did at the trial—I might have brought forward a number of witnesses; but if it is not denied, it is not necessary for me to do more than to have my own affidavit and the affidavit of one disinterested person deposing distinctly to the effect of the nuisance. When I say it is not denied, there is an affidavit on the part of the defendant, of Mr. Wright, which states this. After stating an attempt to let the plaintiff's house, he says, "And I say that I live near the church in the said pleadings mentioned, and within full hearing of the bells in the said pleadings also mentioned; and I say that I do not consider them any nuisance. And I say that I know from frequent communication with my neighbours that the said bells are not considered a nuisance to persons generally." And then he adds this, "And I say that the four Protestant Churches in Clapham aforesaid have and use bells which ring several times for half an hour at a time on Sundays, and twice on Wednesdays and Fridays, besides frequent ringings during the day for deaths and funerals." Now, that is the only affidavit which at all contradicts the fact of this being a nuisance. The affidavit of Mr. Weld, the priest, does not, and I think very properly, say it is not a nuisance, but he addresses himself to other matters which I shall have occasion to advert to presently. Now, what does this amount to? This is a gentleman who says, "I live near the church;" the whole question is, how near? He says, "I live within full hearing of the bells." Yes; but how near to the bells? He says that his neighbours do not consider it a nuisance. But where do those neighbours live? How near to the bells? It really comes round to what I observed upon the demurrer, that the chiming of these bells, which may be and is a great nuisance to a person living as near as the plaintiff lives, may be not only no nuisance, but an actual source of pleasurable sensations to those who are more remote. Therefore, as Mr. Wright has not thought fit to tell me how near he lives, I am left to conjecture. It may be 10 yards, 100 yards, 500 yards or 1,000 yards. Although it may be so near the church that he may hear the bells, yet he may hear them in a way which I can easily conceive would be extremely pleasurable, or, at all events, no nuisance. Then, with respect to the neighbours, we have no means of knowing who those neighbours are, or how near they live, except that they say they do not consider it a nuisance. Therefore, I consider the fact of its being a nuisance sufficiently established by the affidavits which have been made on the part of the plaintiff. But really one ought to take into consideration the actual circumstances proved, and not at all disputed, that these bells are bells of a most unusual size, varying from 4½ cwt. in weight to upwards of 9 cwt., which is the largest, varying from 2 feet 3 inches in diameter, the smallest, to 3 feet 3 inches in diameter; that these bells are placed in a steeple which is almost in front of the plaintiff's house, and within the front court-yard, now divided into two in consequence of the division of the house into two, but which was once the court-yard of the whole house when it was occupied as one house. When you consider those circumstances, it really is hardly necessary for persons to say by affidavit, that it must be an intolerable nuisance to have those large bells ringing, even for a short period of time, and even on Sundays ringing so near to the dwelling-rooms and bed-rooms of the plaintiff's house. And it is to be remembered that the plaintiff has not gone to the bells, the bells have come to the plaintiff. The bells have been put there when the plaintiff has had the enjoyment of his house for upwards of thirty years, and has still got upwards of thirty years to run of his lease.

Then I may further observe in connexion with this point, that the affidavits verify also, and this is not contradicted, the allegation in the bill as to the intention of the defendant not to confine himself to the ringing which has taken place on the 9th and 16th of November, but to ring all the bells in peals, to ring every day, to ring the chapel bell, in short to ring as often and as much as he pleased, and as he did before the trial. That is stated according to belief. The plaintiff says, "I am informed and believe that the defendant threatens and intends to do so," and there is no contradiction to that whatever. I think it is, I must say, creditable to Mr. Weld and to the defendant that they do not come forward and say "I have no intention of doing so." It is clear (and they are right in that, according to their view of their rights) they are right in saying "we do reserve to ourselves the right of ringing as much as we please, for we think the law allows us to ring," therefore it was quite proper not to come forward with an affidavit to contradict that. I must take it therefore that there is the intention, or at all events, the reservation of the right to themselves on the part of the defendant and those gentlemen who are members of this body, to ring as much as they please.

Well, then it is said that part of what is alleged by the plaintiff as the mischief arising to him is the diminution of value of his house; and it is said, and said with perfect truth, by the defendant's counsel that many cases establish the proposition beyond all controversy that mere diminution in value does not constitute and is no ground for the Court interfering. But although it is perfectly true that mere diminution of value does not per se constitute nuisance: as, for example, it is no nuisance at law to build so as to shut out from a party a most beautiful prospect which he previously enjoyed, unless the buildings actually darken his ancient lights; and although he has enjoyed a most beautiful prospect from his windows and a most offensive building is erected on another man's ground, a grievous eyesore, which shuts out that beautiful prospect and greatly diminishes the value of his house, that is not at law a nuisance; but although that be so, surely the extent of the nuisance, if it be a nuisance, may be materially shewn by this, that so great is the annoyance, that no respectable person, that is, no person who can afford to live in such a house as this, would take it with such a nuisance, and the only person who could be expected to take it would be only one who would pay a very small rent, but to whom it was an object to have a very large house at a very small sum, and who would bear with the nuisance for the sake of the smaller rent which he paid. I say in that way the diminution of value is of very great moment, not as constituting a nuisance, but as an indication of the extent to which that is in itself a nuisance.

Under those circumstances, the question I have to ask myself and that I have to determine is this, a question which I cannot do better than state in the language of Lord Justice Knight Bruce when as Vice Chancellor he determined the case of Walter v. Selfe. That was the case of the brick-field in which he granted the injunction. He says, "The important point next for decision may properly, I conceive, be thus put:—ought this inconvenience to be considered in fact as more than fanciful, or as one of mere delicacy or fastidiousness, or as an inconvenience materially interfering with the ordinary comfort, physically, of human existence, not merely according to elegant or dainty modes and habits of living, but according to plain, sober and simple notions among the English people?" That enunciates the question, I think, distinctly which is to be tried upon such an occasion as this, and I must add in the very words in which Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce goes on there—"And I am of opinion that this point is against the defendant:" that this is such an inconvenience, such an invasion of the domestic comfort and enjoyment of a man's home that he is entitled to come and ask this Court to interfere. And upon that point I would just refer to the language of Lord Eldon in the case of The Attorney General v. Nichol. He says, "the foundation of this jurisdiction, that is, interfering by injunction, is that head of mischief alluded to by Lord Hardwicke, that sort of material injury to the comfort of the existence of those who dwell in the neighbouring house, requiring the application of a power to prevent, as well as remedy, an evil for which damages more or less would be given in an action at law." That is the ground for the interference by injunction, and that is the ground upon which I conceive that I ought to grant an injunction in this case.

Before I finish I will just make an observation upon a point which was raised by the defendant, that in fact these bells are no more a nuisance than the bells of a parish church. It is said that there are four in this parish; the parish seems to have been divided into districts, and there are four parochial district churches or parish churches: they have all their bells, they ring on Sundays and they ring on Wednesdays and Fridays, and if this be a nuisance why is not that a nuisance? Or if that be not a nuisance why is this a nuisance? Now, it seems to be overlooked, that this building to which these bells are attached, although called a church, called by those who have erected it and those who use it, a church, is not in the eye of the law a church; it is no church in law, it is no more a church than the chapel or meeting-house of any denomination of Protestant Dissenters. A church in law is, that building of which there is but one in the parish, or but one in the parochial district where the parish has been divided by act of parliament. It is a building of which the freehold both of the church and the churchyard is vested in the parson of the parish, and of which there are churchwardens; to which bells are an appendage recognized by law, the special property of which bells by law is vested in the churchwardens, but for the benefit of the parishioners at large; in respect of which bells it has been held that an action will lie by a succeeding churchwarden in his official capacity against the retiring churchwarden in trover to recover the very bells, on the ground of the special property vested by law in the churchwardens, and that you must in the action lay the property as being the property of the parishioners. The law recognizes the bells as an appendage to a parish church, and by law the churchwardens are to have the custody of the belfry in which the bells are suspended and tolled. Moreover, with regard to churches, unless in special cases of churches founded by the Crown, or special cases of churches founded by act of parliament, not parish churches, they are under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of the diocese. There is but one church in each parish or in each district, which is under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of the diocese. There is but one Bishop of the diocese. Is it said that this building is under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Winchester, in whose diocese, I believe, Clapham is situate? Certainly not. It is but a chapel, it is no church, it has no privilege, it has no legal privilege of ringing bells in the same way that a parish church has the privilege of having bells or ringing bells. I do not mean in what I say in the slightest degree to intimate that it is unlawful for Roman Catholics to have bells attached to their places of worship. I avoid that question entirely, which I have hitherto avoided. But it seems to be assumed that this stands on the footing of a parish church, and therefore that it is as much privileged and entitled to have bells, whether a nuisance or not, as a parish church. For that reason I have made these observations.

Now, another observation that was made was, that there has been acquiescence here, and that, therefore, the plaintiff is not entitled to the injunction. I must say a case less of acquiescence I have seldom met with; as soon as the nuisance from the single bell on the roof of the house began, a respectful letter was addressed to the superior or superiors of this establishment, requesting that it might not be continued. That being disregarded another was sent, and it was thought better to let that be sent to Cardinal Wiseman in the hope that he might interfere; an interview was had between the solicitors, and that resulted in nothing but a statement from Mr. Harting, the solicitor for the defendant, that they could do no more than alter the hour from five to six o'clock. Mr. Soltan bore that as well as he could; but when in May last came the six bells in the tower for the first time, does he lie by? So far from it he brings his action on the 28th of June; that is diligently prosecuted; the trial is on the 13th of August, the judgment is entered up on the 10th of November in the following term, and on the 21st of November he files his bill, after having again applied, in consequence of the renewal of the ringing, to have it discontinued, and met with a refusal. Now, a case less of acquiescence I have seldom met with. It appears to me that the plaintiff has diligently asserted his rights. I think he is entitled to an injunction, but not quite in the terms in which it is asked by the notice of motion. The bill asks for an injunction to restrain the ringing of these bells altogether, or, in the alternative, to restrain the ringing of them so as to constitute a nuisance or an annoyance to the plaintiff. It appears to me that the latter form, very nearly, is the form in which the injunction ought to be granted. Therefore, I shall order an injunction to issue to restrain the defendant; and all persons acting under his direction or by his authority, from tolling or ringing the bells in the plaintiff's bill mentioned (because the prayer is confined to the said bells), or any of them, so as to occasion any nuisance, disturbance, and annoyance to the plaintiff and his family residing in the plaintiff's dwelling-house in the bill mentioned.

Mr. Malins submitted whether the terms of the injunction might not involve an uncertainty.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I am aware they must, but I may mention that I am in this respect following what was done by the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce in the case I referred to of Walter v. Selfe, the brick-field case. He issued an injunction in these terms, which no doubt is equally liable to uncertainty, that is to say, it may be questionable whether a certain degree of ringing may or may not occasion annoyance, disturbance, and nuisance to the plaintiff and his family, but the same thing will apply here. In that case he says: "let the defendant, his servants, workmen, and agents, be restrained by injunction from burning, or causing to be burnt, bricks on the defendant's strip of ground in the bill mentioned," not absolutely, but "so as to occasion damage or annoyance to the plaintiffs, or either of them, as owner or occupier of the messuage in the bill mentioned to be occupied by the plaintiff Charles Pressaly, or injury or damage to the messuage," and so forth.

Mr. Malins said he was aware that that injunction had had the effect of stopping the brick-burning altogether.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—That may be, and this may have the effect of stopping the ringing of the bells altogether. But I conceive I have no right to say, and I cannot say, that it is absolutely impossible that any one of these bells,—may not be rung so as to occasion no nuisance or annoyance to the plaintiff. It is possible: and therefore I do not think it right, to say that they shall never ring one of these bells again as long as those bells are in existence.

A testator bequeathed leasehold premises, held for lives, to trustees upon trust, out of the rents and profits respectively, to pay and perform the rents and covenants, and if they thought it advantageous, that they should endeavour to effect renewals of the subsisting leases, or any of them, as they should think proper; and if they in their discretion should think fit or expedient, but not necessarily or peremptorily, effect and keep on foot insurances on the lives of the cestuis que vie, or any of them, and should effect such insurances in such sum as in the opinion of the trustees should be sufficient to enable them whenever a life dropped to effect a renewal, and should out of the rents and profits, or by mortgage thereof, or of any part thereof, raise money sufficient to effect the renewal of the leases so often as advisable. The testator died in 1849 leaving a son and two daughters, the latter of whom had issue. He was possessed of divers leasehold estates held at different rents, for various terms of years, if certain persons should so long live. Renewals of these leases had been made, but none of them contained any clause of renewal. Upon a special case under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35,—Held, that a trust had been created, and that there was an imperative duty to renew if reasonable terms could be obtained: that they were not to sacrifice the tenants for life to the persons entitled in reversion: that they had a discretion to exercise in order to keep the estate in its present condition: that the trustees had a discretion to raise money by insuring the lives out of the rents and profits, or by mortgage, and that they were bound to exercise their discretion.

Nicholas Watts, by his will, dated the 31st of December 1845, gave to his wife Judith Watts for her life, if she should so long remain his widow, the dwelling-house and premises in which he then resided, and subject thereto, he directed that they should pass under the bequest of his leasehold estates.

The testator then bequeathed all the residue of his personal estate, except leaseholds and chattels real, to George Ferris Whidborne Mortimer and John Bradford, upon trust, to collect the same and invest the proceeds, and, subject to the payment of an annuity of 500*l.* a-year to his wife during her widowhood, they were to stand possessed of the securities and the annual produce,—as to one fourth part thereof for the benefit of the testator's son Nicholas Watts, his wife and children; and as to one other fourth part thereof, upon trust for such persons as the testator's son William John Watts should by deed or will appoint; and as to one other fourth part thereof, upon trust for such persons as the testator's daughter Lucinda Diana, the wife of John Whidborne, with the consent of her present or any future husband, during her coverture, should by deed or will appoint, so that it did not lessen the life interest of her husband; and as to the remaining one-fourth, upon trust for such persons as the testator's daughter, Judith Elizabeth, the wife of Robert Moir, should by deed or will appoint, so that it did not lessen the life interest of her husband. And, in default of any appointment, upon trust for the separate use of J. E. Moir for life, and after her decease, upon trust for Robert Moir for life, and after the decease of both, then subject to any appointment either by deed or will, and to any provision which J. E. Moir might make for a future husband, upon trusts for the benefit of her children who should survive her, and being male should attain twenty-one, or die under that age leaving issue, or being females should attain twenty-one, or marry, and of the issue who should survive her, and attain twenty-one, of children of hers, who should die before her; but in case no child of the testator's said daughter or no such issue of any child should attain a vested interest in the stocks and securities under the trusts, then as to the said one-fourth upon trust for the person or persons who, at the time of the failure of such children and issue, should be her next-of-kin according to the Statute of Distributions.

And the testator devised all his freehold estates to G. F. W. Mortimer and J. Bradford and their heirs,—as to one fourth part thereof to certain uses in favour of his son N. Watts, and of his son's children and issue, which were revoked by a subsequent codicil. And as to one other fourth part thereof to the use of William John Watts for life, without impeachment of waste, and after his decease, subject to any jointure he might limit for any woman he might marry, to the use of all and every the child and children, or such one or more exclusively, of W. J. Watts, or the issue of any such child or children, as W. J. Watts should appoint, and in default of such appointment, or so far as the same should not extend, to the use of all and every the child and children of the said W. J. Watts, their heirs and assigns, as tenants in common, but in default of any such child, children, or issue, the one fourth part of the freehold estates were to stand limited to the use of W. J. Watts, his heirs and assigns. And as to one other fourth part of the freehold estates to the use of G. F. W. Mortimer and J. Bradford and their heirs during the life of the testator's daughter Lucinda Diana Whidborne, without impeachment of waste, upon trust to pay the rents and profits as they became due to such persons as she by writing should appoint, and in default thereof, unto her for her separate use, with remainder to her husband for life, and after the decease of both of them, but subject to any provision his daughter might make out of the rents for any future husband, to the use of all and every or such one or more exclusively of the child and children of Lucinda Diana Whidborne, whether by her present or any future husband, or the issue of any such child or children as she should appoint, and in default thereof to the use of all and every the child and children of L. D. Whidborne, their heirs and assigns, as tenants in common, but in default of any such child, children, or issue, to such uses within the law of perpetuities as L. D. Whidborne, should appoint, with remainder to the use of L. D. Whidborne, her heirs and assigns; and as to the remaining one-fourth of the freehold estate to the use of G. F. W. Mortimer and J. Bradford and their heirs, upon trusts for the benefit of Judith Elizabeth Moir, her husband Robert Moir, and her children, in terms precisely similar to those limited for L. D. Whidborne, her husband and children.

 "I give and bequeath all my leasehold and chattels, messuages, &c., whatsoever and wheresoever, including any messuages, &c., which I may hold or be entitled to under any lease for lives absolute unto G. F. W. Mortimer and J. Bradford, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, according to the nature and quality thereof respectively, for the respective estates and interests which I shall have therein at the time of my decease, upon trust that the said G. F. W. Mortimer and J. Bradford, and the survivor of them, and the heirs, executors, administrators or assigns of such survivor, do and shall, out of the rents and profits of the messuages, &c., respectively pay and perform the rents and covenants of and relating to the said tenements respectively which shall be subsisting at the time of my decease, or which shall be reserved or contained in any renewed lease of any of the said tenements, &c., and which from time to time ought to be paid, observed, and performed on the part of the lessees; and upon trust, if they the said trustees or trustee for the time being shall think it proper or advantageous as to any of the said tenements, &c. which are customarily or may be renewed, that the said trustees or trustee for the time being shall or lawfully may endeavour to effect renewals of the subsisting leases of the said tenements, &c. or any of them upon such terms as they shall think proper" so that the said premises may, during the continuance of the trusts of this my will so far as the circumstances of the case will admit be respectively held for three lives, for a long term determinable on three lives, or for twenty-one years absolute according to the usual terms of renewal, "and in order thereto do and shall if they or he in their or his discretion think fit or expedient, but not necessarily or peremptorily, effect and keep on foot insurances on the lives of the respective cestuis que vie or any of them named in such of the subsisting leases for the time being of the said tenements, &c. or any of such leases as shall be held on lives or years determinable on lives or on the lives of such of the cestuis que vie as shall be insurable at reasonable premiums, and shall or may effect such insurances in such sum as in the opinion of the said trustees or trustee for the time being, shall be sufficient to enable them or him, whenever such life shall drop or fail, to effect a renewal of the subsisting lease in which the life insured shall have been named a cestui que vie, and do and shall apply the money to be obtained or received on the insurance of such life or lives as aforesaid in effecting a renewal of the subsisting lease in which such life or lives shall have been named a cestui que vie if such renewals can be effected on such reasonable terms as the said trustees or trustee shall approve," and shall pay the surplus of such money, or the whole thereof if such renewal cannot be effected, to the person or persons who, under the trusts hereinafter declared or referred to, shall, for the time being, be in the possession of the said leasehold tenements, &c., or beneficially entitled to the rents and profits thereof, "and shall or may, out of the rents and profits of the said leasehold premises respectively, or by mortgage thereof or of any part thereof, raise money sufficient to effect the renewal of any of the subsisting leases of the said tenements, &c. for the time being when and so often as a renewal shall be advisable, and if, from not insuring, or from the insufficiency of the money arising from any such insurance, or from any other cause, there shall be no funds or insufficient funds for the purpose, then do and shall apply the money to be raised in or towards effecting such renewal or renewals accordingly;" and for the purpose of effecting such renewal or renewals aforesaid, the trustees were empowered to surrender the subsisting leases and accept new leases to be held upon such trusts as would nearest correspond with the uses and trusts expressed and declared of the freehold manor, messuages, &c. The will also contained a power for Nicholas Watts and W. J. Watts to jointure any women they might marry, and to create terms of years to secure payment, and it appointed G. F. W. Mortimer and J. Bradford executors.

On the 19th of August 1846 the testator, by a codicil, appointed William Miskin a trustee, devisee in trust, and executor of his will.

On the 22nd of May 1848 the testator, by another codicil, recited that his son Nicholas was dead, leaving N. Watts, an only child, an infant, and revoked the trusts and limitations in his will concerning the fourth part of his personal estate, the one-fourth of his freehold estates, and the one-fourth part of his leasehold estates, &c. held for lives absolute, in favour of his said son Nicholas and his children and issue, and directed "first, that the trustees of his will should receive and take the annual produce, rents and profits arising from the one-fourth of his personal, freehold, chattel real, and lifehold estates respectively as the same should become due, and invest the net amount thereof and the resulting income arising therefrom respectively in the stocks or funds of Great Britain until the said grandson should attain his age of twenty-five years, or die under that age, so that the same should during that period, or until that event, be accumulated in the nature of compound interest," and stand possessed of the one-fourth of his personal estate, and the investment upon trust in case his grandson should live to attain the age of twenty-five years, then and from thenceforth to pay the annual produce and income thereof respectively unto his grandson for life, and after his decease to stand possessed of the one-fourth of his personal estate with the sum of the accumulations, upon trust for the children or child or other issue of his grandson (such other issue being born in the lifetime of his grandson), as his grandson, after he should have attained his age of twenty-five years, should appoint; and in default of such appointment upon trust for the children and remote issue of his grandson; but in case his said grandson should die under the age of twenty-five without leaving any child surviving him, and so also in case no issue of any child of his grandson should attain a vested interest in the accumulations under the trusts or powers thereinbefore contained, the trustees were to stand possessed thereof in three equal parts upon the trusts declared in his will of the other three-fourth parts of his personal estate. And as concerning the one-fourth of the real estate being freehold he declared, subject to the trust for accumulation, that his trustees should stand seised thereof to the use of his grandson N. Watts for life without impeachment for waste, and after his decease to the use of the child and children of his grandson, or the issue of any such child or children as his grandson, after he should attain twenty-five, should appoint, and in default of such appointment to the use of all and every the child and children of his grandson, their heirs and assigns, as tenants in common; but if all and every the child and children of his grandson should die in his lifetime without leaving lawful issue living at the decease of his grandson, or if any such child and children of his grandson should survive him, and being sons, should all die under the age of twenty-one years, and without leaving lawful issue living at his or their deaths, or being surviving daughters they should all die under twenty-one, without having been married, then the one-fourth of the real estates, in three equal parts, was to stand limited to the uses declared in his will concerning the three other fourth parts. And as concerning the one-fourth of all his leasehold and chattel real estates devised by his will the testator declared that, subject to the trusts for the payment of rents, performance of covenants in the leases thereof respectively reserved and contained and renewal of leases of the same respectively, and also subject to the trusts or directions for the accumulations of the surplus rents, the trustees of his will were to stand possessed thereof during the continuance of the leases for which the same should be held, either at the time of his decease or by virtue of such renewals as aforesaid, upon such trusts as would best and nearest correspond with the uses declared of the one-fourth of his real estates. It was also declared that the trustees might in their discretion until his grandson should attain twenty-five, if he and his mother should so long live, pay out of the income and rents directed to be accumulated the annual sum of 200*l.* for the maintenance of his grandson.

The testator died the 3rd of May 1849, and his will was proved by G. F. W. Mortimer and William Miskin only, John Bradford having renounced and disclaimed the devises and trusts. The parties interested in the reversion of the one fourth part of the testator's personal estate in case his grandson should die without any child, children or issue, released all claim to it.

The testator's son W. J. Watts had never been married. Lucinda D. Whidborne had an only child a daughter, an infant, and Judith E. Moir had an only child a son, an infant, but neither of them had executed the powers of appointment given by the testator's will in favour of their respective children. The testator's grandson N. Watts was still an infant.

The testator was possessed of divers leasehold estates held at different rents for various terms of years if certain persons therein severally mentioned should so long live, these leases had been several times renewed, but none of them contained any clause binding the lessors to renew, but it had been the ordinary practice, upon its being applied for, to renew the leases, by granting from time to time, when a life dropped, a reversionary term determinable on the failure of another life, so as to make the current lives three in number. It appeared that the lessors by a re-settlement of the estates were prevented from renewing the leases of lands containing more than two acres. It was believed that the lives on which the existing leases depended were insurable, and the personal estate of the testator was supposed to be ample for the payment of debts, &c.

The questions for the consideration of the Court related to the duties of the trustees of the testator's will with reference to the renewal of the leases for years, determinable upon lives, which formed part of the testator's estate, and were, first, whether the trustees were bound to renew them, or any, and which of them, from time to time, when a life dropped, supposing them to be able to obtain renewals on terms not disadvantageous to the testator's estate, and whether they might exercise an absolute discretion as to the making or not making such renewals. Secondly, whether they were bound to take any, and if any what, particular means of raising or procuring, by way of insurance or otherwise, out of the present rents and profits, a fund to meet the expenses of such renewals when the occasion for them should arise.

Mr. Russell, for the defendants Judith Watts, William J. Watts, Mr. and Mrs. William

Whidborne, and Mr. and Mrs. Robert Moir.—The question is, whether the trustees have or have not a discretion to exercise; they could not compel the lessor to enter into any contract binding him to renew; this property must, therefore, be considered as leaseholds in their ordinary state, given to tenants for life, with remainder to other parties, if anything of the term remained. It is, from the whole tenour of the will, clear that the discretion was given to the trustees, as it must be placed somewhere, but that no trust was created beyond the existing leases, unless the trustees thought fit to renew.

Mr. Freeling, for the infant children of Mr. and Mrs. Whidborne and Mr. and Mrs. Moir.—The trustees are bound to renew the leases if they can do so upon terms not disadvantageous to the testator's estate. They cannot exercise an arbitrary and uncontrolled discretion, and cannot refuse an advantageous renewal; and assuming that a renewal would clearly be a benefit to the estate, cannot the Court, notwithstanding the words of discretion in the will, compel the trustees to renew? In Lord Milsington v. Earl Mulgrave (1) it was held upon demurrer that trustees, to whom a discretion was given of renewing leases, had not an arbitrary power of renewal, but must renew when most for the benefit of the cestui que trust.

Mr. Shapter, for the testator's grandson, Nicholas Watts.—If the testator contemplated the continuance of the estate for the benefit of all persons interested under his will, then though it may confer discretionary powers upon the trustees, the Court will consider the intention, as the general purpose contemplated by the will, and will compel them to renew if it is possible, and support the trusts, and carry out the intention of the testator. A discretionary power was given by will to trustees to invest a fund in real or personal estate; it was to be collected from the whole will that it was to be invested in real estate, and though it was never invested, the Court considered that it was to be regarded as real estate—Cowley v.

Haristonge (2). The Court, therefore, controuls the discretion given to the trustees in favour of the general intentions of the testator—Sug. on Real Property, 462. In Fordyce v. Bridges (3) a testator directed his trustees to invest his personal estate on lands in England or Scotland; the limitations of which were to be different. Lord Langdale considered this to be a discretion of such a nature that the Court could not execute it; but nothing finally turned upon this point, as upon appeal the Lord Chancellor considered that there had been a cesser of the discretionary power, and that it was incapable of being exercised, so that the uninvested fund became divisible in equal moieties between the two objects. Upon a settlement of personal estate by the father of a wife in trust for her for life, with remainder to her children equally, as tenants in common, and in default of a child attaining a vested interest in trust for the husband, with a discretion that after the wife's death the trustees should apply this income at their discretion for the maintenance and education of the children during their minorities, the Court considered that it had a right to interfere and controul the trustees, and it held after the wife's death that the husband was entitled to require that the income should be applied for the maintenance and education of the children, though he was himself able to maintain and educate them—Stocken v. Stocken (4), Prendergast v. Prendergast (5), Costabadie v. Costabadie (6), O'Reilly v. Alderson (7). The testator intended to benefit parties beyond the life estates; he contemplated that the children would succeed to the property; all that he did was to leave the mode of renewal optional. The renewal itself was intended to be imperative. Any accumulations for renewal must be precarious, but the burthens, however that might be done, ought to be equal, and proportionate sums of money ought to be set apart for that purpose. In Greenwood v. Evans (8) and Earl of Shaftesbury v. the Duke of Marlborough (9) the Court, by consent of parties, sanctioned a reference to the Master to ascertain whether it would be for the benefit of all parties that the fines for renewal should be provided for by insuring the lives of the cestuis que vie—Reeves v. Creswick (10).

Mr. Roupell, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The question in this case arises upon the construction of a clause in the will of the testator, empowering the trustees to renew certain leaseholds. I reserved my judgment, merely for the desire I had to read the clause in the will, which is somewhat long and complicated, not because I thought that any real difficulty arises upon the construction of the clause. The question is, whether the clause gives a mere discretionary power to the trustees to renew the leaseholds, or whether, in fact, it imposes a trust upon them, which the Court would execute if they did not. Now, I am of opinion that it imposes a trust upon them; and I will state the reasons why I have come to that conclusion. There is a distinction, familiar to all persons practising in courts of equity, between a mere discretionary power in trustees and a trust to be executed by them, though it may sometimes assume the shape of a power. Where there is a mere discretion in trustees to be executed simply as they think fit, this Court will not interfere with their discretion. If the trustees do not themselves execute the trust, the Court will not execute it in their place. But the only difficulty has arisen from the circumstance that the clause is in its form discretionary, and the reason for this is obvious. It is, I apprehend, the custom of conveyancers, when the testator directs that leasehold estates for lives, which are renewable, shall be renewed by the trustees, not to make it compulsory upon the trustees to renew, but to give them a discretion in the matter to do it upon such terms as they shall think fit; for unless the testator or the framer of the instrument was to adopt that course, the effect would be, that it would be placing the estate, and the persons interested in the estate, in the power of the lessor to ask for such terms as he might think fit.

Now, bearing that in mind, we come to the words of the first clause. I pause here to point out what appears to me to be the object, which I have before referred to, of giving the discretion to the trustees. If it had been compulsory to the trustees to renew, if they could by possibility have obtained a renewal, it would have compelled them to pay any sum, or at least any reasonable sum, which the lessor might have demanded. Upon that subject it appears to me that the testator, giving them a discretion in the matter, gives them a discretion as to the terms; and I shall point out presently in what way I think that discretion ought to be exercised; and the trust is of importance when compared with other words of the instrument. It is upon trust that they shall, if they think proper, renew and endeavour to effect renewals, "upon such terms as they shall think proper;" which means, that it is their duty, provided they can get fit and reasonable terms, to renew the leaseholds; and then it goes on in this way: "So that,"—now this is the object for which that renewal is to be effected,—"So that the said premises may, during the continuance of the trusts of this my will, so far as the circumstances of the case will admit, be respectively held for three lives, or for a long term determinable on three lives, or for twenty-one years absolute, or according to the usual terms of renewal." That is the object for which it is to be done; and it is an expression which is frequently found, that they are to do so for the benefit of the estate, that is, for the benefit of all persons interested in the estate, in the same manner as the person would do it if he were the owner in fee simple of the estate; and the manner in which the Court would execute a trust of this description, if the trustee were unable or refused to execute it, would be, that it would refer it to the Master to know whether it was for the benefit of all persons interested, supposing them to be under disabilities and not consenting in the matter, whether it was for the interest of all persons interested in the estate that these renewals should be effected. It is evident that the trustees are not to sacrifice the tenants for life to the persons interested in the reversion, but that they are to exercise their discretion in such manner as they consider most beneficial for keeping the estate in its present condition. That will answer the first question, which is, whether the trustees are bound to renew the leaseholds or any or which of them, supposing them to be unable to renew some of them in consequence of its being disadvantageous to the testator's estate, and that is to say, that they have not a mere discretionary power to renew upon their arbitrary will and pleasure. The power given by the testator is this: it is an absolute trust to exercise their discretion; and then, if in their discretion they should think it desirable to effect such renewals, they are bound to do so.

The second question is, whether they are bound to take any means, by insurance or mortgage of the leasehold premises or out of the present rents and profits, to meet the expense of such renewals when the occasion for them shall arise. The latter part of this clause confirms the observations that I have made with respect to the clause primarily, namely, that it is imperative upon them to exercise the discretion given them to renew. I think that the same discretion applies to them for the purpose of raising the monies either by insurances of lives or in such manner as is pointed out by this clause, as they shall think most advisable at the time; that it is their duty to exercise that discretion, and if it cannot be done without great injury to the estate, then it would not be necessary that such insurances should be effected and such money should be raised, but that they must exercise in this matter that discretion for the purpose of obtaining the money in the shape or in the manner most beneficial to all parties concerned. This latter part of the clause it is not necessary for me more particularly to refer to. I foresee that some difficulty may arise as to the payment of the surplus, but no question now arises upon that. The second question depends very much upon the first, and this is a discretion which is to be exercised.

Mr. Roupell.—That clause also gives a power of sale and mortgage for that purpose. There seem to be three trusts in the trustees, to raise the money either by insurance, mortgage, or sale, and that would give a trust to exercise the discretion in any of those modes.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—In any of those modes which they may consider most beneficial, always considering that the main object is, as far as possible, to keep the estate in the condition that it was when the testator left it. That is the primary consideration (11).

Devise—Mortgage—Legal Estate.

A devise (since the Wills Act) by mortgagee in fee of (inter alia) the residue of his real property and securities, &c., after payment of his debts, &c., to residuary devisee for her own use and benefit, held to comprise the legal estate of mortgaged property of gavelkind tenure.

This was a petition under the Trustee Act 1850 for a vesting order in the executor of a deceased mortgagee of two undivided third parts of the legal estate of the mortgaged property. The petition was presented by the mortgagors and the executor of the mortgagee in fee of gavelkind lands. It stated inter alia that the mortgagee died in March 1851; by his will of November 1850, he devised all the residue of his estate, personal and real property, monies, securities, and all other his effects which should remain after paying his just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, unto his wife for her sole use and benefit; that he left three sons, two of whom were infants, his co-heirs in gavel-kind; and that the petitioners were desirous that the two undivided third parts of the legal estate in the mortgaged premises which had descended to the two infants might be vested in the executor of the mortgagee to enable him and the adult co-heir to convey such legal estate for the purposes mentioned in the petition.

Mr. Jessel, for the petition, submitted that the legal estate in the mortgaged premises did not pass by the residuary devise in the will of the mortgagee, and that it was now vested in his co-heirs in gavelkind. He cited Silvester v. Jarman (1).

TURNER, V.C. held, that the devise passed the legal estate, and that it did not vest in the mortgagee's co-heirs, and therefore declined to make any order on the petition.

Creditors' Suit—Reference to the Master—Decree—Stay of Proceedings.

A creditors' suit coming on for further directions, the fund applicable to the payment of the debts being small, a reference back to the Master to apportion it between the creditors was dispensed with, and the apportionment directed to be made by affidavit.

A creditor, who had brought an action against the executor of a debtor, received notice of a decree for the administration of his estates. After this notice, and before any application was made to stay his proceedings, he went on with the action, and obtained judgment:—Held, that he was entitled to the costs of his proceedings after notice of the decree.

This was a creditors' suit which came on for further directions.

Mr. Selwyn, for the plaintiff.

Mr. Hardy, for the other parties, stated that there were forty-two creditors, many of whose debts were for a small amount, and that the fund applicable to the payment of the debts was small; and asked that, in order to save expense, the usual reference back to the Master to apportion the fund between the creditors might be dispensed with, and that the proportions payable to the creditors might be verified by affidavit. He also asked that the amount payable to creditors whose shares should be under 10*l.* might be paid to the plaintiff's solicitor.

PARKER, V.C. said that, as the office of the Master was merely ministerial, and, taking into consideration the 28th section of Sir George Turner's Act (1), by which the Court was empowered to receive proofs by affidavit, he thought that the application might be granted. The decree would be that the costs should be taxed and paid, and that the amount payable for debts should be ascertained, and that this sum should be apportioned by the affidavit of the plaintiff and the executor, and that the Accountant General should be ordered to pay the amounts appearing by this affidavit, and that the amount payable to creditors whose shares should be less than 10*l.* should be paid to the plaintiff's solicitor, he undertaking duly to apply it.

In the same case a creditor had brought an action against the executor. Before he had obtained judgment he received notice of the decree in this suit, but no application was made to stay his proceeding in the action. After the notice he proceeded to obtain judgment.

Mr. Hardy (with the consent of all parties) submitted the question to the Court, whether the creditor, proceeding after notice of the decree, was entitled to the costs of his proceedings after notice of the decree.

PARKER, V.C. said that, no application having been made to stay the creditor, who went on with his action, he thought that the creditor had a right to do what he could for himself, and was entitled to the costs in question.

Dec. 4. } MOORHOUSE v. COLVIN.

Contract—Marriage Portion—Letters—Reference to Will—Promise—Evidence.

P. C. while in India made his will, leaving his daughter, who was born there, a lac of rupees. Upon the completion of her education, P. C, who had returned to England, sent her back to India, and on that occasion he wrote to a particular friend, to whose guardianship and charge he confided her, "In regard to her settlement in life I shall be naturally anxious." "You may assure the young gentleman she may choose that, on his marriage with her, he shall have 2,000l. sterling; nor will that be all; she is and shall be noticed in my will, but to what further amount I cannot say, owing to the present reduced, and reducing, state of interest, which puts it out of my power to determine at present what I may have to dispose of." H. M. having made proposals of marriage, was informed of the letter written by P. C, and also of the will he had made, and after some negotiations the marriage was solemnized in 1826, and in 1829 H. M. and his wife returned to England. In the same year P. C, who was a domiciled Scotchman, executed, in Edinburgh, another will, by which he gave all his real and personal property for the benefit of his wife and his two sons by her, and, in case of their dying without issue, he gave the whole to the issue of his daughter. P. C. died in 1831, without having made any provision for his daughter, leaving the will made by him in India in the state it was when he executed it; and upon a bill filed by his daughter, insisting that the testator had contracted to settle a lac of rupees upon her, and that the contract was contained in the letter written by him,—Held, that, in construing contracts, the Court must ascertain the real meaning of the words used; that when no definite or specific sum was mentioned or referred to, the Court cannot enforce any contract; that the testator had not afforded means of reference to any other document; that except from the answer of H. M. there was no evidence that he married on the faith and belief that a lac of rupees would be settled; and that it was not evidence to be acted upon in favour of the plaintiff against the estate of the testator, as previous to marriage it had been pointed out to H. M. that the letter did not state any precise sum; and that the testator had left himself unfettered by any contract: and the bill was dismissed, but without costs.

This suit was instituted by Susan Moorhouse, by her next friend, to obtain a declaration that her father Peter Cochrane was under a contract or agreement to bequeath to her by his will the sum of one lac of rupees, or 12,500l. sterling, to be settled upon the trusts of a settlement, dated the 19th of September 1826, and that the contract was contained in a letter written by P. Cochrane, and dated the 6th of July 1825. It also asked that the same might be declared to be a debt, and payable with interest out of the assets of the testator.

Peter Cochrane, a native of Scotland, was appointed a medical officer in the service of the East India Company, and resided in the East Indies from 1775 to about 1818.

Until about 1807 Ferukabad was an independent Indian state subject to Mohammedan laws, and was governed by its own native prince or rajah, and was not a British possession, or subject to English laws: and in 1800 while residing there Peter Cochrane contracted a marriage according to the Mohammedan laws with Beebe Peary Beegum, otherwise Beebe Raheem, a native of the East Indies.

The plaintiff, a child of that marriage, was born at Cawnpore on the 17th of December 1807: she always went by the name of Susan Cochrane, and both before and after 1813, Peter Cochrane told the plaintiff's mother and Alexander Colvin, of the firm of Colvin, Bazett & Co. of Calcutta, who were his agents, and William Thomas, the elder, that he intended to provide for her either by settling upon, or giving to her a lac of rupees.

In November 1808, P. Cochrane, being then in the East Indies, solemnized a marriage in the European form with Margaret Douglas Fearon, by whom he had issue two sons.

In 1813, Peter Cochrane sent the plaintiff to England to be educated, and she remained at school there until P. Cochrane in 1822 took her to Scotland, where, when not at school, she resided at his house.

In December 1818, Peter Cochrane contemplated retirement from the service of the East India Company, and while at Fort William, Bengal, he, on the 8th of December 1818, made a will, which, among several bequests, gave "to Miss Susan Cochrane, now at boarding school Brunswick Square, London, the sum of one lac of Sicca rupees, or 12,500*l.* sterling, clear of the legacy tax, which must be paid separately." The testator in another paragraph said "To Mrs. Cochrane, I could say nothing that would heighten her affections, or augment her attentions to her own children, but there is another, in whose welfare and prosperity I feel deeply interested, this is the little girl Susan Cochrane, mentioned in the second paragraph. To Mrs. Cochrane, therefore, I most earnestly recommend her, and conjure her to indulge the benevolent propensities of her nature in fostering the seeds of virtue and morality in this unprotected child; with a legacy of 12,500*l.* she need be a burthen to none, yet what would be the value of this without corresponding qualities and accomplishments? These can only be acquired by a liberal and well-conducted education. To Mrs. Cochrane, therefore, as a competent judge, I confidently commit the direction of her education, and, inspired by her precept and example, I doubt not but that she will acquire some of the many refinements and accomplishments, which render her so truly amiable, and which give her an enviable distinction in society. In music, vocal and instrumental, and drawing, and the more showy and ornamental branches of education, she must be made to excel, if possible; these are not, however, to be regarded as the principal; the study and knowledge of letters, I consider, of still greater importance, as thereby her understanding will be enlightened, her taste refined, and her morals strengthened and improved. As her fortune will be eligible, I would have her accomplishments to correspond, as nothing is so ridiculously contemptible as opulence allied with meanness, vulgarity or ignorance. Let such pains, therefore, be bestowed in teaching her to write, read, and speak with ease, fluency and grace, and with eloquence if attainable. Thus accomplished, though her fortune will still be an object of prime acquisition with the covetous or needy adventurer, yet the man of honour and intelligence (and such, I hope, will ever meet her approbation) will draw the line of distinction, and prize her most for the superior excellence of her personal and mental endowments." If she should live to be married, the testator directed that her fortune might be settled on herself and her children. He also appointed executors, and earnestly recommended the little girl, Susan Cochrane, to their friendly protection.

This will was duly executed in duplicate, one of which was found uncanceled and undefaced among his papers after his death, except that in the paragraph bequeathing the lac of rupees the words "Miss Susan Cochrane" was struck through, and immediately above them, in the handwriting of the testator, the words "now Mrs. Moorhouse" were written. The other duplicate was left with his agents in India, and was in the same state as when executed.

The testator arrived in England in 1819, and soon after took up his residence in Scotland; and while there he caused another will to be prepared, which, however, he never executed, and by this he gave the plaintiff a lac of rupees. In 1825 he, with a view to her settlement in life, sent the plaintiff back to India, and placed her under the guardianship of William Thomas the elder, who was his intimate and confidential friend.

On the 6th of July 1825, Peter Cochrane wrote to Mr. Thomas, saying that, "Susan will be consigned to Sandy Colvin's care in the first instance. I shall advertise him of her approach, and instruct him to take the necessary measures to have her brought up from the vessel to Calcutta on the arrival of the ship, or before you can communicate with him in respect to bringing her up to Barrackpore, and other matters concerning her. I think the monthly sum of 150 rupees will be sufficient to cover all expenses, and that sum I shall instruct Sandy to pay her. You or Mrs. Thomas will, of course, direct the disbursement of it, and if upon any extraordinary occasion you should deem a little more necessary, I shall not object to it according to your discretion; but you must, in all instances, and uniformly, enjoin her the most rigid economy, as she is young and, like most girls, ignorant of the value of money, and if left to her own bias would rather spend a thousand than a hundred. In regard to her settlement in life, I shall be naturally anxious to have her allied to a young man, always preferring the Company's service, without absolutely objecting to one of another class in other respects eligible, of character and conduct, of which I constitute you the proper judge, and shall enjoin her to pay due deference to your decrees. She is very accomplished, but to every young man that alone may not be a sufficient motive; you may then assure the young gentleman who may meet with your and Mrs. Thomas's approbation, that on his marriage with her he shall have 2,000*l.* sterling; nor will that be all; she is and shall be noticed in my will, but to what further amount I cannot say, owing to the present reduced and reducing state of interest, which puts it out of my power to determine at present what I may have to dispose of. I hope, however, that he will have no objection to admit of the 2,000*l.* and whatsoever else may follow being settled on herself and children; should she die before him without issue, he shall have the 2,000*l.* to himself. These conditions, I think, Thomas, are such that, coupled with the hand of a young, comely, and accomplished girl, a young man of respectability need not turn up his nose at."

Susan Cochrane arrived in India at the latter end of 1825, and as William Thomas the elder was upon service in the Burmah country, a considerable distance from Calcutta and Barrackpore, she was received by his son, William Thomas the younger, a lieutenant in the 13th regiment of infantry.

Henry Moorhouse was an ensign in the same regiment, and being upon terms of intimacy with William Thomas the younger, he was introduced to the plaintiff. He made known his attachment to the plaintiff, but considered it imprudent to contract a marriage, as neither of them had any fortune. W. Thomas the younger immediately informed Mr. Moorhouse of the letter of the 6th of July 1825, and of the provision made by the will in 1818, the amount of which Peter Cochrane had himself made known to William Thomas the younger;

he also informed his father of what he had done. Mr. Moorhouse, at the same time, wrote to William Thomas the elder, who was then at Calcutta, and referred him to Mr. Winter, who was a barrister practising there; and in a conversation between them, which Mr. Thomas afterwards communicated to Mr. Moorhouse, he told Mr. Winter that Miss Cochrane had no settled fortune, but that she was, with her father's other children, noticed and provided for in his will, but the amount was uncertain, owing to the state of the funds; but that Mr. Cochrane was possessed of considerable wealth, and that he had every reason to believe that Miss Cochrane's share of his property would not be inconsiderable. Mr. Winter subsequently informed Mr. Moorhouse that the letter did not state the amount of any future sum.

Some further negotiations were carried on, a notarial copy of the letter of the 6th of July 1825 was made and given to Henry Moorhouse, who also, on the 29th of September 1826, executed a settlement of whatever fortune his intended wife might be or become entitled to, for the benefit of herself and children, with remainder, in default of children, for the survivor of them, the said H. Moorhouse and Susan Cochrane.

On the 29th of September 1826 the marriage was duly solemnized, and upon the information being forwarded to Peter Cochrane, he approved of all that had been done.

Mr. and Mrs. Moorhouse returned to England in 1829, and were received by the testator, who expressed the warmest interest in their welfare.

On the 15th of October 1829 Peter Cochrane, who was a domiciled Scotchman, made his will in Edinburgh, and gave the whole of his property, real and personal, for the benefit of Margaret Douglas Cochrane and her two sons, and in case of their dying without issue, he gave it to the issue of the plaintiff, and appointed M. D. Cochrane, D. Colvin, and J. Colvin, and the senior partner for the time being of the firm of Colvin & Co., his executors.

The testator died on the 18th of June 1831, without having made any provision, by his will or otherwise, in favour of the plaintiff, and the executors having died, Alexander Colvin, as the senior partner of the firm of Colvin & Co., became the executor, and proved the will.

The testator's two sons survived their mother, M. D. Cochrane, and died under the age of twenty-five, without having been married.

The plaintiff also had no children living at the death of the testator, and had not had any since. And the question now was, whether his estate was liable to pay the lac of rupees to the plaintiff.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Toller, for the plaintiff.—The testator, the father of the plaintiff, had brought up his daughter with expectancies, which, while in India, he promulgated, and on leaving India he had solemnly carried out his intention by a will, and left her a lac of rupees, or 12,500*l.* What he intended to do, and what he had done was well known both to his agents and to his intimate and confidential friend, both of whom, it was natural to suppose, would act upon their instructions, and also upon the knowledge they possessed from communication with the plaintiff; to each of these gentlemen the testator had communicated his intention to leave the plaintiff a lac of rupees, and in the letter of the 6th of July 1825, in stating what the fortune of the plaintiff would be, he not only made express mention of the sum of 2,000*l.* (which had been paid), but distinctly alluded to communications made previously, but said that would not be all, and at the same time referred to the will he had executed, and which was found perfect at his death, with the name of Mrs. Moorhouse inserted instead of her maiden name; when this was inserted did not appear, but by a will, dated the 15th of October 1829, the testator had left all his property, both real and personal, to the wife and children of the second marriage. The marriage, however, of Mr. Moorhouse had been solemnized upon the faith of the letter of the 6th of July 1825, as well as upon the information given to him by the chosen guardian of the plaintiff and the agents of the testator; they acted upon the letter; they also made known the will, the contents of which was thereby imported into the agreement, and formed the contract upon which the marriage was solemnized. It did not, however, appear that the testator had specifically carried out the contract, neither had he made any provision for the plaintiff or her husband, but the agreement made had become a debt due from the testator, which, as valuable consideration had been paid for it, would be enforced by this Court against his estate.

De Beil v. Thomson, 3 Beav. 469; on appeal, 12 Cl. & F. 45.

Swift v. Grazebrook, 12 Jur. 87.

Mr. James, for Henry Moorhouse, the plaintiff's husband.—The testator, by referring to his will, had directed his agents to communicate to a suitor that part of it which gave the lac of rupees to the plaintiff; it was the same, therefore, as if it had been written in the letter, which would be construed in a manner so as to shew that by referring to it no fraud was contemplated.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. W. Morris appeared for the defendant A. Colvin, but were not heard.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I think this case is clear. The testator had a daughter, who was born in a marriage made in India, which, though it may be held to be good in India, it is doubtful whether it would be good in England; but this lady stood to all intents and purposes towards the testator in the situation of a legitimate daughter; as such he treated her and educated her exactly as he would a daughter. In the year 1818 he made a will by which he left her a lac of rupees. Subsequently there was an intention to alter this will, but still to give her the same provision. Under those circumstances, she being educated as his daughter, with all the accomplishments and instruction of a lady, she went out to India to Mr. Thomas. The testator was very desirous that she should form an eligible marriage, and on any proposal of marriage he directed Mr. Thomas to make this communication to the gentleman who might seek to contract a marriage, but no communication would bind the testator unless it was made in accordance with its directions; if, therefore, the scope of the authority was exceeded, it would not bind the testator. In his letter to Mr. Thomas, the testator said "You may assure the young gentleman who may meet with your and Mrs. Thomas's approbation, that, on his marriage with her, he shall have 2,000*l.* sterling; nor will that be all; she is, and shall be noticed in my will, but to what further amount I cannot precisely say, owing to the present reduced and reducing state of interest, which puts it out of my power to determine, at present, what I may have to dispose of. I hope, however, that he will have no objection to admit of the 2,000*l.* and whatever else may follow, being settled on herself and children; should she die before him without issue he shall have the 2,000*l.* to himself." The question I have to consider is, not whether this is a case of great hardship, which is possible, nor whether the gentleman may have married her upon the expectation and in the firm belief that there would be some additional fortune; but whether there is in this letter such a contract as this Court can enforce against him or against his estate, that is to say, against him if the contract was to take effect in his lifetime, or against his estate if it was to take effect after his decease. Considering that this gentleman was possessed of a very large fortune, that he had only two other children, it is manifest that he has made an extremely meagre provision for this young lady; but I can only deal with the question, whether this letter on a fair and reasonable construction created such a contract as will bind his assets.

It has been argued that I must look at this letter in conjunction with other circumstances and things, and it has been argued, as it was well known to Mr. Colvin, and probably to Dr. Thomas, that the testator who wrote that letter had by his will given to this lady a lac of rupees, that consequently when he stated in his letter "she is noticed in my will," it had immediate reference to that particular fact. If the letter could be read as meaning this, "He shall have 2,000*l.* sterling with her, nor will that be all; she has now by my will a lac of rupees, and she shall have that at least by any other will, but whatever 'further' I may have to give is doubtful," there would be no question at all but that it would have constituted a contract such as this Court could enforce against his assets. But being perfectly well aware of what the extent of the legacy was, he not only does not permit them to inform the intended husband of that, but he expressly warned them to tell him that the amount was uncertain, as he expressly says, "but to what further amount I cannot precisely say." Now, I have no doubt that the word "further" there applied to the 2,000*l.* sterling. Having given the 2,000*l.* sterling, he adds "nor will that be all; she is, and shall be noticed in my will:" but to hold that this means in "addition to what I have given by my first will," would be a more extravagant construction than the Court would put on words of such a description, if it were possible to distort language so as to arrive at that result. It is manifest he is speaking of a provision further and in addition to the 2,000*l.* She is noticed in my present will, to what further amount I will not say, nor can it be ascertained, because I do not know what the amount of interest will allow me to give: that is expressly pointed out. But he expressly states, "she is and shall be noticed in my will," expressing an intention therefore to vary and alter the will, or to make a fresh will for that purpose, and then he states he is about to make a will in which the further amount he means to give is altogether uncertain, and is to depend entirely on his own will and pleasure. Is it possible to read those words in the way suggested, or to read them in such a manner as to bring them within the rule laid down in Swift v. Grasebrook, and to say it is a further provision? He expressly leaves out such a provision as he in his will and pleasure shall think fit. Suppose a testator said, "I will give to my child a fit and sufficient provision," the Court would ascertain that by means of a reference to the Master to ascertain what was a fit and proper provision. But, supposing the testator had said, "I will give to my child such a provision, and such only, as I shall choose," would it be proper then for the Court, if he gave nothing, to refer it to the Master to say what he ought to have given? It is manifest the Court could not have ascertained such an amount.

In many cases of contracts the Court has treated them in a manner difficult to understand, because, on the construction of a contract, how can you construe the words differently from their import? Whether the contract is for the marriage of a daughter or a child, or whether it is a contract for the sale of an estate or for any other valuable consideration, what the Court has to ascertain is the real meaning of the words of the contract, which are always to be construed most strictly against the contracting party; and in these cases it has always been held, that if there has been nothing definite or specific mentioned with respect to the sum, a contract of this description cannot be enforced. De Beil v. Thomson was a strong case, and Sir Edward Sugden on the Laws of Real Property as administered in the House of Lords, p. 53, has expressed doubts upon the propriety of the decision. It is, however, a binding and concluding decision; but that case expressly states, "It was my intention to settle a sum of 10,000*l*." The cases with respect to ascertaining a fund are exactly the same on contracts of this description as on any other: if you can ascertain what the fund is by reference to any particular document, then of course the Court will prefer that particular sum. But what contract is there to settle or give any sum mentioned in any particular document? If he had said, "I have given her the sum which I have already mentioned in the will," that would have been a reference to a particular instrument, which would have enabled the Court to ascertain the amount; but he expressly states, "I will not be bound by such an amount; there is such an amount mentioned in such a document, but that is not to be the amount I shall give." I have no doubt upon the construction, and am of opinion that is a contract which this Court cannot enforce, however hard it may be.

It remains to consider whether Mr. Moorhouse married on the faith and upon the belief that this 12,500*l*. would be given by the will. Assuming that he did, I must say, that, except by his own answer, there is no evidence that he did, and that is evidence which, in favour of himself, this Court will not act upon against the estate of the testator. It is, however, contradicted by various circumstances, as Mr. Winter to whom the business was referred by Mr. Moorhouse, in writing a letter informing him of the nature of the communication, very accurately states the letter of the testator and expressly states that the amount was not mentioned in the letter, and from all the other evidence it appears that he did nothing more than act on mere vague belief and expectation that the testator would give him something. He trusted, no doubt to the honour of the testator, and to the belief that he would make such a provision as anybody would think proper for a daughter; but as the testator personally was not a party to the contract, and did not contract to do anything, it merely remained upon the honour of the testator, who has not thought fit to carry out the will as originally made: there is nothing by which this Court can compel him to make any provision in the absence of a contract which this Court can enforce, and I am of opinion that there is no such contract, and that the bill must be dismissed. It is a very hard case, and though against the rule I usually follow, I shall dismiss the bill without costs.

KEKEWICH v. MARKER.

Settlement, Construction of—Trusts of Term for raising Charges—Timber—Tenant for Life without Impeachment of Waste—Injunction.

*Under a deed of settlement lands were limited to the use of trustees for 1,000 years, without impeachment of waste, upon trust, by cutting and selling the timber thereon, or by demising, mortgaging, or selling the premises, to raise three sums of 10,000*l*. each; and, subject to the said term, to the use of the settlor for life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to A. B. for life, without impeachment of waste, with divers remainders over. After the death of the settlor, A. B. entered and claimed the right to cut the timber for his own use exclusively. Upon bill by the trustees, held, upon appeal, that, upon the true construction of the settlement, a discretionary power was given to the trustees to cut timber and apply the proceeds pro tanto in discharge of the* sums to be raised; and that the rights of A. B. as tenant for life without impeachment of waste, were subordinate to the discretionary power given to the trustees; and an injunction was granted to restrain A. B. from cutting timber, on the ground that his so doing would interfere with the prior right given to the trustees.

This was a motion, by the plaintiffs, Samuel T. Kekewich and J. Pulman, who were trustees of a term for raising portions, for an injunction to restrain the defendant Henry William Marker, the tenant for life of the settled estates, from cutting timber.

The Vice Chancellor Lord Cranworth having refused the motion, it was now renewed, by way of appeal, before the Lord Chancellor.

By an indenture of settlement, dated the 11th of October 1844, certain real estates of which Margaretta Marker was the owner in fee, were settled by her to the use of the plaintiffs for the term of 1,000 years, without impeachment of waste, save only the cutting and felling of ornamental timber, and, subject to the said term, to the use of the settlor for life without impeachment of waste, save as aforesaid, with remainder to the use of Henry William Marker and his assigns for life, without impeachment of waste save as aforesaid, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, with remainder to Thomas J. Marker and his assigns for life without impeachment of waste, with divers remainders over, and with an ultimate remainder to Henry William Marker, his heirs and assigns for ever. The declaration of the trusts of the term was as follows:—"Upon trust, in the first place, by cutting and felling, and selling and converting into money, all or any part or parts of the timber now standing and growing on the said lands, which is or shall be of full and ripe growth and not ornamental to the mansion at Combe aforesaid, or the pleasure grounds attached thereto, or any of the views or prospects of the same, of which timber it is hereby declared that enough of the most ornamental shall always remain to preserve the beauty of the place unimpaired, or by demising, mortgaging or selling the premises comprised in the said term, or any part or parts thereof (save and except the mansion-house at Combe aforesaid, and the several manors, &c. situate in, &c., all of which are hereby expressly reserved from sale), and for all or any part of the said term, or by all or any of the said ways and means, or any other reasonable ways and means, forthwith to levy and raise the clear sum of 10,000*l.*, and to pay the same to the said Margaretta Marker, her executors, administrators, or assigns, &c.; and in the next place from and immediately after her decease, by all or any of the ways and means aforesaid, to levy and raise two several sums of 10,000*l.* and 10,000*l.*, and to pay the first of those two several sums of 10,000*l.* each unto the said Thomas John Marker, his executors, administrators and assigns, and to pay and apply the last of the two several sums of 10,000*l.* each, to such persons and in such manner as Margaret F. Smith" (a daughter of the settlor) "shall by any writing under her hand appoint; and in default thereof unto her the said Margaret F. Smith, her executors, administrators and assigns, for her and their absolute benefit, together with interest on the two last-mentioned sums at 4*l.* per cent. per annum, from the day of the decease of the said Margaretta Marker until the full payment thereof respectively."

Margaretta Marker died, in July 1846, before the first-named sum of 10,000*l.* had been raised, having by her will appointed Henry William Marker her executor and residuary legatee. Henry William Marker entered into possession of the settled estates as tenant for life under the settlement. Previously to the filing of the present bill, timber had been cut on the settled estates to the amount in value of nearly 2,000*l.*, and the proceeds had been received by H. W. Marker; but whether as executor of his mother and in part discharge of the said sum of 10,000*l.*, or in his own right as tenant for life, did not clearly appear. Disputes having arisen between the trustees and the tenant for life as to their respective rights of cutting timber, the present bill was in December 1850 filed by the trustees, praying that it might be declared that, according to the true meaning and construction of the settlement, the plaintiffs were entitled to exercise a discretionary power as to the mode in which these several sums of 10,000*l.* should be raised, and that for the raising of the same they had a discretionary power to resort to the timber growing on the settled estates (other than ornamental timber); and that the right of the tenant for life to cut timber was subordinate to the discretionary power given to the plaintiffs; and that the defendant H. W. Marker might be restrained from cutting any such timber or selling or disposing thereof whilst the monies directed by the settlement to be raised by the plaintiffs, or any part thereof, should remain to be raised; the plaintiffs being ready and willing, and thereby offering forthwith to take all measures and proceedings necessary or proper in accordance with the trusts and discretionary power vested in them by the settlement for levying and raising the same; and that if H. W. Marker should proceed to sell any such timber before the said monies had been raised, that he might be restrained from receiving or applying to his own use the proceeds of such sale, and that the plaintiffs might be declared entitled to receive and apply the same, &c. and that H. W. Marker might be decreed to account for monies received by him on account of previous sales of timber, or which he might afterwards receive; and that, if necessary, the timber, other than ornamental timber, which the plaintiffs in the exercise of the discretionary power vested in them by the settlement, should desire to be cut for the purpose of satisfying the sums directed to be raised, might be cut and sold under the decree of the Court, and that proper directions might be given for raising the said monies, but without prejudice to the discretionary powers vested in the plaintiffs by the settlement as to the mode of raising the same.

A suit had been previously instituted (Marker v. Kekewich) by a tenant in tail in remainder, against the present plaintiffs, the trustees, insisting that the trustees were bound to resort to the timber for raising these charges before mortgaging or selling the inheritance. To this bill a demurrer was put in and allowed by Wigram, V.C. (19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 493.)

Mr. Rolit and Mr. Fooks, for the motion.—The estate of the tenant for life is subject to the term, and he takes in subordination to the exercise of the discretionary power given to the trustees, and the Court will not interfere with or exercise the discretion vested in the trustees.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Giffard, for H. W. Marker, contra. — The trustees, by their bill, do not say when they wish to cut timber, but claim to reserve the exercise of their discretionary right to some indefinite time. They are not entitled to the injunction, for the tenant for life being unimpeachable for waste is entitled to cut timber—Smythe v. Smythe (1) and Davies v. Wescomb (2); and with respect to the trustees of the term, he is in the situation of a mortgagor in possession, in which case the mortgagee cannot restrain the mortgagor from cutting timber, if the security is ample, as it is in the present case—Humphreys v. Harrison (3), Hippesley v. Spencer (4), Hampton v. Hodges (5). Secondly, the rule of equity is, that an incumbrancer shall realize his security in a manner least injurious to other parties having interests. But by applying the doctrine contended for to the ordinary form of trusts for raising portions (2 Sand. on Uses, 255), the trustees, by entering into possession of the rents and profits, might oust the tenant for life of all interest; but this the Court would not permit.

Mr. Rolit, in reply.—The answer to the last objection is, that the trusts in the present case are not in the ordinary form. To make the case of mortgagor and mortgagee analogous, you must suppose a power given to the mortgagee to raise his money either by sale or by cutting timber at his discretion; here a discretion is given to the trustees in large terms, and their discretionary power overrides the rights of the tenant for life.

June 10.—The LORD CHANCELLOR (after stating the facts of the case) proceeded as follows:—It appears from the facts of this case, that after the death of the settlor, who was first tenant for life, the defendant was let into possession, and certain timber was felled, the proceeds of which were applied in part satisfaction of the first sum of 10,000*l.*, which was to be raised during the life of the first tenant for life, and which the defendant, the present tenant for life, is entitled to as the executor of the settlor. It does not distinctly appear under what circumstances the timber was felled, but it sufficiently appears that it was done with the assent of the trustees, but whether under their direction, or under the direction of the tenant for life with their assent, is somewhat uncertain; the proceeds were applied by the defendant in part satisfaction of the first sum of 10,000*l.* It appears that not very long after this, the defendant caused an advertisement to be inserted announcing that a sale was to be had of the timber upon the estates, and in consequence of that the trustees interfered and advanced their claim, insisting that they had a prior right and discretion to fell and appropriate the timber in further discharge of the sums which were required to be raised. The defendant, however, persisted that he, in respect of the exemption from waste annexed to his tenancy for life, was entitled to fell and apply the proceeds of this timber to his own benefit. The trustees then filed their bill, and applied for an injunction. That injunction was refused, with costs, by the Vice Chancellor Lord Cranworth, and this is an appeal from that decision.

I may here mention, that before the present suit was instituted, it appears that (the same solicitor being concerned for all parties) there had been a bill filed by one of the present defendants against the present plaintiffs, upon an allegation that the present plaintiffs intended to raise a portion of the sums of money mentioned in the deed by throwing the whole burden upon the inheritance, and insisting that the plaintiffs were bound in the first instance to apply the timber in satisfaction, as far as the proceeds would extend, of the sums so to be raised, and praying for an injunction to restrain them from charging the whole of the sums upon the inheritance. That suit appears to me not to have been a very candid proceeding. It was a proceeding adopted with a view of getting the opinion of the Court as to the construction of the trusts of the term, and upon the right now asserted on the part of the plaintiffs to fell the timber, and apply the proceeds as I have stated; but instead of a bill being filed stating the real case and objects of the parties, it appears to have been supposed that some advantage would be obtained by reversing the question, and presenting the case as if the trustees were insisting that they were not bound to cut the timber at all, but were bound to throw the whole burden upon the inheritance, that being directly contrary to the truth. The case was heard, upon demurrer to the bill, before the Vice Chancellor Wigram, the question being whether the trustees were excluded from the exercise of all discretion as to the application of the timber, and were bound to throw the whole charge upon the inheritance. The judgment of the Vice Chancellor was that the trustees were not so bound, and he allowed the demurrer accordingly. In the course, however, of the judgment some expressions dropped from the Vice Chancellor which, no doubt, it was the object of the parties to elicit, consistent with the view now contended for on the part of the defendant, denoting an impression or an opinion that the tenant for life had a right to cut timber exclusive of the trustees.

The question, however, now before me is, whether or not the trustees of the term have a right to enter and cut the timber and apply the proceeds as far as they will extend (assuming, of course, that they cut fit and proper timber) in part satisfaction of the charges.

If they have that right, then I think they are entitled to the injunction; and their right depends upon the equitable construction of the power contained in the settlement, that power being exercised.

bonâ fide, and there being no special circumstances of mala fides, or any wanton or unreasonable discretion attempted to be exercised on the part of the trustees. My opinion is, that the trustees have that discretion, and that they are entitled to the injunction which is asked for, because the defendant is obviously about to do that which would operate as a destruction of the power given to the trustees, and the effect would be to deprive them of the exercise of that discretion which I think they have.

A great many cases were cited having more or less application to this case, but no one was cited, nor have I been able to find one, which arises out of a deed at all corresponding with the terms of the present deed. It has been stated in the course of the argument that the trusts of the term are expressed in the ordinary form, and I was referred to a precedent in Sanders on Uses, the form, however, of which is essentially different in all material respects from that now under discussion. The argument of the case before Lord Cranworth went also very much upon the terms of the deed being of the same import as those of various other deeds which have been the subject of decision as to the discretion of an executor.

I have taken some pains to ascertain this, and have caused various books of precedents to be searched, and procured the drafts of several of the most eminent draftsmen of the day, and I find the power is not in the usual form, but differs essentially from it.

It will be observed, that in this case the first limitation is to the use of the trustees of the term, and nothing can be more distinct and express than the terms of the trust with regard to the timber. They are, "upon trust in the first place" (the words 'in the first place' have no operation on the question, they only indicate the order in which the different sums are to be raised) "by cutting and felling, and selling and converting into money all or any part or parts of the timber now standing and growing on the said lands which is or shall be of full and ripe growth, and not ornamental to the mansion at Combe aforesaid, or the pleasure-grounds attached thereto, or any of the views or prospects of the same, of which timber it is hereby declared that enough of the most ornamental shall always remain to preserve the beauty of the place unimpaired." Nothing, therefore, can be more distinct than the effect of these words : they import very clearly an anticipation on the part of the grantor of the estate, that the power would be exercised, more particularly when it is observed that the first estate for life is to the grantor herself, and that the first 10,000*l.* is to be raised forthwith. I think, therefore, that the intention of the grantor is perfectly clear and distinct, that in her judgment there was timber fit to be cut, and that she intended that the trustees should exercise their discretion in raising by means of the timber so much as it might be able to furnish towards the sums of money which are the objects of the settlement.

Now, if I am correct in this conclusion, I apprehend that it is perfectly clear, that in the absence of special circumstances raising equitable grounds, the general rule is, that a court of equity will not interfere, to controul and limit the exercise of a discretion which the owner of an estate has thought fit to vest in grantees or trustees named by such owner. The argument on the part of the tenant for life, giving it its full effect, tends, as it appears to me, to strike out the trust altogether with regard to the felling of timber, for he contends that, under the exemption from waste which is annexed to his life estate, he is entitled to cut all the timber, and apply it as part of the ordinary profits of the estate coming to him in respect of his life estate. Whilst, however, the defendant's argument is thus calculated to strike out that part of the deed which gives to the trustees the discretion contended for, it by no means follows that that discretional power will interfere with the provision exempting the tenant for life from liability to waste.

Both provisions may stand together, for if the trustees do not think fit to exercise their discretion, the tenant for life may cut ; or, if they do cut all the timber, there will still be left a great deal for the exemption from waste to operate upon ; the tenant for life may work mines, take stones, and make considerable profits from those things which are a part of the inheritance, and which he would not be able to take without exemption.

In the course of the argument, very strong expressions were occasionally used, importing that the timber was part of the ordinary annual profits of the estate; but I apprehend that this is not so, and that the exemption from liability for waste is a special power to the tenant for life to appropriate a part of the inheritance, which standing timber of course is. If then, this tenant for life cut down many thousand pounds' worth of timber, the effect will be to relieve that portion of the inheritance from the burden of raising the sums charged. Now, the duty of the trustees is, to throw the burden of the principal upon the inheritance, and the tenant for life is to keep down the interest; but if the tenant for life may cut down the timber, which is a portion of the inheritance, to the extent contended for in this case, he gets relieved altogether from contributing to the charges in respect of that timber; and it appears to me hardly reasonable to suppose that it was intended that the tenant for life should have such power.

Having adverted to the equitable rule with regard to discretion where a discretion is found to exist, and having also adverted to the terms of this deed, which prove that the grantor intended to vest a discretion in the trustees, the question is, what are the equitable grounds on which this Court will be authorized to controul that discretion? The first point that presents itself is this: it is said, that the ordinary rule as to raising sums of money under a will or under a power will be found applicable to this case. Undoubtedly it is well settled that if trustees have a power to raise certain sums, it is their duty to charge the principal of these sums upon the inheritance, and to secure the application of the annual profits during the tenancy for life to keep down the interest. But in order to see how that rule applies to the present case, we must see what is the foundation of the rule. It is the presumed intention of the grantor. It is correctly said, that it is an irresistible presumption that a person professing to create certain estates and limiting certain interests, intends that each of the grantees of those estates or interests shall take some certain profit, and that, if any other rule were maintained, the trustees might deprive a tenant for life of all profits whatever, which could not be the intention of the grantor.

Now, it is well known that the rule with regard to how much of the burdens of a charge upon an estate the tenant for life should bear, has varied. Originally a portion of the principal was thrown on the tenant for life; that was subsequently altered; and now the tenant for life is charged only with the burden of keeping down the interest, and the capital, as I have before stated, is charged upon the inheritance; that is done upon the ground of the presumed intention of the grantor, to which I have referred, and as the best mode of carrying that intention into effect. Applying, then, that view of the rule to the present case, what am I to infer was the intention of the grantor? It seems to me that she must have contemplated the exercise, if not of the right, at least of the discretion; and that if I were to adopt the argument of the defendant, I should defeat that intention, or not carry it into effect. If, however, I allow the trustees the discretion which I have mentioned, the tenant for life will still have all the ordinary profits of the estate, with respect to all those portions of the inheritance with which the trustees may not intermeddle; and I shall thus, as it seems to me, carry into effect the intention of the settlor, both with regard to the trustees, and with regard to the tenant for life. No case was cited at the bar, and I have been able to find none at all leading to the conclusion that this Court has ever controuled the execution of an express and clear trust; and it therefore appears to me that the ordinary rule which has been referred to, instead of leading to the conclusion that the trustees in this case have not the discretion, and ought not to be allowed to exercise the discretion which they contend for, rather tends to support their claim; the foundation of the rule being a presumed intention from the use of certain language, which language differs so essentially from that used here, that a different intention is to be necessarily presumed from that presumed in those cases to which the rule has been applied.

The right of the trustees has, however, been objected to on the principle of analogy. It is said that the trustees are but incumbrancers, that they are in the like situation as mortgagees, and that a mortgagor, while in possession, may fell timber, provided he does not impair the sufficiency of the security. Now, it appears to me that that case has no analogy to the present. The parties there have entered into a contract between themselves, which has known legal consequences attached to it; the mortgagor in equity is the owner of the estate, he is in possession as such, and is allowed to exercise all the rights of ownership not diminishing the security or rendering it insufficient; the tenant for life, however, is not the owner of the estate. In the case before me the tenancy for life is subordinate to the term, the first limitation being to the use of the trustees, and every part of the deed afterwards making the tenancy for life subject and subordinate to the trusts of the term; the tenant for life is, therefore, not in a situation like that of a mortgagor, upon whom the mortgagee can at any time enter and put an end to his power. No estate or interest is given in the timber, but a mere power to appropriate it, that power being subordinate to the power given to the trustees. Various authorities were also referred to for the purpose of shewing that a tenant for life, not impeachable of waste, was entitled to the proceeds of the timber where the trustees have cut. Three cases were mentioned, namely, Smythe v. Smythe, Ferrand v. Wilson (6), and Davies v. Wescomb, but they do not at all govern the present case. In Smythe v. Smythe the right to cut proper timber was not disputed; the only question was whether the timber was proper to be cut: the report contains no expression or sentence, that I have discovered, that has any bearing at all upon the present case. The next case, Ferrand v. Wilson, arose out of a very special and complicated will; the questions being whether a power to cut timber was a power which was to endure so long as to intrench on the rules against perpetuities, and whether the parties had not legal remedies which they had lost under the effect of the Statute of Limitations; all that applies to the present case is, that the Vice Chancellor entered into a consideration whether the proceeds of the timber were, in that particular case, in a different situation or liable to a different application from ordinary annual profits; but there is no general principle deducible from that case which can be applied to the present, the whole question turning upon the construction of a term totally different from that now under consideration. In the remaining case of Davies v. Wescomb, the point of the whole decision was, that the trustees had no power to cut timber, and that by cutting timber they had deprived the tenant for life, without impeachment of waste, of the power of cutting, to which he was entitled; and the Court, therefore, gave him the proceeds of that timber. That decision was founded on the great case of Cockerell v. Cholmeley (7), which has some points material to the consideration of the present; in that case the trustee of Whitenights had a power to sell, and there was a tenant for life without impeachment of waste: the trustees being about to exercise the power which they had of either exchanging or selling the estate, the tenant for life unimpeachable for waste claimed the timber; that claim was conceded, and it was, therefore, arranged that the timber, and the land without the timber, should be valued separately, and that then the tenant for life should convey the timber to the purchaser, and the trustees convey the land; this arrangement was accordingly carried into effect, the tenant for life taking the value of the timber, and the trustees taking the value of the land; it was a most unfortunate case for the purchaser, for afterwards the person becoming entitled to the inheritance filed his bill, and the sale was set aside. It was insisted that the sale could not have been in conformity with the power, and that it was, therefore, a void sale, for that the trustees were only authorized to sell the estate entire, that they had no right to separate either the land from the timber, or the timber from the land, and that, as they had therefore sold the land without the timber, and permitted the tenant for life, unimpeachable for waste, to sell the timber for his own benefit, it was not a sale corresponding with their power, and that it was a void sale. Such were the three cases which were cited and relied on as tending to shew some such interest in the tenant for life in the timber as precluded the conclusion as just and proper that the trustees possessed a discretion to cut.

The next point that was urged was, that this was a case that might be likened to the case of marshalling, or where the person has two funds to resort to, and another person has some rights in connexion with him on one of the funds, but no right on the other, and the Court makes the party who has the two funds have recourse to the one on which his competitor has no right or interest, and exhaust that before resorting to the fund which is common to both of them. I do not, however, conceive that the present case, where the tenant for life requires the remainder-man or the trustees to raise the charges upon the inheritance, and the remainder-man seeks to charge them upon the timber, is one to which this principle of marshalling applies. There, the object is, that full justice may be done to both parties, without interfering with, or prejudicing the rights of, or occasioning a loss to either of them; but here, if the tenant for life has a right to apply this timber, it is a loss to the remainder-man, or if the remainder-man has a right to have this timber, it is a loss to the tenant for life. One party must lose, and who it is to be must be determined by the intention of the grantor; and this drives us again to see what the grantor has done. We then find that the grantor has given the ordinary profits to the tenant for life, with exemption from waste, or a licence to appropriate a portion of the inheritance, subject to the prior right and discretion of the trustees for raising portions. It was further insisted that the tenant for life is the owner of the timber, but that is quite out of the question; he has nothing but a power, though when he has felled the timber under the power, it would become a chattel, and he would become owner of it. We are now, however, discussing the relative rights as to standing timber, and the case cannot, therefore, be argued, or the claim to fell the timber supported upon any existing property in the timber as owner. It has been contended that a purchaser at an auction under the tenant for life has acquired a right which this Court cannot interfere with; but if the tenant for life has sold timber which he has no right to fell, a buyer can acquire no right or interest as against the party who has a right to fell; and there appears to me no ground whatever for the argument thus sought to be raised. Then it was said that there has been delay on the part of the trustees, but it does not appear to me that there is any ground for the assertion.

It was then said that the bill was not properly framed, and that it did not shew any intention or desire on the part of the trustees to cut. I think that this is a mistake, for the whole frame of the bill sufficiently discloses that the object of the trustees in interfering with the right claimed by the tenant for life, is for the express purpose of cutting the timber. It was further said that the timber being ripe and fit and proper to be cut, it is immaterial to the plaintiffs by whom it is cut. There is, however, this difference: if the tenant for life is allowed to cut, he appropriates the proceeds to his own benefit as part of his profits as tenant for life, and leaves the whole 80,000*l.* to be charged upon the inheritance—whereas, if the trustees cut, they apply the proceeds in a different manner, in a manner which diminishes the profits which the tenant for life would acquire by the exercise of the special power on his part, and so diminishes the charge upon the inheritance.

It is further to be observed, that the interests of the parties concerned are not identical. It is the interest of the tenant for life to cut within his lifetime, whereas the trustees have a duty which they ought to discharge with a fair consideration for all parties; they are bound so to exercise their power of felling as to make it available to the greatest extent in reducing the charge upon the inheritance, and in this both the tenant for life and the remainder-men are interested. Much may depend as to the value of the timber upon the time at which it is cut and the mode in which it is sold, and on various other particulars.

It therefore appears to me to be of great importance that the right to cut should be given to those who by law should possess it. Considering, then, that the trustees have the discretion to which I have referred, that they are charged with that discretion for the benefit of others and not for themselves, and that they may exercise that discretion, still leaving matter upon which the exemption from waste may operate in favour of the tenant for life, it appears to me that there is no ground whatever why this Court should interfere to controul their discretion.

Now, the tenant for life is about to destroy the right of the trustees, and to prevent the execution of their power; I think, therefore, that they are entitled to restrain him from so doing. It appears, however, that he has actually sold and entered into contracts for the sale of the timber. Such being the case, and the sale having very possibly been a prudent one, I should say, without at all desiring to controul their discretion, that it would well become the trustees to consider whether they might not adopt it as a sale by themselves. I shall, therefore, grant the injunction, with an understanding that the trustees are to undertake to account for the proceeds of the timber as the Court shall direct, and that if the cause proceeds to a hearing, the timber shall be then deemed to have been cut by those who had the power to cut. It may be as well to do this, though as the question is one of construction, depending upon principles which prevail in courts of equity, and as the whole matter is now before the Court, it is not likely that the present aspect and circumstances of the case will be at all varied at the hearing.

I have formed my opinion upon the general right, and I think I am bound to give effect to that opinion. Even if it should ultimately appear that whether it be the trustees who sell or the defendant who sells, the defendant will be entitled to the proceeds either as tenant for life, without impeachment for waste, or as executor of the settlor in respect of the first 10,000*l.*, I should still say the present application must be granted, the trustees undertaking to the effect that I have stated.

Power—Charity—Appointment to Charitable Purposes—Informal Execution aided.

If the intention to exercise a power be clearly shewn, a Court of equity will, in favour of a charity, give effect to an informal or defective execution of the power. Therefore where a power to dispose of personality was directed to be exercised, amongst other modes, by the last will and testament, &c. of the donee, signed, sealed, published, and declared in the presence of two or more witnesses, and the donee, in exercise of the power, bequeathed part of the personality to certain charities by an unattested will (executed before the passing of the Wills Act), signed and sealed by the donee, but not in the presence of witnesses, and not published or declared, it was held (affirming the decree of the Court below,) to be a valid execution.

Held, also, that as the gifts were specific, the state of the testatrix's property at the time of her will and the time of her death might be looked at.

This was an appeal from the decree of Vice Chancellor Wigram, reported 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 274.

The sums of stock over which the testatrix had a power of appointment under the will of Thomas Innes were, 3,333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* consols, 1,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, 3*l.* 5*s.* per cent. annuities, 500*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.* reduced annuities, and 100*l.* long annuities. She had also at her death the sum of 12,909*l.* 19*s.*, 3*l.* per cent. annuities standing in her own name. After the gift of the legacies to the several charities set out in the report of the case below, the will proceeded as follows:—
"To Harriett K. Innes my god-daughter I leave 500*l.* in the 3*l.* per cent. consols to be paid within six months after my death; the remainder in the 3*l.* per cents. and three separate sums in the new 3*l.* per cents., with 100*l.* long annuities, and any other property I may die possessed of I leave to C. Sayer and B. Sayer, their executors, administrators, and assigns, upon trust," &c.

Nov. 25. — The LORD CHANCELLOR, after stating the will and the facts of the case, proceeded as follows :—The question is whether these testamentary papers operated as an execution of the powers. The bill was filed by one of the four children of A. Innes (the residuary legatee of Thomas Innes), against the surviving executor, the treasurers of the several charities and other parties, praying that one fourth part of the sums of stock over which Judith Innes had a power of appointment might be transferred to the plaintiff. The Vice Chancellor by his decree, declared that the testatrix, by her will, intended to execute the power, and that the defective execution ought to be supplied in favour of the four charities. The plaintiff has appealed against this decree. The first question is, whether the will of Judith Innes operated as an execution of the powers respectively given by the will of her husband and her own marriage settlement. This question involves two others: first, whether she meant thereby to exercise the two powers; and, secondly, assuming that such was her intention, whether the Court will hold the powers to have been sufficiently executed in favour of the charities, notwithstanding the non-attestation of the will in conformity with the power.

With respect to her intention to execute the powers, I am of opinion that such intention may be collected from the words of the will. The general rules relating to this subject are well established, but the point of difficulty is, whether the facts of this case do or do not fall within the established rule. The result of the authorities is appropriately and shortly stated in 1 Sugden on Powers, 373, 6th ed.—“A donee of a power may execute it without referring to it, or taking the slightest notice of it, provided that the intention to execute it appear;” and p. 385, “Where, however, the power is not referred to, the property comprised in it must be mentioned, so as to manifest that the disposition was intended to operate over it; the donee must do such an act as shews that he has in view the thing of which he had a power to dispose.” “Slight circumstances of conformity or reference will not amount to a sufficient indication of the intention,” p. 387. Such being the established rule, the question in this case is, whether the specific property, the subject of the power, is mentioned in the will in question. I think it is so mentioned, and I adopt the reasoning of the judgment below in support of that conclusion. The words “the remainder in the 3l. per cents.” shew that the legacies previously given were part of a larger amount of stock of that denomination and distinguish the case from a general gift of a sum of stock of that description, and it cannot be construed to import a direction to purchase stock of that description and amount. As the words, then, are only to be satisfied by referring them to specific stock existing either at the date of the will or of the death of the testatrix, it becomes necessary to inquire as to the existence of such stock at those times, and since there was no stock of her own existing at those times to which the words can be referred, but stock did then exist subject to the power both at the date of the will and the death, the Court must refer the words to that stock in order to give them some effect; and whether the will be regarded as speaking from its date, or the death of the testatrix, the result must be the same.

But it is contended that the words might be satisfied by referring them to stock which the testatrix supposed might exist at the time of her death. But where there is no such stock, and no indication in the will of any intention to purchase such stock, or of any expectation of her becoming possessed of any such stock, it would be a most unnatural construction that she referred to such stock to be acquired; at all events, the most natural construction is, that she intended to refer to that specific fund which was existing at the date of the will. If this construction required further support, I think it is to be found in the next words—"and three separate sums in the new 3l. 10s. per cents.," which evidently mean the three specific sums existing at the date of the will. I do not consider that the subsequent words "and any other property I may die possessed of, of what nature or kind soever" affect the construction further than this, that they import an expectation that the specific stock previously described would exist at the time of her death, and that she had an intention to dispose of that and any other property she might die possessed of.

It was argued that extrinsic evidence of the state of the property at the date of her will, was not admissible in this case, and the Vice Chancellor Wigram's book on evidence was referred to: but, a contrary proposition is there mentioned—"For the purpose of determining the subject of disposition, a Court may inquire into every material fact relating to the property which is claimed as the subject of disposition, and to the circumstances of the testator, and of his family and affairs, for the purpose of enabling the Court to identify the thing intended by the testator"—Wigram's Evid. p. 51, 3rd ed. There have been many cases in which the Court has held that a power was not executed where the words might have referred to the power, because the words might be fully satisfied by referring them to the testator's own property; and there have been many cases where the Court has refused to look at the extrinsic circumstances, because the bequest was not specific, as it is here. In Lewis v. Lewellyn a testator having a power of appointment over freeholds and copyholds, and having other freeholds of his own, but no copyholds, charged all his freehold and copyhold estate with the payment of his debts, and, subject thereto, he devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate. This was held to be a good execution of the power as to the copyholds only. In Napier v. Napier (1) a testator made a general devise of all his lands in nine parishes, in five of which only he had land in fee, in three others he had no land of his own, but there was land over which he had a power of appointment. In the remaining parish he had land in fee and also land over which he had a power of appointment. On the authority of Lewis v. Lewellyn, it was held, that the land in the parish which was the subject of the power did not pass. These cases only prove that when the testator has property of his own and a power of appointing other property, and the words used may be satisfied by referring them to his own property, they will not be referred to the power. In Webb v. Honnor it was held, that a bequest of the whole of the testator's personalty, "consisting of money invested in any of the public funds, household furniture," &c., did not operate as an execution of a power of appointment over a sum in the funds. The Master of the Rolls said, "In this instrument there is nothing to shew that the testator meant to dispose of anything but his own property; every part of it is satisfied by giving all that he was possessed of." So in Hughes v. Turner, Jones v. Curry (2), Nannock v. Horton. The case of Andrews v. Emmot, and others of that class are to the point, that you are not to inquire into the circumstances of the testator's property at the date of his will, to determine whether he was executing the power or not. The testator there did not refer either to the power or the subject of it. From some of these decisions, it might be inferred that in no instance could the Court take into account the state of the property in construing a will; but as Alderson, B. remarked, in Davies v. Quarterman (3), "All dicta should be construed according to the circumstances of the case in which they are found"; and the circumstances of these cases were that prima facie they were general gifts. But in Shuttleworth v. Greaves (4) Lord Cottenham said,—“In every specific devise or bequest, it is clearly competent and necessary to inquire as to the thing specifically devised or bequeathed.” And this doctrine was acted upon in Mackinley v. Sison (5), where it is questionable, however, whether the application of the doctrine was perfectly correct. Upon this point, therefore, I think the judgment of the Vice Chancellor was right and ought to be affirmed.

The next question is, as to the absence of attestation. The will contained a form of attestation and a note—“This will has not been witnessed, as I intend, if I am spared, to write it out fair.” It has been argued from this, that admitting she intended to execute the power, her intention was only inchoate. It is plain, however, from a note to a codicil wherein she states a certain interlineation or erasure had been made by herself, that she regarded as valid and effectual the dispositions made by her will and previous codicils, even though she did intend, if spared, to have it witnessed and written out fair; and if her intention to dispose of her own property was complete, it cannot be successfully contended that her intention to dispose of the property the subject of the power was only inchoate. The question then arises, whether the powers are well exercised in favour of the charities, notwithstanding the requisitions of the powers have not been complied with. Upon this point I may observe, that the doctrine applicable to this question ought to be considered as well established by judicial decision, namely, that a power well exercised in other respects will, in favour of charities, be deemed to have been effectively exercised, notwithstanding the formalities required by the deed creating the power have not been complied with. The decisions upon this point are too familiar to render it necessary to cite them by name. With regard to the attestation being required by the instrument creating the power, there is no valid objection to dispensing with attestation, on the ground of its contravening the intention of the donor of the power. The attestation is required merely for the purpose of preventing fraud; and in the case of a gift to a charity, there is much less danger than where an individual is to take a benefit by the execution of the power, and in fact, no danger at all.

The only other objection to the decree is, that it leaves the charities to take their legacies exclusively out of the funds derived under the will of Thomas Innes, and that it ought to provide that the legacies should be taken out of those funds, and the 1,000*l.* consols over which the testatrix had a power of appointment, proportionably. But the parties interested in the latter fund are not before the Court, and the Court has no jurisdiction over that fund in this suit; and, therefore, I can make no order as to that upon this appeal, but the charities must be left to take their legacies out of the fund in court; and I may observe that the principle of marshalling has no application to the case before me.

For these reasons, the decision must be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } BOURNE v. BUCKTON.
Nov. 15, 21.

Thellusson Act—Accumulations—“Portions.”

A testator gave the residue of his personal estate to trustees, in trust, to invest and accumulate the income from time to time during the life of his niece, and after her death to transfer the securities and accumulations to her children in equal shares, the shares of male children to be vested at twenty-one, and those of females at twenty-one or marriage. Then followed other provisions with regard to what the testator sometimes called the “portions” and sometimes the “shares” of such children, as to maintenance and education, and if the trusts for the benefit of the children of his niece should fail, there were similar trusts for the benefit of the children and issue of other parties, and failing those trusts, for his own next-of-kin. The testator’s niece was still living, and had survived the period of twenty-one years from the death of the testator. Held, that this provision was not one for raising portions within the meaning of the 2nd section of the Thellusson Act: that from the expiration of twenty-one years from the testator's death, the trust for accumulation was void; and that from that time till the death of the niece, the legal personal representative of the testator was entitled to the accumulations.

This case came on upon the petition of the legal personal representative of a testator named William Stains, and it prayed that the trusts for accumulation contained in the will of the testator, as to his residuary personal estate during the life of his niece, might be declared void under the Thellusson Act after the expiration of twenty-one years from the testator's death; and that the petitioner might be declared entitled to such accumulations during the life of the testator's niece.

The will of the testator, W. Stains, was the subject of discussion on a previous occasion, before the Vice Chancellor of England, upon a petition that the trusts for accumulating the income of his residuary real estate might be declared void—Halford v. Stains (1).

The testator, after making divers pecuniary and specific bequests, bequeathed all the rest of his personal estate unto his friends John Buckton and Thomas Bourne, their executors, administrators and assigns, upon trust, with all convenient speed after his decease, to sell all parts thereof as should not consist of stocks, funds, monies, mortgages and securities for money, and get in all such parts thereof as should consist of monies or securities for money, and at their or his discretion to lay out and invest the same monies to arise and be produced by such sales, and to be got in as aforesaid, in the purchase of freehold hereditaments, in the county of Kent, which the said testator directed to be forthwith settled to the same uses, and upon the same trusts as were thereafter by him declared concerning such parts of the said net monies as should not be laid out in such purchases as aforesaid, or as near thereto as the deaths of parties and other contingencies would admit of; and upon further trust, as to such parts of his said net residue as should not be laid out in such purchases as aforesaid, and also in the mean time, and until such purchases should be made as aforesaid, as to the whole of the said net monies, to lay out the same in the purchase of stock in some or one of the public funds, or upon other government or real securities, and alter, vary and transpose the same stocks, funds, and securities from time to time, and receive the annual proceeds of the said stocks, funds, and securities, and again lay out the same in manner aforesaid, so that the same and all the resulting income and produce thereof might accumulate in the way of compound interest for and during the term of the natural life of his niece Elizabeth Stains, and from and immediately after the decease of the said Elizabeth Stains, then, upon trust, that his said trustees or trustee for the time being should assign or transfer, or make over all and every the said stocks, funds, securities and accumulations unto the child, if only one, and if more than one, between and amongst all and every the children (but exclusive of an elder or only son, such only son not being an only child) of the said Elizabeth Stains, equally to be divided between them if more than one, share and share alike, as tenants in common, and to be vested in such of them the same children as should be a son or sons, when and as he or they should attain his or their age or respective ages of twenty-one years, and in such of the same children as should be a daughter or daughters when and as she or they respectively should attain the like age or be married, which should first happen, and to be transferable and transferred as soon after the said age or days should be attained, and also after the decease of his said niece Elizabeth Stains, as conveniently might be.

And the testator directed his trustees, after the decease of the said Elizabeth Stains, to apply the income of the portion of each of the said children and issue being minors for their maintenance, and to apply one-half of their expectant shares for their advancement, and such sums as should be so advanced to be considered as part of his or her said portion or share, and to be deducted from such portion; and that so much of the income of the portion or share of each of the children as should not be applied for their maintenance and advancement should be added to and accumulated together with the principal of such portion or share, and should be subject to the trusts and limitations therein specified as to the principal of the same portion or share until the principal should become payable. The will contained similar trusts for the benefit of the children of Edwin Stains, and afterwards of John Palmer, in case the preceding trusts should fail; and the last trust was in favour of the testator's own next-of-kin, according to the Statute of Distributions.

The testator died in the year 1827, leaving his brother James his sole next-of-kin. Upon the death of James in 1828, the petitioner became his personal representative. Elizabeth Stains was still living, and had survived the period of twenty-one years from the death of the testator.

Mr. Rolit and Mr. Fooks appeared in support of the petition, and Mr. Stuart and Mr. Goodeve, Mr. Bethell, Mr. Erskine and Mr. Jessel opposed for different parties.

(2) 40 Geo. 3. c. 98. s. 1. enacts, "That no person or persons shall after the passing of this act, by any deed or deeds, surrender or surrenders, will, codicil, or otherwise howsoever, settle or dispose of any real or personal property so and in such manner that the rents, issues, profits, or produce thereof shall be wholly or partially accumulated, for any longer term than the life or lives of any such grantor or grantors, settlor or settlers, or the term of twenty-one years from the death of any such grantor, settlor, or testator, or during the minority or re-

Nov. 21.—KINDERSLEY, V.C.—In this case the question raised is, whether the bequest or provision for accumulation contained in the will of the testator comes within the 2nd section of the 40 Geo. 3. c. 98, commonly called the Thellusson Act; for it is not disputed that if it does not come within the provisions of the 2nd section of the act, the direction to accumulate is void under the provisions of the 1st section. The only question, therefore, is, whether it comes within the provisions of the 2nd section, as being, according to the terms of that section, a provision for raising portions for the child or children of any person taking an interest under the devise. The question with regard to the real estate has been already disposed of by the decision of the late Vice Chancellor of England, in the case of Halford v. Stains.

In order to see whether the bequest of the personal estate, which is all that I have to do with, is or is not within the provisions of the 2nd section of the Thellusson Act, it is necessary to see what the provisions of the will are. The will runs to very great length, but it is very conveniently abridged and very accurately stated in Mr. Simons's report of the case of Halford v. Stains, spective minorities of any person or persons who shall be living or in ventre sa mere at the time of the death of such grantor, devisor, or testator, or during the minority or respective minorities only of any person or persons who, under the uses or trusts of the deed, surrender, will, or other assurances directing such accumulations, would, for the time being if of full age, be entitled unto the rents, issues and profits, or the interest, dividends, or annual produce so directed to be accumulated; and in every case where any accumulation shall be directed otherwise than as aforesaid, such directions shall be null and void, and the rents, issues, profits, and produce of such property so directed to be accumulated, shall so long as the same shall be directed to be accumulated contrary to the provisions of this act, go to and be received by such person or persons as would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed."

Sect. 2. enacts, "That nothing in this act contained, shall extend to any provision for payment of debts of any grantor, settlor, or devisor, or other person or persons, or to any provision for raising portions for any child or children of any grantor, settlor, or devisor, or any child or children of any person taking any interest under any such conveyance, settlement, or devise, or to any direction touching the produce of timber or wood upon any lands or tenements; but that all such provisions and directions shall and may be made and given as if this act had not passed."

therefore for convenience I shall state the provisions of the will from the report of that case. The testator, William Stains, was possessed of real and personal estate, and he first makes a devise of his realty and then of his personalty. The devise of the realty is thus: the real estate is devised to trustees during the life of the testator's niece Elizabeth Stains, upon trust to make certain payments out of the rents and profits, not material to be considered, except that among those annual payments there is this direction,—that the trustees should pay an annuity to Elizabeth Stains in case she should marry a certain individual mentioned in the will, of the name of Smith, which event never happened. Then, subject to those payments, the rents and profits are to be laid out in the purchase of other real estates, which real estates, when purchased, are to be settled to the same uses as those to which he devises his own real estate in the subsequent part of his will. But he goes on to say, that as to the rents and profits which shall not actually be laid out in the purchase of real estate, they shall be invested in government securities and the income accumulated during the life of Elizabeth Stains, and that the accumulations of so much as should not be laid out, instead of going in the same manner as the real estate would have gone, if it had been laid out in real estates, is to go in the same manner in which he bequeaths, subsequently, his personal estate. Having given that direction for the accumulation of the rents and profits of the real estate during the life of the niece Elizabeth Stains, he devises his real estate, at her death, to her first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to Edwin Stains for his life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to the use of all the children of John Palmer as tenants in common in tail, with remainder to the testator's right heirs. That disposes entirely of his real estate, and disposes of all those real estates which should be purchased by means of the rents and profits of that real estate, accruing during the life of Elizabeth Stains; and it also directs that as to so much of those rents and profits which should not be laid out in real estate, then the rents and profits should accumulate in real or government securities, and should go as he bequeaths his residuary personal estate.

Then, we come to the bequest of the personal estate; and it is only with respect to this bequest that the question now arises. This petition affects only the personal estate. As I have said, the question as to the real estate was disposed of by the case of Halford v. Stains. Now, the bequest of the personal estate is this: he gives all the residue of his personal estate to trustees, on trust to realize and to lay out the money to arise by the realization of the personalty in the purchase of real estates, and those real estates are not to go according to the real estates which are to be bought with the rents and profits of his own real estate, but are to be conveyed to the same uses and upon the same trusts as he afterwards directs with respect to the monies which shall not be laid out in real estates. As to so much as the trustees should think fit, or should happen not to lay out in the purchase of real estates, the income of the personal estate is to be from time to time invested and accumulated during the life of the niece; and after the death of the niece the trust is, to transfer the securities and accumulations to her child, if only one, and if more than one, to her children, exclusive of an elder or an only son, such only son not being an only child, equally as tenants in common, and to be vested in male children at twenty-one and female children at twenty-one or marriage. Then, there are provisions that in case any of the male children should attain twenty-one, or females attain twenty-one or marry, and die before their mother, leaving issue, then the issue are to stand in the place of the parent, who would have taken in that event the share, if he or she survived the mother Elizabeth Stains; and then there are other provisions with regard to what are sometimes called the "portions" of these children of Elizabeth Stains, and sometimes what are called the "shares" of the children of Elizabeth Stains, as to maintenance and education and advancement if any of them should be under twenty-one at her death. Then, if the trust for the benefit of the younger children of Elizabeth Stains should fail, there are similar trusts for the benefit of the children and issue of Edwin Stains; and failing that, similar trusts for the benefit of the issue of Palmer, and failing all those trusts, then it is to be held in trust for his own next-of-kin, according to the Statute of Distributions. Now, it is to be observed, that with respect to the personal estate, Elizabeth Stains takes no benefit of that estate whatever. Edwin Stains takes no benefit of the personal estate. John Palmer, whose children are the last provided for, takes no benefit under the bequest of the personal estate. Then, it appears that Elizabeth Stains is still living, and has survived the period of twenty-one years from the death of the testator. The question therefore, is, whether, it being admitted that the trust for accumulation beyond the period of twenty-one years would be void under the Thellusson Act, if it does not come within the meaning of the 2nd section of the act, the question is, whether this provision is such a portion for the child or children of a person taking a benefit under the devise, for that is the language of the 2nd section, "under such devise," as to prevent it coming within the prohibition of the first section.

Now, there are two questions raised here. The first question is, are these portions at all within the meaning of the 2nd section? And the next question is, even supposing that they are portions within the meaning of the term "portions" as used in that 2nd section, are they portions for the children of any person taking any interest under such devise? I am using the words of the section. Now, with regard to the real estate, as to which the late Vice Chancellor of England decided in the case of Halford v. Stains, his Honour decided that the provision was not within the 2nd section; for although, as to real estate, Elizabeth Stains would in a certain event take an annuity, that is, have a contingent interest on her marrying a certain person; and although Edwin Stains, whose children were beneficially interested, did take a life interest in remainder in the real estate, yet His Honour decided that it was not within the provisions of the 2nd section,—that is to say, that they were not "portions." But the reasons he gave were these: first, that the meaning of the 2nd section of the act was, that it was to apply to the raising of portions created by some other instrument, either cotemporary with the will or instrument or prior to it; and the second reason he gave was, that the testator himself calls these "shares," and that, therefore, they could not be considered as coming within the term "portions." Now, I am bound to say, with all deference and respect for the opinion of that learned Judge, that I cannot concur in the reasons assigned for the judgments either in the one or in the other. I am bound to say that; for it is better to express my opinion fairly, than to attempt to find out distinctions which really have no foundation, and so mislead for the future. I do not conceive that the intention of the 2nd section was, that it should apply only to portions created by another instrument. On the contrary, although I am persuaded it was not meant to exclude portions created by another instrument, I believe the portions meant, in the contemplation of the legislature, were portions created by the very instrument in question. With respect to the other reason, that they are called "shares," one observation arises, that, looking through the whole will, the testator as often calls them "portions" as "shares." Sometimes he calls them shares; sometimes he calls them portions, and sometimes he uses the term "portions or shares." And I must say that I think the general meaning of the term "portion" is the same as a part or share. However, though I do not concur in the reasons for the decision, better reasons I conceive may be assigned why that decision was perfectly correct, and I am particularly desirous, while I think it right to express my dissent from the reasons of the Vice Chancellor so far as they are expressed, to state my entire assent to the propriety of the decision itself.

There is some difference in the case as applied to the personalty and applied to the realty; but I will consider the bequest of the personal estate as if there had been no decision at all about it with respect to the question, whether the provision of the will comes within the meaning of the legislature in using the term "portions" in the 2nd section. It appears to me that a provision of this sort can in no proper sense be called a provision for raising portions. Observe what it is; it is not a direction out of rents and profits, or out of the income of the estate, or by felling timber on the estate, or by any of the ordinary modes, to raise a certain sum for the benefit of younger children or children generally, or to raise a sum of money for each child, but it is a direction that the whole residuary personal estate, whatever it may amount to, is to accumulate during the life of Elizabeth Stains for the purpose, not of raising portions, but of increasing the aggregate of the fund which he would have to dispose of at the death of Elizabeth Stains, and then giving the whole of this aggregate accumulated fund among the children of Elizabeth Stains, and then, failing those, among the children of John Palmer. Now it appears to me that is really not the meaning of the term "portions." It is very true with respect to this act of parliament, which has often been made the subject of commentary by different Judges, that it is extremely difficult to lay down a priori a definition of the term "portions," which necessarily includes all cases that ought to be included and which excludes all those that ought to be excluded: but when a particular case comes before me, I am bound to say, as in this case, that it does or that it does not come within my notion of the term "portions for children."

Being clearly of opinion independently of any authority that this is not a raising of portions within the meaning of that term, as used in the 2nd section of the Thellusson Act, I have looked to see whether I can find any corroboration of that opinion in any of the decided cases. When the question was argued I had a vague recollection that there had been a case at the Rolls in which the question had arisen, and had received the consideration of the late Master of the Rolls; and I asked myself whether there were not other cases beyond those cited. I have found the case that I had in my mind; it is the case of Eyre v. Marsden (3), where the question arose, and where Lord Langdale was called upon to adjudicate upon a provision for accumulation very similar to this, similar in point of principle, and in which he has expressed his opinion that a provision of this sort for accumulating the whole income of the entire personal estate for a certain period, excepting the twenty-one years, or the period named by the Thellusson Act, and then disposing of the whole aggregate fund, is not within the meaning of the term "portions." I will only just cite so much of that case as is necessary to shew what the provision made by the will was. I may take it from the marginal note, because it is quite sufficiently extensive for the purpose. "A testator gave certain annuities out of his residuary estate to his three children." I should observe he had three children, and he had had another child who had died leaving issue. "He gave certain annuities out of his residuary estate to his three children, and requested the surplus of the annual income to be applied in accumulation of the capital of his property for the benefit of his grandchildren, and which was to be divided between them after the death of the survivor of the testator's three children. Thirty years elapsed between the death of the testator and of the survivor of his children, and it was held that the direction for accumulation beyond twenty-one years from the testator's death was void under the 1st section of the Thellusson Act, and that the case did not come within the exception of the 2nd section." That states enough to shew that there were annuities given out of the general estate to the testator's three children, who were living at the date of his will, and who did survive him; but he had had another child who had died leaving issue in his lifetime, before the date of his will, and the provision which he makes as to the parties to whom the accumulated fund should go at the death of the survivor of the three children living, were all his grandchildren, who, of course, included the children living of the deceased children. Now, I only refer to this case for the purpose of the passage in the judgment, in which the Master of the Rolls refers to the question whether such a gift came within the meaning of the term "portions" in page 573. It will be observed, that the Master of the Rolls decided that it did not come within the 2nd section for two different reasons, one of them not applicable to this case, but the other applicable. One was that the grandchildren for whom provision was made were partly the children of persons who did take a benefit under the will, and partly the children of a person who took no benefit, namely, a deceased child; and the other reason was that which applies to the present case. He says, "as two of the grandchildren for whose benefit the accumulation is directed, were not the children of any person taking an interest under the will," (that is one reason,) "and as the accumulation which is directed does not appear to me to be a provision for raising portions, but a provision for making additions to the capital for the purpose of making one gift of an aggregate fund" (that reason clearly applying to this case), "I think that this case is not within the proviso of the act, and that the direction to accumulate for more than twenty-one years is void." Therefore, I am perfectly satisfied, if the present case had been before Lord Langdale, he would, for the same reason on which I decide, have decided that these were not portions within the meaning of the act, to give the whole residuary personal estate to accumulate, as it might be, during the life or lives of fifty persons, and the survivor of those fifty, and then give the whole aggregate fund to the children of persons to whom you may have given a small benefit by the will, or a person who takes no benefit by the will; that it never can come within the term "portions" at all; they are not portions. The purpose is not to raise portions for children, but the purpose is to increase and swell up the aggregate of the personal estate, in order to give the aggregate fund to the person or persons who may be the children of another person or not; that appears to me material to the question whether it comes within the term raising "portions." There is also a little allusion to this point in the judgment given by Mr. Justice Bosanquet in the case of Shaw v. Rhodes (4). He just touches on the point, and indicates, as it appears to me, that his opinion also would be to the same effect. It is not so direct as the case of Eyre v. Marsden. Mr. Justice Bosanquet was asked by the Lord Chancellor, having been one of the Lords Commissioners before whom the case had been, to come and assist him, the Chancellor, with his opinion, and he gives this judgment. He refers to the contest which had been raised, whether that case fell within the decision respecting the provision for raising portions for persons taking an interest under the devise, and he states two reasons why it does not come within that. But, first of all, some of the persons for whom the ultimate benefit was given were illegitimate children; it was not for those children whom the law recognizes as children taking a benefit under the will. Then he goes on to assign another reason, and he says, "Independently of this answer, I do not think that the case falls within the meaning of the exception. Where the whole rents and profits are given, in the first place, to persons during the lives of their parents,"—(he is referring to the particular provisions in Shaw v. Rhodes which are very peculiar)—"with the exception of small annuities only, to be paid thereout to the parents themselves for their own lives, and a gift to the same persons after the death of their parents is superadded, to be paid out of the subsequent rents and profits, I cannot think that the superadded gift is to be considered within the meaning of the statute in the nature of a portion to the children of persons taking an interest under the devise." The circumstances of Shaw v. Rhodes are so peculiar that it makes that observation less distinctly applicable to the present case; but I think it shews that Mr. Justice Bosanquet considered that it was not merely because it was a gift to the children of persons to be divided among them, that therefore it was a provision for raising portions among those children.

Mr. Malins (amicus Curiae) here referred to a case of Swabey v. Amor (5), in which the same point was argued before the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, and he came to the same conclusion. It was a case in which the whole income was very considerable, and but 50*l.* a-year given to Mrs. Amor for her life. The Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce held that it was not within the provisions of the act.

(5) Not reported.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I think that is a case distinctly in point fortifying the opinion I have come to. I have no doubt that will be enough to dispose of the case; but I think I ought to refer to another point which has been the subject of discussion and ingenious argument, which is this: as I have already observed, the 2nd section requires that it shall be for "raising portions for the children of any person taking any interest under such devise." Now, it is very difficult to know, looking at this 2nd section, what is exactly meant by "such devise." The word "devise" does not appear in any part of the statute. The word "devisor," or "testator," does appear. I should have observed already, that neither Mrs. Stains, whose children are first to take, nor Edwin Stains, whose children take in the second place, neither of them takes any benefit in the personal estate, but each of them does take some sort of interest in the real estate, which is a separate devise altogether.

Then, it was argued, that the words "such devise" must mean taking an interest under the will, and not under the particular gift which is here called "devise." Now, I think it right to say, that I cannot conceive that any inaccuracy of expression in the word "devise" should ever be used to signify the whole will. You never could use the language, even with the utmost latitude of inaccuracy, "the testator made his last devise and testament, and the executors proved his devise in the prerogative court;" but you may with a very common inaccuracy of expression by the term "devise" signify either the real or the personal estate. It is very common, although not very correct, to say, he "devised all the residue of his real and personal estate to trustees on trust," and so on. The more correct language would be to say, he "devised and bequeathed," that is, "devised the real" and "bequeathed the personal;" but still it appears to me that the meaning of this clause in the act as to the use of the words "such devise" is, that the parent must take an interest in the dividends, the particular gift, devise, or bequest, which is that gift or bequest which contains the provision for the accumulation. Because, if it were not so, a man might say, "I give my silver watch to A. B, and then I give all my real and personal estate to trustees to accumulate for a period of fifty years; if A. B. shall so long live;" and then give it all to the children of the person to whom he gave the silver watch. It is called by counsel in arguing the case on the appeal from Shaw v. Rhodes, a fraud on the act of parliament to put such an interpretation on it. But there is also an observation by Lord Justice Knight Bruce, in the case of Morgan v. Morgan, in which he observes on this case—he does not speak of it very strongly, but he observes—in that case there was a gift of specific chattels to a Mrs. Gyles, and then after her death there was a direction to accumulate for the benefit of her two daughters Mary and Charlotte. Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce expressed clearly an intimation of his opinion, that the mere gift of a personal chattel will not do, for he observes they are only specific bequests that are given to Mrs. Giles, and the bequest which contains the direction to accumulate, is the bequest of the whole residuary estate. It is unnecessary to decide that second point, if I am right on the first point, that these are not portions within the 2nd section.

Being of this opinion, I must direct that from the expiration of the twenty-one years, I think there should be a declaration,—for I see no harm in a declaration on petition in such a case—that from the expiration of the twenty-one years from the death of the testator, the provision for accumulation as to the personal estate—we have nothing to do with the real—is void. And then comes the question, to whom is it to go? It was contended that it should go to the heir-at-law of the testator, by reason of the direction to lay it out in real estate; but it must be remembered that the heir-at-law can take nothing as heir but what was the testator's own real estate. No direction of the will merely to lay out the testator's personal estate in realty, will make that the testator's realty. He may give and devise it as if it had been his own, which would give it to his heir-at-law; but in the absence of any such particular direction, what was his personal estate must go to his legal personal representative, if undisposed of by will. I am of opinion, therefore, that the legal personal representative of the testator is entitled to the benefit, both of the income of the accumulated fund up to that time, and of the income of the personal estate itself from the expiration of the twenty-one years, up to the time when Mrs. Stains's death would put an end to the period for accumulating. Mrs. Stains is still living, and it appears by the Master's report that the testator left one brother only, James Stains, who was sole next-of-kin and heir-at-law, and the present petitioners are the legal personal representatives of that James Stains. Therefore, the petitioners will be entitled to the prayer of the petition. I think that the petition prays that the costs of all parties should come out of the fund, and if it did not pray that, it would be the right thing. Here it must come out of that portion of the fund which is left undisposed of. If there should be any inaccuracy it must be set right; but, in substance, the costs of all parties are to come out of that portion which I determine to be undisposed of, and subject to that, it would go to the legal personal representative of James Stains, who was the sole next-of-kin of the testator at his death.

Friendly Societies—Joint-Stock Companies Registration Act—Usury.

In 1845 a society, called the Frugal Investment Society, was established, and a book of rules was framed and approved of by the barrister appointed under the Friendly Societies Act. By these rules it was declared that the society should last for one hundred months; that every member should pay 1*l.* a month in respect of each share held by him; that members might be paid their shares in advance upon the terms of paying 8*s.* a month by way of interest in respect of each share so anticipated, in addition to the subscription, and giving security for such payments. All monies which should be paid to the society, exclusively of the subscriptions, were to be divided among the members every year. The society consisted of 180 members. A. took some shares in the society, and received the amount of them in advance, and made a mortgage of real estate to the trustees of the society, for the purpose of securing the sums payable by him under the rules. A. paid sums to the society, to an amount, however, less than the sums so payable. He afterwards filed a bill against the trustees, praying that, upon accounting for the sums advanced to him and interest, the difference, if any, between this amount and the sums paid by him might be repaid to him by the trustees, and that the mortgaged property might be reconveyed to him:—Held, that A. had, on this bill, no right to relief.

The above-mentioned loans made to A, under the rules of the society, were not usurious.

Whether the society came within the Friendly Societies Act, or whether it was an illegal one—quære.

In 1845 a society, called the Frugal Investment Society, was established. A book of the rules of the society was prepared. By the first rule it was declared that the objects of the society were to accumulate and employ the savings of its members, and therewith to assist those of them who might need immediate pecuniary advances, either to carry on their pursuits or to promote any other laudable and legal purpose. The other rules material to the questions argued in this case were as follows:—The first meeting was to be held in September 1845, and meetings were to be held once in every succeeding month. Every member was to commence at the first meeting to pay his subscription money of 1*l.* per share for each share he might hold, and was afterwards to pay the same amount of subscription money at every succeeding subscription meeting for a period of eight years and four months, by which time it was estimated that 100*l.* would have been subscribed upon each share. Every member neglecting to pay his subscription was to be subject to certain specified fines. Those persons who might join the association after the first meeting should subscribe for an additional number of shares, or should purchase forfeited shares, and should pay the full amount of the subscription for such shares from the commencement of the association, together with such further sum as the directors, from a calculation of the current year's profits, should consider reasonable. The funds of the association were to be divided into two portions, to be respectively called "the subscription fund" and "the dividend fund." The "subscription fund" was to consist of all monies paid as subscriptions upon the shares, and the "dividend fund" of all monies arising from fees, fines, forfeitures, premiums, and all other receipts than those for subscriptions. The "dividend fund" was to be applied, first, in paying the expenses of the association, and the surplus was then to be divided among all the members, whether borrowing members or not, and was to be divided between them as soon as convenient after the annual general meeting. The members, who should have the amount of their shares at once advanced to them, were to give security to the association for all payments to become due on the advance. The premiums agreed to be given by any member wishing to anticipate his share were to be paid by him in equal monthly payments during all the remaining period of the existence of the association. Each member who should anticipate his shares should, after the receipt thereof, pay the sum of 8*s.* per month, as interest for each share, and should continue to pay the same interest, during the continuance of the association, in addition to his periodical subscriptions. The interest of 8*s.* per month upon each share advanced was to be designated "redemption money." The shares in the association were not to exceed two thousand in number, and the duration of the association was limited to the period of eight years and four months, when the property of the association was to be divided among its members.

The book of rules was submitted to Mr. Tidd Pratt, the barrister appointed under the Friendly Societies Act, 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 40, with all the formalities required by section 4. of that act, and approved of by him.

In February 1846 Mr. Burbidge became a member of the society, and took five shares, three of them at a premium of 7*l.* and the other two at a premium of 73*l.*, and received in advance the sum of 400*l.* in respect of four of the shares. In April 1846 Mr. Burbidge mortgaged to the trustees of the society some leasehold property and policies of assurance, for the purpose of securing, first, the sum of 286*l.*, being the three premiums of 7*l.* and one premium of 73*l.*; secondly, the sum of 368*l.* in respect of the four shares (these two sums to be paid by ninety-two monthly instalments); and thirdly, 32*s.* a month for ninety-two months in respect of the "redemption money" of the four shares. In July 1846 Mr. Burbidge received a further sum of 100*l.* in respect of the fifth share, and made a further charge on the mortgaged property for securing the payment of the premium of 73*l.* and the sum of 89*l.* in respect of the share (the payments of these sums to be made by eighty-nine monthly instalments), and 8*s.* per month for ninety-two months in respect of "redemption money" on the share. The total amount so secured to be paid was 998*l.* 16*s.*

Mr. Burbidge made some payments in respect of the sums due from him, and received some sums out of the "dividend fund," and died in June 1848, leaving Mrs. Burbidge, the plaintiff in this suit, his sole executrix.

The trustees of the society, after the death of Mr. Burbidge, realized from the mortgaged property a considerable sum of money, but not sufficient to answer the whole amount secured by the deeds, and claimed from Mrs. Burbidge, as executrix, a balance of 153*l.*

Mrs. Burbidge then filed a bill against the trustees, in which she prayed for an account of the advances made to Mr. Burbidge and of the sums received by the trustees; and, offering to pay the sums advanced, and interest at 5*l.* per cent. from the time of the advances, claimed to be repaid the difference between such receipts and advances, and interest, and a reconveyance of the mortgaged leasehold property.

The number of the members of the society was 180.

By section 2. of the Friendly Societies Act, 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 40, it is enacted that it shall be lawful for any number of persons to form themselves into a society under the provisions of the said recited act (10 Geo. 4. c. 56.), for the mutual relief and maintenance of all and every the members thereof, their wives, children, relations or nominees, in sickness, infancy, advanced age, widowhood, or any other natural state or contingency, whereof the occurrence is susceptible of calculation by way of average, or for any other purpose which is not illegal.

Mr. Russell and Mr. Southgate, for the plaintiff.

Mr. Bacon, Mr. Malins, and Mr. H. Prendergast, for the defendants, objected that the members of the society ought to have been made parties to the suit.

PARKER, V.C. said that he would hear the case before giving any opinion on the question of parties.

Mr. Russell and Mr. Southgate, for the bill, then contended, first, that the contract of Mr. Burbidge with the trustees was usurious; secondly, that it was a colourable evasion of the usury laws; thirdly, that Mr. Burbidge had never properly become a member; fourthly, that the society did not come within the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act, the objects not being comprised in section 2. of the 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 40; fifthly, that, if it was not a friendly society, it was a joint-stock company, and, as there were 180 members, it ought to have been registered under the Joint-Stock Companies Registration Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110). They also referred to the following cases on building societies.

Mr. Bacon, Mr. Malins and Mr. H. Prendergast, for the trustees, contended that the contract was not usurious—Silver v. Barnes (1), the authority of which case had been subsequently recognized by Parke, B. in Cutbill v. Kingdom (2). The expression used in p. 504 of the report is as follows:—"There is no usury in benefit societies lending to their members money at more than 5*l.* per cent."

PARKER, V.C.—The case of Silver v. Barnes is a direct authority that an advance out of the funds of an association of this kind, made pursuant to its rules to one of its members, having, in common with other members, an interest in the fund out of which the advance was made, and in the money to be repaid by him, is not a loan of money, but a dealing with the partnership fund, and is not usurious. I am not aware that the authority of that case has ever been doubted. It has been approved of by Parke, B. in Cutbill v. Kingdom, and I consider that a decision of a Court of law on such a subject is binding on this Court. The plaintiff next contended, that the transaction, if not actually usurious, was a mere shift and pretence to make a loan to Burbidge at usurious interest under colour of his being a member; that he was not bond fide a member when the transaction took place; and that the association itself consisted of a small number of persons of considerable property, who got it up and joined it in order to be enabled to lend their money at usurious interest to persons in needy circumstances. Now, Burbidge became a member on the 10th of February 1846, and thenceforth became entitled to all the benefits, and subject to all the liabilities of a member. At the same meeting he became entitled to anticipate his shares, and engaged to pay the premiums named, but the transaction was not completed till some months afterwards. He, doubtless, became a member for no other purpose than to avail himself of the rules entitling members to an advance in anticipation of their shares; but, if the object of these rules was lawful, I see no reason why he should not do it. The only question appears to be whether he really had become a member, and this I think is clear. It appears to me, therefore, that the plaintiff is not entitled to relief on the ground of usury.

The plaintiff then contended that the society was illegal, and that, on that ground, she was entitled to relief, independently of anything usurious in the contract. The plaintiff contended that it was not a friendly society, and that, to make it a friendly society, its objects must be among those contemplated by the act of 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 40. s. 2, and relied on this enactment as establishing that the association was not a friendly society. She then contended that, if it were not a friendly society, it was a joint-stock company within the Joint-Stock Companies Registration Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110), and that, as it was not registered pursuant to that act, it could not lawfully carry on business or enter into any valid contract. I think that this part of the plaintiff's case would have required great attention if the question of the legality or illegality of the society could be determined in this suit; but I do not think that this arises, or that the Court can properly express an opinion upon it. On the supposition that the association is illegal, it may reasonably be asked how this could entitle the plaintiff to the relief she asks? Her case is this,—the testator with a number of other persons became members of a society which was unlawful, and therefore his contracts were voidable; but if so, every other member must have a similar right, and it cannot be considered in justice that one member should have an advantage over the others by retiring from the society on the terms of being restored to his original position. The plaintiff has come into the Court for relief on the ground that the society was unlawful, and she is therefore bound so to frame her suit as to enable the Court, if it interfered at all, to wind up the association in a manner consistent with the rights of all the members. This bill has no such object, and, as regards that part of the case, I think that it cannot be sustained. The bill must be dismissed, with costs.

 Nov. 17, 25. } BLIGH v. TREDGETT.

Next Friend—Married Woman—Costs.

The solicitor for a married woman, the plaintiff in a suit, placed the name of A. on the record as her next friend. On a motion to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution, it was stated by A. that his name had been put on the record without his knowledge or sanction, that he had no acquaintance with the plaintiff or any of the parties to the suit, that he had no means of hearing of the suit, and that he had never heard of it until he was served with the notice of motion:—Held, that A. was nevertheless liable to pay to the defendants all the costs of the suit.

A next friend of a married woman placed on the record after the institution of the suit is liable, not only for the costs of the suit incurred after his name was so placed, but to all the costs of the suit.

In May 1849 a bill was filed by Mrs. Bligh, a married woman, by Mr. Warden, as her next friend, against the defendant in this case. In the same month Mr. Warden died. In July 1850 an order of course was obtained that the bill should be amended by the insertion of the name of Mr. J. F. Baker as next friend.

In October 1851 a notice of motion was served on the London agent of the solicitor acting for the plaintiff, for the dismissal of the bill for want of prosecution, and the payment of the costs by Mr. Baker; and on the 3rd of November an order was made accordingly.

This was a motion, by Mr. Baker, that the bill might be dismissed, with costs to be paid by the solicitor for the plaintiff, and that such part of the order as directed that he, Baker, should pay the costs, should be discharged.

Mr. Baker's case, as stated in the affidavit, was as follows:—The solicitor for Mrs. Bligh was a solicitor practising at Dover. Mr. Baker was his clerk for a few months only in the year 1849, and all connexion between them terminated in August 1849. Mr. Baker had not been aware of the existence of the suit in any way, and his name had been inserted as next friend of the plaintiff without his knowledge, privacy, or concurrence. He never heard of the suit, or that his name had been inserted until the 30th of October 1851, when he received from the London agent of the solicitor the notice of the motion for the dismissal of the bill, and he had been unable to give any instructions as to appearing on the motion which had been made on the 3rd of November. The solicitor had absconded,

Mr. Karlake, for the motion, contended, first, that Mr. Baker, not having consented in any way that his name should be used as next friend of the plaintiff, was not liable to pay the costs; and, secondly, that, if there was any such liability, it ought to be confined to the period during which his name was on the record.

Mr. C. Hall and Mr. Bates, for the defendants.

The following cases were cited:—Tar-buck v. Woodcock (1), Hood v. Phillips (2), Wade v. Stanley (3), which were cases in which plaintiffs, who had given no authority to solicitors, were held liable to pay the costs of the suits; Tabbemor v. Tabbemor (4), which was a case in which a solicitor was held liable to pay the costs of a plaintiff, who had not given any authority, and Ward v. Ward (5), a case in which a solicitor was held liable to pay the costs of the next friend of an infant who had given no authority.

PARKER, V.C. — The practice of this Court is quite clear, and there is no reason why Mr. Baker should be relieved from his liability as between him and the defendants. The cases which have been referred to go to this length—that, although the solicitor had improperly used the name of the plaintiff, and although he was liable to indemnify the person whose name he had made use of, yet that circumstance did not interfere with the right of the defendants to look to the plaintiff for payment of costs. In the case of Dundas v. Dutens (6) Sir Thomas Dundas made an affidavit that his name had been inserted without his authority. The Lord Chancellor (Lord Thurlow) said "If a man will do such a thing as this in a court of justice, and bring a person's name on the record without any authority, and if it is attended, as in this case, with a combination to bring him and Callender forward, in order to cheat the children, I ought not to permit the children or the estate or any one to receive any damage.—Mr. Mansfield, for Sir Thomas Dundas, insisted that, as his name was used without his authority, he was not to pay defendants' costs, but his name ought to be struck out, which he said would be immediately done at law, and compared it to the case of forging a name.—Lord Chancellor—I doubt whether it would be so at law, and whether I can deliver him from the costs to be taxed against the plaintiffs. I cannot deprive defendants of their right; they are entitled to this judgment. The defendants must have their remedy against the plaintiffs, and this plaintiff against him who pretended to be his agent. "If a man's name stands upon the record down to the hearing, which I can hardly conceive without his knowing it, he must pay costs if the bill is dismissed with costs. The case of forging a name is not parallel; it is different from that of a name standing upon the record. At law there would be a remedy upon the record for the costs, and the Court would act according to their discretion." Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that I cannot relieve the next friend from the liability which the order imposed on him to pay the costs.

The other point made is that, as Mr. Baker was appointed next friend at a period subsequent to the institution of the suit, he was not liable for the costs incurred before the time that his name was placed on the record. There is, however, no authority to shew that it is the practice of the Court to sever such costs, and my notion is, that a party, on becoming next friend, becomes also liable to pay all the costs which had been incurred previously. I cannot, therefore, grant him any relief in this respect, and I am afraid that the next friend must pay the additional costs of bringing these defendants on this motion before the Court. The solicitor is undoubtedly liable, but as he has gone to America, an order for him to pay would be useless. The motion must be refused, with costs.

On a subsequent day Mr. Karlake mentioned the motion again to the Court, with regard to the limitation of the liability of the next friend to the time during which he was next friend; and cited—

PARKER, V.C. said that there must be a settled rule of practice in these cases. He had always been of opinion that the Court, on a change of next friends, did not apportion the costs between them. He said that it was analogous to the case where a plaintiff died, and his executors revived the suit, and that there they were responsible for all the costs. The same principle must apply here.

His Honour directed the Registrar, Mr. Monro, to look into the practice; and said that, if a different course had been adopted, the case might be mentioned again.

The case was not mentioned again.

 Jan. 13. } GORDON v. DALZELL.

Solicitor and Client—Profits of Business—Right of Participation—Contract—Unqualified Person—Statute 22 Geo. 2. c. 46. s. 11.—Agent.

J. F., a writer to the Signet in Edinburgh, employed P., a solicitor, as his agent in London, and introduced to him business of some importance, which a client of his had in England. P., by letter, promised to allow J. F. one half of the profits of all such business, so long as he should retain the same, directly or indirectly. Upon the discovery of this by the client, who had obtained an order for the taxation of P.'s bills of costs, he presented a petition, asking that the taxing Master might disallow all such share of the charges as P. had promised to pay to J. F.:—Held, that if the agreement was illegal, it could not be enforced by J. F.; that the 22 Geo. 2. c. 46. s. 11. being a penal act must be construed strictly; that the business having been done, the solicitor was entitled to payment, and that the client could not avail himself of the letters to refuse payment, or insist upon deducting from the bills of costs what P. had promised to allow to J. F., and that the production of the documents, relating to the bills of costs, ought to be left to the discretion of the taxing Master; and the petition was dismissed, with costs.

On the 11th of July 1837 John Gordon obtained an order to tax the bills of fees and disbursements of George Woolley Poole, as his attorney or solicitor, in this and various other causes, suits, and matters.

This petition asked that the taxing Master might, in completing the taxation, have regard to an agreement evidenced by documents of the 27th of July 1828 and the 27th of August 1829, and that all charges for attendances on, and conferences with, James John Frazer, whether expressed in the bills of costs to have been had with him or otherwise, might be disallowed, and that such part of the profits as it was stipulated that J. J. Frazer should receive, might be deducted from the amount to be allowed to G. W. Poole on such taxation, and that he might be allowed such portion of profit only as he would have been entitled to receive for his own use had J. J. Frazer been in lawful partnership with him upon the terms of an equal division of profits. It also asked for the production of papers relating to the bills of costs, and the reference, and to the agreement.

It appeared that J. J. Frazer, a writer to the Signet, was previous to 1825 employed by J. Gordon as his professional agent in Scotland. Mr. Frazer at that time employed Mr. Poole as his agent in England, and in 1825 he employed him to act as solicitor in any causes, suits, or matters in which J. Gordon was engaged in England.

J. Gordon subsequently sanctioned Mr. Poole's acting as his solicitor, but he was not aware that Frazer was either directly or indirectly concerned or interested in the practice or profits of G. W. Poole as an attorney and solicitor, or otherwise, except that Poole was the agent of J. J. Frazer in appeals from the Court of Scotland to the House of Lords, and as such might be entitled, according to practice, to some division of the profits of such business.

On the 22nd of July 1829, John Gordon ceased to employ J. J. Frazer, except in matters connected with the defendant, Robert Dalzell, but G. W. Poole continued to act as the solicitor of J. Gordon, and correspond with Frazer as though he was the agent of J. Gordon, until about March 1830.

About 1832, a litigation in Scotland between J. Gordon and J. J. Frazer relative to the accounts and transactions was referred to judicial arbiters, and at that time J. Gordon suspected that J. J. Frazer had secured to himself a remuneration out of the profits of the bills of costs in respect of all business done in England; but, in answer to an inquiry by Mr. James Bennett, who had acted as agent for J. Gordon, Mr. Poole stated that Mr. Frazer never had any connexion in business with him in any other respect than as his agent. That in matters of appeal to the House of Lords, in which the fees were ample, he had sometimes made him small allowances; that it was the practice with nine-tenths of the agents so to do, and was done between English agents, and that it was recognized by the Courts, but that Mr. Frazer, who was neither an attorney nor solicitor of any of the courts in England, was not, and never was, a partner in his business.

While before the judicial arbiters in Scotland, objections were made to a claim for large sums of money paid by Mr. Frazer to G. W. Poole on account of his bills of costs against John Gordon; and on the 20th of March 1833 Mr. Poole wrote to the judicial arbiter:—"My employment in the subject-matter of the bills was that of an independent solicitor, retained unconditionally, and without reservation of any latent controul or indirect pecuniary participation in the profits of my professional labours by any one. After Mr. Frazer ceased to act as J. Gordon's agent, I had no communication with him relative to J. Gordon's business."

In consequence of these and other letters of Mr. Poole to the same effect, J. Gordon abandoned the objections before the judicial arbiters, and did not assert them in the petitions upon which the order for taxation, &c. was made.

In 1837, J. Gordon ceased to employ Mr. Poole as his solicitor, and in June 1839 J. J. Frazer died, and in 1843 an inspection of the following letters from Mr. Poole to Mr. Frazer was obtained:—

"London, 27th of July, 1828.

"Sir,—In consideration of your having obtained for me the business of the Johnstone family (which was business in which J. Gordon and Masterton Ure were trustees) I oblige myself to pay you one-half of the free profits arising therefrom, and that so long as I shall retain said business, either directly or indirectly.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, G. W. Poole."

And on the back of the same letter was written as follows:—

"Edinburgh, 27th of August, 1829.

"Sir,—The within written contract of copartnery I agree shall refer to all business in which I am at present, or shall in future be, either directly or indirectly, employed by you, and through your means and interest, and I oblige myself to pay to you the one-half of the free profits thereof, so long as I shall retain the same, either directly or indirectly.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, G. W. Poole."

In 1851, under a commission to examine witnesses at Edinburgh in a suit between J. Gordon and G. W. Poole, upon an inspection of other documents deposited under processes or actions depending in the Scotch courts between J. Gordon and G. W. Poole, other letters and also accounts were discovered, which afforded evidence that the agreement between G. W. Poole and J. J. Frazer had been concluded and acted upon, and that payments had been made to Frazer in respect of them.

Upon obtaining this evidence, J. Gordon presented this petition, and one question raised was, whether any agreement could be made to allow a person not qualified to practice in England as an attorney or solicitor any part of the profits to arise from the business done.

Mr. Roupell, Mr. Willcock, and Mr. Horsey, in support of the application.—The letters which had been discovered afforded clear evidence of an agreement between Messrs. Poole and Frazer that the latter, who was not qualified to practise as a solicitor, was to participate in the profits of a solicitor's business, and that, in the character of a partner: such an agreement was contrary to the policy of the law, and also of the provisions of the 22 Geo. 2. c. 46. s. 11. (1). It would also have the effect of multiplying the charges upon the client, as it would operate as an inducement to increase the number of attendances upon Mr. Frazer, as well as the number of letters between them; the policy of the law was altogether defeated, as the party trusted to execute a particular business might not be the party who did it, and it might be left to some clerk, or other unqualified person, who had no right to participate in the profits, and even the attention of the principal might be taken away by a diminution of his profits; the agreement, therefore, was illegal: and as Frazer was the agent of J. Gordon, and had no right to make a contract for his own pecuniary advantage, especially at the expense of his principal, it must be considered that it was an agreement made for the benefit of J. Gordon, and that Mr. Poole ought to be disallowed so much of the charges as he had agreed to allow to Mr. Frazer—Coates v. Hawkyard (2), Sumner v. Ridgway (3), Parker v. Harcourt (4), Wyburd v. Stanton (5).

Mr. R. Palmer, for Mr. Poole, was not heard.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—This is an application to disallow, on the taxation of a bill of costs between Mr. Poole and John Gordon, all the charges which, under an agreement, Mr. Frazer was to have the benefit of. In the year 1829, an agreement was entered into between Mr. Frazer and Mr. Poole, by which Mr. Poole was to pay to Mr. Frazer one-half of such profits as he should make from the business which John Gordon should give to him. In 1829 Mr. Frazer ceased to be the agent of John Gordon, who, however, employed Mr. Poole as his solicitor down to the year 1837, and it is in respect of any share which Mr. Frazer might have been entitled to, or might have received, under that agreement, that Mr. Gordon contends that Mr. Poole is not entitled to receive any allowance on taxation of his bill. Either the agreement made between Mr. Frazer and Mr. Poole was legal or it was illegal. If it was legal, no question can arise upon the subject, because Mr. Frazer undoubtedly did not contract on the part of his principal, but for himself, and Mr. Gordon cannot be entitled to any benefit from a legal agreement to which he is no party. But, supposing it to be an illegal contract, the argument that Mr. Gordon was defrauded cannot be sustained, because Mr. Poole could charge no more than he was entitled to, and the items were subject to the moderation of the taxing Master, and Mr. Gordon would only have to pay what, assuming there was no contract between them, the taxing Master should find to be due.

(1) 22 Geo. 2. c. 46. s. 11. "Whereas divers persons who are not examined, sworn, or admitted to act as attorneys or solicitors in any court of law or equity, do, in conjunction with, or by the assistance or connivance of certain sworn attorneys and solicitors, and by various subtle contrivances, intrude themselves into, and act and practise in the office and business of attorneys and solicitors to the great prejudice and loss of many of his Majesty's subjects, and the scandal of the profession of the law: Be it therefore enacted, that from and after the 29th day of September, which shall be in the year of our Lord 1749, if any sworn attorney or solicitor shall act as agent for any person or persons not duly qualified to act as an attorney or solicitor as aforesaid, or permit or suffer his name to be in any ways made use of upon the account, or for the profit of any unqualified person or persons, or send any process to such unqualified person or persons, thereby to enable him or them to appear, act or practise in any respect as an attorney or solicitor, knowing him not to be duly qualified as aforesaid, and complaint shall be made thereof in a summary way to the Court from whence any such process did issue, and proof made thereof upon oath to the satisfaction of the Court, that such sworn attorney or solicitor hath offended therein as aforesaid, then, and in such case, every such attorney or solicitor so offending shall be struck off the roll, and for ever after disabled from practising as an attorney or solicitor, and in that case and upon such complaint and proof made as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Court to commit such unqualified person so acting or practising as aforesaid to the prison of the said Court for any time not exceeding one year."

(5) 4 Ibid. 179.

The 22 Geo. 2. c. 46. s. 11. was then referred to. This is a highly penal statute, which must be construed strictly. Mr. Poole did not act as the agent for any person not duly qualified; he was the solicitor of Mr. Gordon, and was authorised to act for him. Neither did Mr. Poole permit or suffer his name to be used upon the account or for the profit of any unqualified person, or send any process to such person to enable him to act or practise as an attorney or solicitor knowing him not to be duly qualified: had he done this, and had complaint been made, he would have been liable to be struck off the rolls. The meaning of the act was that if a solicitor does not act himself, but allowed a person not duly qualified to act as solicitor, then he was liable to be struck off the rolls; and had Mr. Poole lent his name to Mr. Frazer, and allowed him to act as an attorney or solicitor in his name, he would have been liable to the penalty under the 22 Geo. 2. c. 46. s. 11; but there was nothing in this clause which said that an attorney acting as such and being responsible for his business, and liable in case of misconduct in that business, may not give a charge on the profits, or even a proportion of the profits to another person. I am very far from saying that the contract with Mr. Frazer was legal, but assuming that this was an illegal contract and came within the clause, what would be the penalty? Is the client to get the benefit of it? Is the client to get the benefit against the person so acting, that he is not to pay his bill of costs? The penalty is, that the solicitor shall be struck off the rolls, not that he shall lose the benefit of his profits. Upon what ground or consideration, or upon what legal principle or authority is it assumed that this case is obnoxious to this clause, and that the client is to have the benefit of it? The cases of Sumner v. Ridgway and Coates v. Hawkyard do not apply. In order to compel a man acting as a solicitor to take out his certificate he was, if he acted without it, deprived of his costs; and had Mr. Poole not taken out his certificate he could not, as against Mr. Gordon, have charged more than the money out of pocket. But, assuming the contract to be illegal, what is there to shew that Mr. Gordon is entitled to the benefit of it?

It may be illegal upon two grounds, upon the policy of the clause in the 22 Geo. 2. c. 46. If so, the penalty is, that the solicitor shall be struck off the rolls. It may be illegal upon the general policy of the law; the effect, then, would be simply this, that Mr. Frazer could not invoke the law against Mr. Poole, or obtain payment of the amount which the contract gives. But it would be a strange law if Mr. Gordon could get the benefit of that contract, when the parties to it could not get the benefit of it. And in this petition Mr. Gordon seeks to get the benefit of the contract between Mr. Frazer and Mr. Poole, the latter being his solicitor, and the former the agent of that solicitor. If the contract had been entered into by Mr. Gordon he might, undoubtedly, have got the benefit of it. But this contract is not of that description; and I do not mean by the slightest observation to say that it is a contract which can be supported or made a legal contract, but it is not on that ground that Mr. Gordon is entitled to the benefit of it. Suppose a solicitor, in reduced circumstances, made an arrangement with his creditors by which he said, "I will pay a portion of my profits to you, if you will allow me to carry on my business, and will not make the matter public and not bring actions against me." Could any one pretend that the effect of that would be, that all the clients of that attorney would be entitled to deduct from their bills of costs the proportion which he undertook to pay to his various creditors? It might be said that the contract made with the creditors was not a legal one, and that the only way to make it legal would be to make it a fixed sum; but it would be a strange doctrine to say, that all the clients would be entitled to deduct from their bills of costs the proportion which he paid to his creditors. This petition cannot, in my opinion, be supported, and Mr. Gordon cannot get the benefit of it by any proceeding of this description. Whether he can by any other means I do not say, but certainly I do not encourage any further attempt. It is then said, that there are no documents shewing the nature of the business done; but no petition is required for that, as it rests in the discretion of the taxing Master, who has full power to order the production of such documents as he shall deem necessary. My opinion, therefore, is, that the petition must be dismissed, with costs.

Dec. 3, 8. } JOHNSON v. BALL.

Will—Memorandum—Trust.

A testator, by his will, bequeathed a policy of assurance on his own life to A. and B. upon the uses of a letter signed by them and himself. At the date of the will there was no such letter. Subsequently the testator addressed a note to his executors and signed a memorandum, by which he stated his wishes as to the disposition of the monies to be received in respect of the policy. The testator kept the policy in his possession until his death:—Held, that no trust was created by the memorandum, and that the policy formed a part of the residue.

G. R. Lamb, being entitled to a policy of assurance on his own life, made his will, dated the 21st of February 1844, and thereby bequeathed the policy to J. Ball and T. Manners, in the following terms: "To hold the same upon the uses appointed by a letter signed by them and myself;" and appointed J. Blackett, J. Hadland and W. Bell his executors.

At the date of the will no letter or other document relating to the policy was in existence.

On the 4th of August 1845 the testator signed a paper, which was in the following terms:—

"To J. Blackett, J. Hadland and W. Bell, Esqs.

"My Dear Sirs,—I made my last will and testament in 1844, wherein, amongst other things, I left my policy of life assurance, being No. 25,098, unto John Ball, of &c., and Thomas Manners, of &c., to be delivered up to them for certain purposes which they have agreed to carry out.

"Your obedient servant,

"G. R. Lamb."

Mr. Ball having then requested to know what the trusts of the policy were to be, the testator dictated the following letter to him, and afterwards signed it.

"I wish my policy of insurance left to John Ball, Thomas Manners, and Henry Ball, to be divided as follows: I give to Mrs. Catherine Johnson the interest accruing from the sum total during the term of her natural life, and, on her death, I will that it be divided as follows"—[The letter then proceeded to distribute the amount among the five children therein named of Mrs. Johnson].

"Signed the 4th of August 1845, G. R. Lamb, 75, Queen Street, Cheapside."

The testator kept the policy in his possession until his death, and died in June 1850.

The bill in this case was filed by Catherine Johnson, who claimed a benefit under the letter of the 4th of August 1845, against the executors and other parties interested, for the purpose of having a declaration as to the rights of the parties to the policy.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Speed, for the plaintiff, contended that by the will and the letter a valid trust had been declared, and cited—

Mr. Daniel, for the executors, contended that a valid trust had not been declared.

Mr. Rogers, Mr. Shebbeare and Mr. Bates, for other parties.

Mr. Bacon replied.

PARKER, V.C.—The testator gave the policy of assurance in question to Ball and Manners, to hold the same upon the uses appointed by a letter signed by them and himself. It was not suggested that any such letter existed at the time when the will was made. The document which was relied on by the plaintiff was signed by the testator some time after. Even supposing that the will referred to a letter to be afterwards signed, it would be impossible to give effect to any such letter as a declaration of trust. To do so would be to give effect, as a codicil, to a paper subsequent in date to the will, and not properly attested. A testator cannot by will prospectively create for himself a power to dispose of property by an instrument not properly attested. The cases under the Statute of Frauds, The Countess de Zichy Ferraris v. the Marquis of Hertford (1) and Briggs v. Penny (2), are not applicable to the present case. It was argued that the policy was bequeathed to trustees, and that, if the trustees admitted the trust, the Court would execute it. The cases, however, in which the Court has established a trust on the admission or confession of the trustees are not applicable to the present case. The letter of the testator cannot operate as a gift or settlement by act inter vivos. It was merely in furtherance of a particular disposition; and if the will had been revoked, the letter must have dropped with it. No doubt the testator intended to make a provision for the plaintiff and her children; and it is with regret that the Court feels compelled to declare that the testator has failed in carrying that intention into effect. The executors, therefore, must hold the policy as part of the residue.

Jan. 22. } PORTER v. WATTS.

Trustee—Discharge from Trusteeship—Costs.

A trustee desiring to be discharged from his trust, without any changes as to the position of the trust property, or the persons with whom he was associated, and seeking the aid of the Court for that purpose, will not be allowed any costs, but will not be compelled to pay any.

Mr. Filchett, being entitled to a mortgage debt charged on real estate belonging to Mr. Burrell, by a deed of settlement, dated in 1846, conveyed the debt and the mortgaged property to Mr. Porter and two other trustees, upon trust for himself (the settlor) for life, with remainder to the children of Mr. Burrell, the mortgagor. The settlement contained a power for the trustees, with the consent of the settlor, during his life, and, after his death, at their discretion, to vary the securities.

In 1851 the settlor died.

This was a claim filed by Mr. Porter, the object of which was, that he might be discharged from the trust, and that a new trustee might be appointed in his place. In his affidavit in support of the claim, Mr. Porter stated that the security was scanty, and that the mortgagor had cut down timber.

Mr. Lewis, for the claim, cited Greenwood v. Wakeford (1), in which the Master of the Rolls said, "If the trustee finds the trust estate involved in intricate and complicated questions, which were not and could not have been in contemplation at the time when the trust was undertaken, he has, in consequence of that change of circumstances, a right to come to the Court to be relieved." As long as the settlor was alive, the trustees were free from liability as to keeping the security, as it could only be changed by his direction. Now, however, they may be liable if they do not actively interfere; and, considering the circumstances in which the property stands, the father being the mortgagor, and the children being entitled to the mortgage debt, there is a great difficulty in knowing how to act. There is a difficulty then from which the trustees ought to be released. The rule that a trustee retiring without a reason shall not have his costs is laid down in Howard v. Rhodes (2). This, however, is not the case here.

Mr. Chandless and Mr. Briggs, for the two other trustees, said they were willing to stay if Mr. Porter stayed, but that, if he retired, they wished to retire.

Mr. Prior, for the children of Mr. Burrell.

PARKER, V.C.—I think that the trustee has a right to his discharge. Here is a settlement in 1846, and nothing has since taken place either as to the position of the property, or the persons with whom Mr. Porter was associated. There is no change of circumstances. The trustee comes here for his own benefit. I will not make him pay any costs, but I will not allow him to receive any. The order will be to refer it to the Master to appoint new trustees. The costs of the two other trustees to be paid out of the estate. No order as to Mr. Porter's costs. Mr. Porter, however, it must be observed, will not cease to be a trustee until a new one is appointed in his place.

In the matter of THE DIRECT EXETER, PLY-MOUTH AND DEVONPORT RAILWAY COMPANY, ex
parte TANNER.

Company—Winding-up Act—Contributory—Provisional Committee—Committee of Management.

A. was a member of the provisional committee of a projected railway company, and, as such, attended a meeting of the provisional committee, and concurred in the appointment of a number of gentlemen as a committee of management. This committee of management, immediately on their appointment, undertook the exclusive conduct of the affairs of the company, and gave orders to engineers to make surveys, &c., in the name of the company, and incurred considerable expenses in respect of the undertaking, but, after some time, abandoned the concern. The provisional committee, after such abandonment, held a meeting, at which, under the impression that they were personally liable, they came to certain resolutions as to contributions among themselves in respect to the expenses incurred. A. attended this meeting, and took an active part in carrying out the resolutions:—Held, that A. was not liable as a contributory.

The circumstances relating to the projection and abandonment of the above-mentioned company will be found in Besley's case (before Lord Cottenham), 2 Hall & Twells, 375; 2 Mac. & Gor. 176; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 362; (before Lord Truro), 3 Mac. & Gor. 287; and Roberts's case, 2 Hall & Twells, 391; 2 Mac. & Gor. 192; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 368.

Captain Tanner was a member of the provisional committee, and attended a meeting of that committee on the 7th of October, which was called for the purpose of appointing a committee of management, secretary, and officers, and concurred in a resolution that certain gentlemen who were named should be the committee of management.

Immediately after their appointment the committee of management took upon themselves the entire direction of the scheme, issued prospectuses, received applications for shares, employed engineers to make plans, surveys, &c. in the name of the company, and opened an account with a bank at Exeter in the name of the company.

The committee of management finding that it was impossible to carry out the project, prepared a report which is stated in the books of the provisional committee and referred to in the account of the meeting next mentioned.

On the 31st of December 1845 a meeting was called of the provisional committee. The account of this meeting was contained in the books of the provisional committee, and the entry was entitled, "At a meeting of the provisional committee held this 31st of December 1845." The entry then went on to state that, "at this meeting a report of the managing committee was read, which stated that the allottees had failed to pay their deposits, that debts had been contracted beyond the funds at the disposal of the committee, that the scheme was abandoned, that the opinion of counsel had been taken to the effect that the provisional committee were liable collectively and individually for all the debts of the company, and the allottees were liable to the committee for the amount of their deposits." The entry then further stated that the report was received, approved, and adopted, and that the meeting resolved—"That it appearing from counsel's opinion that the whole of the provisional committee were collectively and individually liable for the debts of the company, and the committee, having agreed to pay 3s. per share on 200 shares each, the provisional committee do pay the like amount per share on 100 shares each to meet the liabilities of the company; that a committee of four persons be appointed to co-operate with the managing committee to prepare the accounts for inspection at the next meeting."

Capt. Tanner attended this meeting and concurred in the resolution, and was appointed one of the four persons referred to in the resolution, which persons were called the "Finance committee," and took an active part in obtaining contributions and in endeavouring to wind up the affairs of the company.

The Master having placed Capt. Tanner's name on the list of contributories, this was a motion to exclude it from the list.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Karlake, for the motion.

Mr. Daniel and Mr. Roxburgh, for the official manager.

Mr. Malins replied.

The following cases were cited—

Besley's case, Supra.

Roberts's case, Supra.

Ex parte Cotile, 2 Hall & Twells, 382; 2 Mac. & Gor. 185; s.c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 366; 2 House of Lords Cas. 647.

Hole's case, 3 De Gex & Sm. 241.

Half's case, 3 Ibid. 214; s.c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 386.

Carriek's case, 1 Sim. N.S. 505.

PARKER, V.C.—In support of this application, the object of which is to remove Capt. Tanner's name from the list of contributories, it is insisted that the question as to his liability is concluded by decisions already made in the matter of the company, and Roberts's case and Besley's case are especially relied on. In the course of the argument I stated that these decisions did not appear to me to be conclusive on the question now raised, the essential difference between the present case and all the others being, that Capt. Tanner was a party to the resolution of the 7th of October 1845, appointing the committee of management. This circumstance did not exist in the case of Roberts. It is true that Roberts was at the meeting, but he left it before the resolution was passed, and the Lords Commissioners expressly rest their judgment in the case on the circumstance that he did not concur in the resolution. They say, in their judgment, "Now, here it appears that before any resolution was finally come to, Mr. Roberts had left the meeting, and so the resolutions passed certainly were not his acts. Indeed, if he had concurred, all that he would have concurred in would have been in appointing the persons named in that behalf to be the committee of management; and, as was pointed out in the judgment in the Exchequer (1), to which we have referred in the preceding case, it by no means necessarily follows from thence, that the parties appointing the committee of management gave them authority to make contracts. It is not, however, necessary to discuss this; for it is certain, on the evidence before us, that Roberts did not concur in the resolution by which the committee of management was appointed." In referring to Besley's case again, it appears that Besley had nothing to do with the meeting, and the Lord Chancellor rests his judgment on the fact that he did not attend this meeting or any meeting before the 31st of December 1845. This is repeatedly stated in his Lordship's judgment, especially where he says, in p. 306 of that report, "I cannot help thinking that the facts of the case were not accurately and correctly presented to the mind of Lord Cottenham. According to the report of his judgment it would seem as if it had been represented to him that Mr. Besley had attended meetings of the provisional committee before the provisional committee appointed the managing committee, which might have made, though I do not say that it would have made, some difference; and it might have been urged that, by appointing a managing committee to prosecute the scheme and incur all the expenses incidental to it, he became liable to contribute to the payment of such expenses. But this was not the fact: Mr. Besley never did attend any meeting of any committee till all the expenses had been incurred, and in the mean time he had desired his name to be withdrawn; which desire the committee expressed their intention to comply with."

(1) Reynell v. Lewis and Wyld v. Hopkins, 15 Mee. & W. 517; s.c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 25.

The question before me is as to Capt. Tanner's liability to contribute to the expenses incurred by the committee of management, in whose appointment he must be taken to have concurred; and I consider that this question must depend entirely on the relation in which the committee of management stood to the provisional committee, or, at least, to those members of that committee who concurred in that appointment. If the committee of management is to be regarded as a sub-committee of the provisional committee, deriving authority from them and acting for them, the members of the provisional committee who appointed the committee of management may well be liable upon contracts of that committee, or to contribute towards expenses incurred by them; but the case would be very different if the committee of management is to be regarded as a body of persons acting in the formation of the projected company, for themselves, and independently of the provisional committee. This distinction is adverted to by the Court of Exchequer in Reynell v. Lewis and Wyld v. Hopkins. In one of these cases the defendant had allowed his name to be placed in a public prospectus as a member of the provisional committee; the same prospectus described other persons as the acting committee, and the Lord Chief Baron, in delivering the judgment of the Court, at page 530 (after speaking of the provisional committee-man making himself responsible for his own acts), says, "There are other cases in which the question does not assume so simple a form, and where there is evidence that the defendant has not only consented to be a provisional committee-man, but has authorized his name to be inserted in a prospectus, not generally, but a particular prospectus, in which, in some cases, certain persons are described as the acting committee, in others, solicitors are named, or engineers, or a secretary. If such prospectus has been so publicly circulated with the defendant's consent that the jury would presume that the plaintiff knew of it, or if the plaintiff has had it shewn to him at or before the time of making the contract, and has in either case acted upon it in making the contract, the question is, what inference ought a reasonable man to draw from the contents of that paper? This must, of course, depend upon the terms of each particular prospectus. If the prospectus state merely the names of the provisional committee and nothing more, and no light be derived from the context, that circumstance does not alter the liability of the defendant. If not responsible, as being one of that committee in fact, he cannot become so by the representation of the fact. If it states the names of the acting committee also, where that has been appointed, is the meaning that the acting committee is to take the whole management, to the exclusion of the provisional committee, their provisional character having ceased; in which case the provisional committee would not be liable: or does it mean that the provisional committee-men have appointed the acting committee, or the majority of it, on their behalf, and as their agents; in which case they would be liable for the contracts of the acting committee, or the majority, made as such agents?"

Now, in the present case, I think that the committee of management was a body of persons acting for themselves, independently of the provisional committee, and not acting as agents for and on behalf of the provisional committee. At the outset of the project the provisional committee, as usual in these cases, was formed, consisting of persons who were desirous of promoting the scheme, and who agreed to act for that purpose provisionally, that is to say, until some other arrangement should be made. When matters were more advanced, a sufficient number of persons were found willing to undertake to do what was necessary to form the projected company, and to make an application to parliament for an act; and these persons, at a meeting of the provisional committee, held on the 7th of October 1845, were formed into the committee of management. When the undertaking had advanced thus far, the provisional arrangements and the duties of the provisional committee appear to me to have ceased. The committee of management was the committee of management of the independent company, and not of the affairs of the provisional committee, and the contracts they entered into were on behalf of the company they had undertaken to form, and not on behalf of the provisional committee. For instance, the engineers employed to make and deposit the plans, surveys, and sections were engaged in the name of the company, and the account opened with the Exeter bank was in the name of the company. I consider that the committee of management charged themselves with these duties on their own responsibility, and were in no sense the agents of the provisional committee; and, looking at the decisions on this subject, I see no ground on which the committee of management would be entitled at law or in equity to call on the provisional committee to contribute towards the expenses incurred. By the end of December 1845 the committee of management found it impracticable to establish the intended company, and the project was abandoned. Monies, however, had been expended, and debts incurred by the committee, and they made a report, in which, after giving the account of what they had done, and of the position of the undertaking, they stated that they had been advised by counsel that the provisional committee were collectively and individually responsible for the debts of the company, and a meeting of provisional committee-men was called for the 31st of December, to receive this report, and to take into consideration the liabilities, and decide on the best means of settling the claims on the company. The provisional committee have taken no part whatever in the proceedings of the committee of management; they appear to have ceased to act from the 7th of October, and, as I conceive, they were in no way liable in respect of the debts incurred. Capt. Tanner attended the meeting of the 31st of December, as a member of the provisional committee, but, if I am right in the opinion I have expressed as to his position, he was at that time under no liability, either to the creditors or by way of contribution to the committee of management. I consider he attended the meeting under the same circumstances as Besley did; and if this be so, the Lord Chancellor's judgment in Besley's case establishes that he did not become liable as a contributory by concurring in the resolutions that passed at the meeting. Subsequently to this time, Capt. Tanner took an active part in winding up the affairs of the company; he attended several meetings of the provisional committee for the purpose of adjusting claims on the company, and obtaining contributions from other persons supposed to be liable, and he acted on a finance committee appointed to investigate the accounts of the projected company, and to prepare a balance-sheet. But, if he was not originally liable as a contributory, I do not think that his subsequent conduct could make him liable. The Lord Chancellor's observations in Besley's case appear to be conclusive on this part of the case. His Lordship says, at page 309 of 3 Mac. & G. "Such is the state of facts before the concern was abandoned; and if up to that time no liability to the creditors attached to Mr. Besley, nor any liability to contribute to indemnify the committee, his liability, if any, must result from his conduct subsequent to the abandonment of the concern; and here I must repeat that, if the evidence did not disclose what the conduct of Mr. Besley had been before the debts were contracted, his subsequent conduct might lead to an inference, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that he had so conducted himself as to be liable; but, with the knowledge the Court has, that no such conduct had been pursued, the subsequent facts can create a liability only from their legal effect. If Mr. Besley was liable neither to the creditors nor to the committee before the concern was abandoned, upon what consideration was he bound either to pay the debts or to contribute to indemnify the committee, or how will partial payments, even if made under a supposed liability which did not exist, create a liability to make further payments?"

For these reasons, I am of opinion that Capt. Tanner is entitled to have his name removed from the list of contributories.

An attachment for want of answer is issuable against a feme covert who has obtained.

an order to answer separately from her husband.

This was a motion for an attachment against a married woman, one of the defendants, who had appeared separately to the plaintiff's bill, and had obtained an order to answer separately from her husband, but who had not put in her answer to the bill.

Mr. Kinglake, for the motion, said, that such an order as was now sought had been made by the late Master of the Rolls in the case of Mrs. Lydia Taylor.

TURNER, V.C. said he did not know what other process could be adopted; and, therefore, made the order.

Order accordingly.

Baron and Feme—Equity for a Settlement—Assignment by the Husband of Wife's Interest—Form of Settlement.

A, the husband of B, to whom a share of the residue of a testator's estate had been bequeathed, assigned it to C. for valuable consideration. A sum of stock representing this share was carried to the account of B. in a suit. The proper terms of a settlement of the part allowed to B, by way of equity of settlement, were held to be to B. for life, with remainder to her children as she should appoint, with remainder to the children in default of appointment, and, in default of children, if B. should survive A, to B. absolutely; but, if A. should survive B, to C.

The Court has the power of directing that, in the last event, the fund shall be at the disposal of the wife by will; and that in default of such disposition, it shall go to the next-of-kin of B; but a special case must be made for such a settlement, and the circumstance that B. had needy relatives was held not sufficient to justify it.

A testator bequeathed to Mrs. Rigg, the wife of Mr. Rigg, a share of the residue of his personal estate. A sum of stock was, in respect of this share, carried over in this cause to her separate account. Mr. Rigg had assigned all his interest in this share to Mr. Hackblock for valuable consideration. The usual reference was made to the Master to state what part of this sum should be settled for the benefit of Mrs. Rigg, and what ought to be the terms of the settlement.

The Master, by his report, stated the sum which he thought ought to be settled, and also that this sum ought to be transferred to trustees upon trust for Mrs. Rigg for her life, with remainder upon the trusts therein mentioned for the benefit of her children, and, in default of children who should attain a vested interest, upon the trusts following (that is to say), "If the said A. M. Rigg should survive her husband, upon trust for the said A. M. Rigg, her executors, administrators, and assigns; but, if the said A. M. Rigg should happen to die in the lifetime of her husband, then upon such trusts as she, notwithstanding coverture, should by deed or will direct or appoint; and, in default of such direction and appointment, upon trust for such person or persons as, under or by virtue of the statutes for the distribution of the effects of intestates, would at the time of her decease, have been entitled to her personal estate as her next-of-kin, in case she had died intestate and without having been married."

Mrs. Rigg presented a petition for the confirmation of the Master's report, and Mr. Hackblock also presented a petition, by which he objected to the Master's report as to the settlement of this fund in default of children, and insisted, that, in that event, a transfer of the settled funds ought to be directed to be made to him.

These petitions now came on to be heard.

PARKER, V.C. (after stating the case).—The question in this case is as to the destination of the fund if Mrs. Rigg should die without issue in the lifetime of her husband. The Master has proposed that, in such event, the fund should be held upon such trusts as she should by deed or will appoint, and, in default of appointment, for her next-of-kin. To this, a purchaser for value from her husband excepted, and proposed, either that the settlement should contain no provision in that event, or that it should be declared that the trustees should hold the stock in trust for him. I believe that the custom of the Court has been to settle the fund of a married woman in the form which the Master has proposed in the present case. On principle this is correct. The right to a settlement does not arise merely from the obligation of the husband to support his wife and children; it rests also on this—that the husband's legal right is inconsistent with the wife's equitable right. There is, then, no reason for confining the wife's interest under the settlement to a life interest. The Master, it appears, has proposed to give the wife a power of appointment by deed or will. I think that this power should be confined to a testamentary appointment.

The case came before the Lords Justices, by way of appeal.

It appeared that a brother and sister of Mrs. Rigg were in needy circumstances.

Mr. Wigram and Mr. Toller, for Mrs. Rigg.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. Eddis, for Mr. Hackblock.

The LORDS JUSTICES said that they were of opinion that the provision in the settlement giving the capital to the lady, in the event of there being no issue and her surviving her husband, was right. They thought, however, that, in the event of the husband surviving, there was not and ought not to be any established rule that the property should, as a matter of course, be subject to the disposition of the wife by her will, and that in default of appointment it should go to her next-of-kin. Circumstances might exist in a particular case which would render one or both of such provisions proper, and they would not suggest that it was not in the power of the Court so to frame a settlement, but they thought that a special case must be made out for it. They thought that, in the circumstances of this case, there ought not to be in the event of the lady dying leaving her husband surviving, any power enabling her to appoint to persons not being her children. No case was made out for those who were strangers or collaterals. This lady had a brother and sister in needy circumstances, but that was not sufficient to warrant the terms of the settlement. The settlement must be varied by a direction that, in the events of the wife dying in the lifetime of her husband and failure of issue, the settled fund should be held in trust for the purchaser from the husband.

Lapsed Legacy—Relations—Period of Division—Costs.

*A testator by his will recited that on his marriage he had entered into a bond to leave his wife the sum of 800*l.* on his death, and that he intended shortly to distribute a sum of 6,000*l.* in his lifetime amongst her relations, in lieu of any claims under the bond. The testator then directed that, in case of his death before carrying his intention into effect, the said sum of 6,000*l.* should be divided between and amongst the said relations of his wife in such manner, shares, and proportions as would have been the case if his wife had died possessed of the said sum a spinster and intestate. The testator's wife had died before the date of his will, and had left sixteen next-of-kin, five of whom died before the testator:—Held, that the eleven surviving next-of-kin took each one-sixteenth of the 6,000*l., and that the shares which the other five would have taken had they lived lapsed, and went to the testator's residuary legatees.

Held also, that the lapsed shares, being the only residuary property over which the Court had power, should bear the costs of the petition for determining the question raised upon the construction of the will.

It appeared upon this petition that John Ham, previously to his marriage with Eleanor Biles, executed a bond to J. R. Warne, on the 17th of September 1799, in the penalty of 1,600*l.*, the condition of which bond was, that if the heirs, executors, and administrators of J. Ham should pay the sum of 800*l.* to J. R. Warne, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, within six calendar months after the decease of the said J. Ham, upon the trusts after declared, then the said bond should be void. The trusts were for the said Eleanor Biles, if she should be then living, and for her to receive the interest for her life; and in case of her death, then in trust to pay the said 800*l.*, and the growing interest thereof, to and amongst such child or children of Eleanor Biles by the said J. Ham, in such manner and proportion as the survivor of them should by his or her will give, direct or appoint; and in default of such gift, direction or appointment, to and amongst such child or children equally; and in case of no such child, then in trust to pay the 800*l.*, and the growing interest thereof, unto such person or persons as Eleanor Biles should by her will give, direct or appoint, and in default of such gift, direction, or appointment to her executors or administrators.

The marriage took place, and Eleanor Biles, afterwards Eleanor Ham, died intestate and without issue, in July 1844, and without having made any appointment of the 800*l.* J. Ham then took out letters of administration to his wife, and on the 13th of September 1844 the said J. Ham made his will, with a codicil annexed. The codicil was in the following words:—
 “Memorandum.—Whereas, on my marriage with my late wife, Eleanor Biles, I entered into a bond to leave her the sum of 800*l.* on my death, as in the said bond is mentioned, and I intend shortly to sell out 6,000*l.* stock, part of the sum of 20,000*l.* stock now standing in my name in the $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. annuities, and to distribute the same in my lifetime amongst her relations, in lieu of any claims for the said sum of 800*l.* under the said bond. Now, I do hereby will and direct that, in case of my death before carrying such my intention into effect, the said sum of 6,000*l.* stock shall not be considered as part of my residuary estate, but shall be divided between and amongst the said relations of my said late wife, in such manner shares, and proportions as would have been the case in case my said late wife had died possessed of the said sum of 6,000*l.* stock, a spinster and intestate.”

The testator, J. Ham, died in February 1849, without having carried the above intention into effect, but his executors sold out of the funds the sum of 6,000*l.*, which they paid into court under the Trustees Relief Act. A petition was then presented praying that the next-of-kin of Eleanor Ham might be declared entitled to the said sum of 6,000*l.* A reference was thereupon directed to the Master to ascertain who were the next-of-kin of Eleanor Ham. The Master reported that there were sixteen nephews and nieces, who were the only next-of-kin of Eleanor Ham living at her death, and that there were eleven of these persons living at the death of the testator J. Ham.

A petition was now presented, praying that the eleven next-of-kin of Eleanor Ham who were living at the death of the testator might be declared to be the parties entitled to the fund in court, and that the money might be equally divided between them. The petition was opposed by the representatives of the five other persons who were amongst the next-of-kin living at the death of Eleanor Ham and claimed each a share in the 6,000*l.* The petition was also opposed by the residuary legatees of the testator, on the ground that the gift was altogether void for uncertainty, and as having been made by the testator upon a mistaken belief of some liability under the bond which did not exist.

Mr. Walker, Mr. Malins, Mr. Sandys, Mr. Grove, and Mr. Wolstenholme appeared for the different next-of-kin who were living at the decease of the testator, and cited—

Doe v. Sheffield, 13 East, 526.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Giffard appeared for the representatives of the next-of-kin of Mrs. Ham who had died after her death and before the death of the testator J. Ham, and contended that they were entitled to share in the fund equally with the other next-of-kin.

Mr. Kenyon Parker and Mr. Milne appeared for the residuary legatees under the will of the testator, and—

Mr. Attwood for the executors of the testator.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The first question is, whether the gift is to fail altogether as having been made on a mistaken supposition of liability to debt; whether there was such a mistake as to make the gift void on that ground. The testator, in the codicil in question, refers to what he calls the claim for 800*l.* on bond; and no doubt that language might be considered to shew that he thought he was liable to some legal claim on the part of his wife's relations. But it is clear to me, also, that it may refer to claims on the part of the relations of a very different nature from claims constituting a legal liability. My own impression is, that he did consider that as by the terms of the bond 800*l.* was limited, so that in the event of there being no issue, which happened, it was to go to his wife absolutely, that if she had happened to survive him, and had then died intestate, her relations would have been entitled to the 800*l.*; and even if she survived him and had made a will, her relations would probably have derived some benefit from the testamentary disposition. When, therefore, he speaks of that claim, he may have considered that they had some sort of moral claim to his consideration, as they might be disappointed in finding that by the death of the wife, having made no appointment, he had, as administrator, become entitled to this absolutely. I think if he had intended only to satisfy what he considered a legal liability he would not have given 6,000*l.* stock, the bond being for no more than 800*l.* That he did consider that his wife was entitled to this is clear from the language he uses in the codicil. In my opinion there is no ground for contending that, by reason of a mistaken supposition of his being under legal liability, the bequest is void.

The next question is, whether it is not void on the ground of uncertainty of description of the persons to take. In the first part of the codicil, where he refers to what his intentions are,—he says—"I intend shortly to sell out 6,000*l.* stock, part of the 20,000*l.*," and to distribute the same in his lifetime amongst her relations, in lieu of any claims. No doubt, if he had done that in his lifetime, he might have given to any relations, and he might have excluded any he pleased; and there is no description of the class of persons, whom he intended when he speaks of "her relations," but what he is there speaking of is what he intended to do by some act in his life; he then directs what is to be done in case he does not do this in his lifetime. He directs the money to be divided between "the said relations of my said late wife." Now, a gift to relations is not void for uncertainty, but has generally been held to mean next-of-kin. There may be something else in the will which may make it void for uncertainty, but it is not void of itself.

Being, then, of opinion that it is neither void on the ground of mistaken supposition of debt, nor on the ground of uncertainty, the next ground is, that the share, at all events, of those who died between the death of the wife and the death of the testator have lapsed to the residuary legatees. That question I will consider presently. There were sixteen persons next-of-kin of the wife at the time of her death in July 1844, and at the death of the testator eleven only were living, five having died. Now, the first point I shall consider is, what the testator meant by the words, "in such manner, shares, and proportions as would have been the case in case my said late wife had died possessed of the said sum of 6,000*l.*, a spinster and intestate." I am urged to construe these words as if the testator had supposed his wife would live just to the period at which the testator himself died, and she had then died a spinster and intestate. I cannot accede to that view; the testator in his codicil refers to the fact that she was dead, calling her his late wife. Knowing that she had died in the preceding month of July, he, inditing the will in September, refers to the fact, and says, "in case my said late wife had died." It appears to me that he clearly meant not to suppose the case of her not being then dead, but to put it on the same footing as if, at the time of her death, she had been possessed of this sum, and had died a spinster and intestate. I think he refers to no other period than that at which she did die, i. e. July 1844. The next point is this: it is said, "Supposing that to be so, still, according to the decided cases, if a gift is to a class of persons, and some of that class of persons die in the interval between the date of the will and the death of the testator, those members of the class who survive shall take the whole." The rule, however, is really this; where the testator gives a legacy or residue to persons whom he designates in such a way as to represent them as a class, for instance, to the children of A, there the period of distribution of the gift is the death of the testator, and the persons who constitute the class at that period shall be considered the persons intended, unless a contrary intention appears from any other clause. Therefore, it appears to me, that you must look at the whole scope of the will for the purpose of seeing whether the testator has indicated any intention to refer to persons constituting a class at the period of distribution. Now, if this had been a special gift to the wife's relations, the case stated would have justified the construction of a gift to the relations of the wife living at the death of the testator; but we have here something which points out very sufficiently what the testator intended as to the persons constituting the class of his wife's relations: for he says, "the 6,000*l.* shall be divided between and amongst the said relations of my said wife, in such manner, shares, and proportions as if she had died possessed of the said sum, a spinster and intestate." Now, what does he mean? He means, it is to go to those persons who as being relations, i. e. next-of-kin, would at her death have been entitled to her personal estate by law, in case she had died a spinster and intestate; and he has shewn what he meant by the term "relations," i. e. the persons who are to take under the Statute of Distributions. It appears that the wife at the time of her death left sixteen relations, nephews and nieces, who exactly answer the description of relations, who would have divided this amongst them in case the wife had so died. Now, if those who survived are to take the whole fund among them, they do not take either in the manner, shares, or proportions in which the testator says they are to take; and I should set aside the words of his direction if I were to say that he had declared they were to take. I am of opinion, therefore, that the persons to whom the testator has given the 6,000*l.* under this description are the sixteen persons who were next-of-kin of the wife living at her death. Now, the fund is given to them in the same manner, shares, and proportions as would have been the case in case she had died a spinster and intestate. Then, what would have been the manner? It would have been as tenants in common. It is, therefore, a gift to these persons as tenants in common; and the plain ordinary effect of a gift in common to persons, some of whom pre-decease the testator, is a lapse of those shares. But it has been contended that the legal personal representatives of those who died in the lifetime of the testator are to take, i. e. that you are to read the codicil thus: it is to go now to the same persons as if he had died possessed of this specific sum, and intestate in 1844, and as if they had not died or parted with it; i. e. I am to try and find out, as to each of those persons who had taken a share of the 6,000*l.*, what had become of his share of the 6,000*l.* It is clear that the testator could have had no such meaning as that. It is a gift to those persons as tenants in common; and if any have died in the lifetime of the testator their shares have lapsed, and go to the residuary legatees. I am, therefore, of opinion that the 6,000*l.* is divisible into sixteen shares, and the surviving next-of-kin will take each one share. As to the five shares undisposed of, they will go to the residuary legatees.

A discussion then arose as to the costs of the petition, whether they were to be borne by the fund in court, or whether they were to be paid out of the testator's residuary estate.

The following cases were cited as to the costs—

In re Ross's Trust, 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 293.

In re Bartholomew's Trust, 16 Sim. 585; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 237.

In re Croyden's Trust, 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 172.

In re Sharpe's Trust, 15 Sim. 470.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—My opinion upon the point is clear, that I have no jurisdiction over anything else than the fund paid into court; and if the whole fund were a particular legacy, I should be obliged to direct the costs of all parties to be paid out of the legacy, and the legacy would lose that benefit. I can have no jurisdiction to order payment out of the residue, which is not before me. The trustees might say they did not admit a residue; and I could not try the question whether they had any or not. But it is clear that I have jurisdiction over this fund, and I find that part of it is residue; therefore I think the costs of the discussion as to the construction of the will should be paid for by the residue, as far as I have to deal with that fund. Now, having determined that five-sixteenths are residue, and having complete jurisdiction over the whole fund, it appears to me that I shall be acting in conformity with the rule laid down by the cases, and in exact accordance with the general principles of the Court, in directing the costs of all parties to be paid out of the five-sixteenths. I admit that it is a hardship upon the residuary legatees, but so it would have been if there had been a suit to administer the whole estate.

 1851. } Ex parte MOUNT in re
 Nov. 19, 22. } BURTON.

Lunacy—Security given by the Committee of the Estate.

The heir-at-law of a lunatic, who with one other person was the next-of-kin of the lunatic, was appointed committee of his person. Another party being proposed, was approved of by the Master in Lunacy as committee of the estate. The committee of the person proposed himself as one surety for the committee of the estate. The Attorney General was willing to accept this security, but declined to do so without the sanction of the Court. An order was made that, upon the allowance to the lunatic being paid direct to the committee of the person, instead of passing intermediately through the hands of the committee of the estate, the committee of the person be accepted as one of the sureties for the committee of the estate, the general rule, however, to remain unaltered.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Speed appeared in support of a petition of the heir-at-law, and one of the two next-of-kin of the lunatic, and who had been appointed committee of his person, praying that he might be accepted as one of the sureties for a gentleman who had been approved of by the Master in Lunacy as committee of the estate. The petitioner had proposed himself as such surety, and the Attorney General had signified his willingness to accept him; but it was stated by the officers in Lunacy that a general rule prevailed that such a course could not be adopted. This rule appeared to be sanctioned by a passage in Mr. Elmer's Practice of Lunacy, 25, but no authorities were cited in support of the position. The Attorney General had intimated his opinion as to the safety of the appointment, and his willingness to sanction it, if the allowance of the lunatic were paid to the committee of the person for the support of the lunatic; but the Attorney General had also intimated that the point had better be mentioned to the Court. The passage in Mr. Elmer's treatise is as follows:—"The committee of the person does not give security, and will not be accepted as security for the committee of the estate." The sufficiency of the committee of the person, the petitioner, Mr. William Foote Mount, was unquestionable, and that he was most likely to see to the due performance of any trust regarding him or his property was plain from the facts which appeared on the report of the Master in Lunacy that, from the death of the lunatic's father, in 1828, until 1843, Mr. Mount acted as such committee, and only resigned from ill-health; that he visited the lunatic monthly, and sometimes stopped at the asylum with him two or three days at a time; that on his restoration to health, Mr. Mount was re-appointed committee of the lunatic's person; that he had been assiduous in his care and attention towards the lunatic, and that the income of the lunatic had been augmented by his exertions and management.

Mr. Roche appeared also in support of the petition, on behalf of the other next-of-kin of the lunatic.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—If there be any general rule on this subject, it had better be followed. By the authority under which we are now sitting, we clearly have jurisdiction, sitting alone or sitting with the Lord Chancellor, and of course the jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor is left untouched. I am, however, of opinion, that if the object proposed by this petition be in effect to set aside any general rule which is said, with or without authority cited for it, to prevail, we ought not to take any step without having the benefit of the Lord Chancellor's opinion.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Without intimating any opinion as to the exercise of the discretion of the Attorney General, we are both of opinion that we ought not to interfere with that discretion. The Attorney General has intimated his approval of the petitioner as the surety, and the case is left with that officer. The Court declines to interfere.

Nov. 22.—Mr. Malins again mentioned the matter, saying that the Attorney General preferred that the Court should say whether the security was to be accepted.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—It is a very good general rule, that the committee of the person shall not be surety for the committee of the estate. But under the particular circumstances of this case, I see no objection to that rule being relaxed; and for myself, I am disposed to relax it. —[Counsel having, for the satisfaction of Lord Cranworth, again stated the facts, his Lordship concurred, and the judgment was continued.]—If the allowance be paid direct to the committee of the person, instead of to the committee of the estate, to be applied by the committee of the person for the care and support of the lunatic, we are disposed to permit the committee of the person to be accepted as one of the sureties for the committee of the estate. We beg it, however, to be most distinctly understood, that we consider this a departure from a general rule, and that we sanction this departure only in the particular circumstances of this case.

{ In re THE INDEPENDENT ASSURANCE COMPANY, ex parte TERRELL.

Company—Winding-up Acts—Solicitor's Bill—Costs incurred before complete Registration.

Upon the Winding-up of a company, which had been completely registered, the solicitor carried in before the Master his bill for the whole expenses incurred, both those preliminary to the complete registration of the company and those incurred subsequently to that period. The Master allowed the whole bill as a claim and not as a debt, with liberty to the solicitor to bring an action:—Held, upon motion to discharge the Master's order, that the members of a completely registered company were not liable for preliminary expenses, unless they had expressly or impliedly rendered themselves liable; that the bill in this case was so framed that it was impossible to distinguish the preliminary from the subsequent expenses, and the Master had, therefore, come to a right conclusion in allowing the whole bill as a claim only.

This was a motion on behalf of Mr. Terrell, the solicitor to the above company, that the order of the Master upon winding up the affairs of the company, whereby he had allowed Mr. Terrell's bill as a claim only, and not as a debt, might be discharged. It appeared that the company was provisionally registered on the 13th of February 1847; that a prospectus of the company was issued, in which Mr. Terrell's name appeared as solicitor; that a meeting of the directors was held on the 15th of May 1847, at which Mr. Terrell was appointed solicitor to the company, and the following resolution was agreed to:—"That no director should be personally responsible for the salary of any of the officers of the company, and that no officer or officers of the company should obtain payment for his services until a sufficient sum should be obtained by the funds of the company for that purpose; nevertheless, the first fund which should be formed by the payment of the deposits on shares, to be taken by the directors and others, should be appropriated to the payment of the expenses of the formation of the company." The deed of settlement was dated the 24th of August 1848, and on the 19th of October 1848 the company was completely registered. At a subsequent meeting of the directors it was resolved, amongst other things "That the sum of 60*l.* be paid to Mr. Terrell, on account of stamps required for the deed of settlement, prior to complete registration." The appointment of Mr. Terrell as solicitor was confirmed after the complete registration. An order for winding up the company was obtained in February 1850, and Mr. Terrell then brought in his bill before the Master for business done for the company from the period at which it was first projected, including the time previous to the 24th of August 1848, the date of the settlement, and also the subsequent time. The Master allowed the bill as a claim only, and not as a debt against the company, on the ground that he was unable to distinguish what portion of the expenses was incurred before the actual formation of the company, and what portion was incurred subsequently. The Master gave Mr. Terrell liberty to bring such action as he might be advised.

Mr. Malins and Mr. W. H. Terrell, in support of the motion to discharge the Master's order, contended that the whole of the bill ought to have been allowed as a debt. There could be no doubt but that under any circumstances the expenses after the deed of settlement was dated constituted a debt due from the company. The Master had not even allowed this portion of the bill as a debt; but as Mr. Terrell's appointment had been confirmed after the company was completely registered, the whole bill became a debt due from the company, and ought not to have been allowed as a claim only.

The following cases were cited as to the individual liability of the directors:—

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Roxburgh opposed the motion on behalf of the official manager, and cited Ex parte Lloyd (1).

Mr. Malins was heard in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—It appears to me impossible to distinguish the items in Mr. Terrell's bill, running down, as it does, from the year 1846 to the time at which the company was formed; or to say how much of the bill was incurred prior to the 24th of August 1848, when the deed of settlement was executed, and how much was for subsequent expenses. As a general principle, I may observe, that nothing has been urged to raise a doubt in my mind why that part of the bill which was incurred subsequently to the final formation of the company should not be considered as a debt, unless the resolution of the 15th of May should have the effect of preventing Mr. Terrell from having any claim until there were sufficient funds raised. Now, that resolution does not appear to me to have any effect in preventing Mr. Terrell from being a creditor for the business done after the formation of the company. The resolution was only intended to save the directors individually from responsibility, but it could not be intended that the company were not to pay for the work done by the solicitor for the benefit of the company. My opinion, therefore, is, that Mr. Terrell is justly entitled to become a creditor to the company with respect to the business done subsequently to the 24th of August 1848. A very different principle, however, may be applicable to what was done by Mr. Terrell, not as a solicitor to the company, but as solicitor to certain persons who were endeavouring to form a company. The distinction is clear; a person may incur great expenses in trying to form a company, and those persons who subsequently form the company may agree together to pay for the business done; but the members individually may never have intended to render themselves liable for a large sum of money incurred by persons in their endeavours to form the company. Unless there is an express stipulation to this effect in the deed of settlement, the members of the company, when formed, cannot be liable for the preliminary expenses. Now, it does not appear to me that there is evidence to shew that any contract was entered into by which the shareholders are liable for the preliminary expenses. There may or may not be sufficient to shew an implied contract; and if I were now in a situation to distinguish between those expenses which I think the members are liable for, and those for which I am not satisfied they are liable, what I should do would be to have that portion for which they are liable taxed, and leave the rest to be decided by action; but not being able to do that, I think the Master has acted properly in allowing the whole as a claim. I do not see how the items are to be distinguished, or how you are to say "so much is debt and the other portion claim." I do not see how the expenses incurred after the 24th of August can be separated, and I do not think that the Master could have come to any other conclusion than to allow the whole bill as a claim, with liberty for Mr. Terrell to bring such action as he might be advised, to recover the preliminary expenses. It seems to me that the only object in bringing an action would be to try what expenses were incurred prior to the debt. The Master has, I think, adopted the right course in treating the whole as a claim, and the matter must, therefore, be left as it is. The costs of the official manager will be paid out of the estate; no other costs can be allowed.

} In re THE IMPERIAL SALT AND ALKALI COMPANY.

Company—Winding-up Acts, Sections 38. and 118.—Rights of Contributories.

An order was made for the winding up the affairs of a joint-stock company: the property of the company being about to be sold by auction, a meeting was held for the purpose of fixing a reserved bidding; at the meeting, the contributories claimed a right to be present, but the Master excluded them. From this decision they appealed, and the Vice Chancellor reversed the Master's determination; and, on an appeal from the order of the Vice Chancellor, this Court held that the 38th section of the statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45. did not give the Master authority to exclude the contributories.

In this case an order was made for the winding up the affairs of the Imperial Salt and Alkali Company, and it came on upon an appeal from an order of Vice Chancellor Parker, by which he had reversed an order of Master Tinney, the Master charged with the winding up. By such order, Mr. Tinney had directed the official manager of the company to attend him privately for the purpose of fixing a reserved bidding upon the intended sale by auction of the works of the company, and had ordered that the contributories should be excluded from attending before him upon that occasion. No notice of the order requiring the attendance of the official manager had been given to the contributories. During the hearing in the Court below, it was alleged that the ground on which the reserved bidding was to be fixed was of a private nature, and that the Master and the official manager considered it advisable that such bidding should not be made known to the general body of contributories. The Vice Chancellor, on appeal, reversed that order, on the ground that the Master had no such authority of exclusion conferred on him by the act of parliament.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Webb appeared on behalf of the official manager, in support of the appeal from the order of the Vice Chancellor. — They contended that the appeal was not substantially that of the contributories, who had their names placed to the notice of motion, but it was in effect that of other persons, who were clients of a solicitor employed by those contributories, and who were anxious to know the amount of the reserved bidding to be fixed by the Master, so as to enable them to effect a beneficial purchase. It was also argued that everything was in the discretion of the Master which would tend to secure, for the benefit of the contributories, as much as could possibly be obtained upon a sale; and Mr. Tinney obviously considered that a secret settlement of the amount of the reserved bidding would be most beneficial to all parties; and in that view the official manager concurred. It was true that contributories might entertain particular views of their own interest, but the legislature in giving a discretion to the Master, who had the benefit of the assistance of the official manager, seemed to have intended that such interest should be represented by those functionaries.

Mr. Roxburgh, for some of the contributories, and in support of the order of the Court below, contended that under the 38th section of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, (1) all persons whose names were on the list

(1) The 38th section is as follows:—"That all persons whose names shall stand in the list of contributories shall be entitled to require, and, at their own expense, to receive notice, as the Master shall direct, of all or any of the proceedings in the matter of the dissolved company, and also shall be entitled, at their own expense, either personally or by solicitor or agent, to attend the proceedings; and it shall be lawful for any such contributory, at his own expense, to submit any proposal before the Master, in writing, or otherwise as the Master may direct, in relation to the affairs of such company and the winding up the same."

The 118th section is in the following words:—"That in all proceedings under this act the Court, in addition to all powers and authorities specially given and provided by this Act, shall have and exercise the like jurisdiction, powers, authorities, and discretion, so far as the same are applicable, as would have been exercisable in a suit duly instituted and duly constituted according to the rules and practice of the Court, and to which all proper persons were parties, for the dissolution and winding-up or for the winding-up of the affairs of the company in the matter of which the petition is presented; and the general practice of the Courts of Chancery in England and Ireland in suits pending of contributories were entitled to require, and, at their own expense, to receive, notice of all or any of the proceedings which were being carried on in the Master's office, and were also entitled, either personally or by their solicitor, to attend the proceedings; and that under the 118th section, by which the Court had jurisdiction as upon suits duly instituted, a creditor was enabled to attend the proceedings in the Master's office, and to prosecute his claim as effectually as he could have done under a suit constituted according to the rules and practice of the Court.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—It is impossible not to see that the Court is called upon to decide, not only on behalf of persons mentioned in the notice of motion as contributories, but of persons who were represented by solicitors, some of whose clients' interests are at variance with the general interest claimed by the creditors of the company. If I felt myself at liberty to act upon the impression made on me by the materials before me, I should be disposed to take the Master's view. I am very far from saying that the Master, by the course he has pursued, has not done substantial justice, and if in his place perhaps I should have been inclined to have acted similarly. The question, however, is, whether, upon the materials before the Court, we can support what the Master has done. There may or may not be circumstances which, if presented to the Court, might induce us to alter our view of the case; but of this I wish to express no opinion. But as the law is now supposed to stand, and upon the materials before us, I think we are not at liberty, technically and in form, to sustain what the Master has done. However we may regret it, I do not consider we ought to interfere with the decision of the Vice Chancellor; and we therefore think that the appeal must be dismissed, and the costs of all parties be paid out of the estate.

in the same courts respectively, so far as the same shall be applicable, and so far as the same is not or shall not be inconsistent with this act, or with any rules or orders to be made under this act, shall apply to all proceedings under or by virtue of this act."

am of the same opinion as my learned Brother as to our not interfering with the judgment of Sir James Parker. I cannot say, however, that I feel so sure as to there being anything behind—anything which does not appear. It is no doubt true that, ultimately, hard cases make bad law. Even if I did think I could see something behind, I do not feel that we should be at liberty to act upon it, nor do I see any reason why we should do so.

Legacy Duty — Baron and Feme — Investment in Joint Names — Transfer by Wife out of Funds which had survived to her, to pay Debts and Legacies—36 Geo. 3. c. 52.—45 Geo. 3. c. 28.—Satisfaction of Legacy.

*A testator having large sums of stock invested in the joint names of himself and his wife made his will, by which he gave several specific legacies to his wife, to whom he also devised certain real estates. He also made several devises and bequests of real and personal estate to trustees, upon trust for his wife for life, and after her decease for the benefit of other persons; he also gave a legacy of 10,000*l.* to his daughter for life, with remainder to her children, and he appointed his wife sole executrix. Upon the decease of the testator his personal estate was found wholly insufficient to pay several specialty debts and the legacies given by his will, and under a deed executed by his wife reciting these facts, she transferred 36,000*l.*, and 10,500*l.* stock, part of the funds which had been invested in the joint names of herself and her husband, to the trustees of his will, for the purpose of being applied to satisfy the debts, among others the legacy of 10,000*l.* The Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes claimed legacy duty in respect of this payment; but upon a petition by the executors of the testator and his wife, who had since died, to obtain the opinion of the Court,—Held, that no claim for legacy duty had arisen under the 36 Geo. 3. c. 52, or the 45 Geo. 3. c. 28, and that none was payable.*

This petition was presented by the defendants, Owen Clutton and John Clutton, who were now the executors of Elizabeth Webb, deceased, and her late husband Samuel Webb, to obtain the opinion of the Court upon the question, whether legacy duty was payable in respect of a sum of 10,000*l.* mentioned in the will of Samuel Webb.

The testator, by his will, dated the 16th of January 1827, gave to his wife Elizabeth Webb as her own absolute property certain specific chattels, monies, and effects, and he devised various freehold and copyhold hereditaments to his wife, her heirs and assigns, for ever. He also devised and bequeathed several freehold, copyhold and leasehold hereditaments to or in trust for his wife during her life, with divers remainders over.

The testator also bequeathed to Kenrick Collett and John Clutton several sums of stock, in trust that his wife might be entitled to the dividends and income for her life, with remainder to several persons in the respective amounts in the will mentioned; and that they should set apart a sum of 3*l.* per cent. consolidated annuities, to include a sum of 10,000*l.* 3*l.* per cent. consolidated Bank annuities, which was directed to be held in trust that his daughter Mary Ann Collett might be entitled to the dividends and income thereof for her life for her separate use, without power of anticipation, and subject thereto in trust for the issue of Mary Ann Collett, and in default of issue to take under such trusts (an event which did not happen) the sum of 10,000*l.* consols was to fall into the residuary estate. And as to the residue of the real and personal estate the testator devised, appointed, and disposed of the same unto and to the use of his wife, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns as her own absolute property. And he declared that the provisions thereby made for her were meant to be in bar and satisfaction of all dower, free bench, thirds, and widow's estate, and all other claims and demands which she could or otherwise might have upon any real or personal estate or property of which he might have been at any time during his life possessed. And he declared that all government or public stocks, funds, or securities which at his decease should be standing in the joint names of himself and his said wife, should for the purpose of answering the legacies thereby given be considered as his property, and thereby made liable to the same. And he further declared, that neither of the sums of stock thereinbefore given and disposed of, except a certain sum of 5,040*l.* 4*l.* per cent. annuities, should be considered as a specific legacy, and that he intended to give the dividends and income which would become due therefrom after her decease, or sums equal to be considered as such dividends and income. And he appointed his wife Elizabeth sole executrix of his will.

The testator made five codicils to his will, but they did not make any alteration with respect to the 10,000*l.* consols, or the directions which are previously mentioned, or which could diminish the interest given to his wife. The testator died on the 8th of February 1835, and on the 4th of March 1835 his widow proved his will. The personal estate of the testator was insufficient to pay the legacies, and his widow, the devisee of a portion of the real estate, and also the specific legatee, executed a deed, dated the 16th of March 1835, which recited, among other things, that the personal estate of the testator was wholly insufficient to satisfy some obligations incurred by the testator on bond and covenant, and the legacies given by his will, or even any considerable proportion of them, and that the testator had invested large sums in the public funds in the joint names of himself and his wife, of which she had become the owner by survivorship: and then with the view of satisfying the purposes declared by the testator in his will, and in order to avoid the sale of any of the specific bequests, or of the real estates, for payment of the remaining debts, she covenanted to transfer two sums of 36,700*l.* consols and 10,500*l.* reduced 3*l.* per cent. annuities to the trustees of the will, for the purpose of satisfying these obligations and the legacies given by the will. The transfers were accordingly made, and a sum of consols, exceeding the sum of 10,000*l.* given by the will of the testator, after paying the debts, remained in the hands of the trustees in trust for the daughter of the testator and her issue, according to the trusts declared by the will. The testator's widow appointed the trustees of her husband's will her executors.

The question now was, whether this sum of 10,000*l.* professed to be given by the testator's will, and which the widow by the deed of the 16th of March 1835 made good, was subject to legacy duty. It was agreed between the Attorney General, on behalf of the Crown, and the persons interested in the estate, that the statements contained in the petition and in the deed should be taken as true, and the Attorney General further declined to ask for a case for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer.

Mr. Walpole appeared for the petitioners.

The Solicitor General and Mr. James, on behalf of the Crown.—The claim of the legatee in respect of a legacy becomes a charge upon the testator's property for which duty must be paid, and the claim for duty by the Commissioners was made, not against the donor or his estate, but against the legatee, in respect of the money paid on account of the legacy, and as the trustees had received the money they could not be heard to say that they were not chargeable. If an estate was devised subject to a legacy, payment of the duty could not be avoided merely because the parties did not want the land sold; the real question was, whether or not there was a charge.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Waley, for parties who were interested in the fund.—The claim for legacy duty can only be supported on the ground that it was a charge on the real estate of the testator; but there was no bargain with the devisee by which she could be put to her election. This cannot be assumed, as the estate devised to her was of far less value than the sum of 10,000*l.*, and her own estate did not become liable to the payment of legacy duty in consequence of the testator having given her a portion of his real estate. In all cases of a charge upon land the gift was a part of the land, but, unless this case clearly falls within the several acts of parliament, no duty can be claimed, as they must be construed most strictly.

Custance v. Bradshaw, 4 Hare, 315;

s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 358.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Tillotson, for other parties.—The 10,000*l.* was not a payment under the testator's will, but under the deed executed by his wife. It has been argued that, by construction, the property of the wife surviving had become the property of the husband, and that it became subject to the legacy duty. But was this a legal claim? If a duty was given it was by a special law, and could not arise by any equitable construction of equivalents. The right of election only exists when property of the donee has been given away. In such a case, before the will was made the property belonged to a stranger, and so it remains after the will. The effect of taking under the will in such a case is the act of the donee, and not of the testator. The Crown cannot step in and insist that real estate should be considered as converted into personalty merely that it may claim a duty, and it has no right to insist upon equities merely for fiscal purposes—Matson v. Swift. The doctrine of election has arisen from the law of forfeitures or compensation; as when a testator had given a rent-charge upon the estate of another to whom he has made a gift of something else, the acceptance of that is the act of the party, and not of the testator.

Shirley v. Earl Ferrers, 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 111.

Mr. Temple and Mr. Stevens, for Mr. and Mrs. Laurie.—The Crown can make no claim for a duty which is not plainly given by act of parliament, and it is contrary to all principle to apply any forced construction to these acts. The 20 Geo. 3. c. 28. and the other earlier statutes, and also the 36 Geo. 3. c. 52. as well as the 45 Geo. 3. c. 28. s. 4. declared every gift payable out of the personal estate of the party dying to be a legacy, and this was extended to any personal estate he might have power to dispose of. These acts confined the duty to gifts out of the personal property of persons dying. In the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76. s. 4. the same principle remains. The question, therefore, is, whether the testator's wife by the deed she has executed converted her estate into the property of the testator. The property of the living cannot be taken towards payment of a duty, and the Crown must shew a right to a duty by act of parliament before it can enforce it, and these Courts cannot give effect to any claim by equitable or constructive rules.

The Attorney General v. Holford, 1 Price, 426.

The Solicitor General replied.

Jan. 13.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.
—The question depends solely upon whether the words of the acts of parliament are sufficient to meet and include this case. The statutes upon which alone any question can arise are the 36 Geo. 3. c. 52. and 45 Geo. 3. c. 28. I may state here that a question might have arisen upon the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76, but this will was in effect previous to that act. I shall first consider whether it is affected by the 36 Geo. 3. c. 52, and if not, then, whether it is liable to a duty as being a charge upon land under the provisions of the 45 Geo. 3. c. 28.

The words of the statute 36 Geo. 3. c. 52. s. 7. are, "Any gift by any will which shall by virtue of such will have effect or be satisfied out of the personal estate of the testator, or out of any personal estate which he shall have power to dispose of, shall be deemed a legacy." It is clear from this that nothing is to be deemed a legacy unless it is a gift to be satisfied out of the personal estate of the testator, or out of some personal estate which he had power to dispose of. I am of opinion that the words of the statute do not include this property. It would be a straining of words to include property which, in fact, is not, and was not, the property of the testator. The consequence also which would necessarily follow from a contrary decision would be absurd. Suppose a testator having 10,000*l.* in the funds to bequeath it to A, and, at the same time, to bequeath to B. a sum of 5,000*l.* standing in the name of A : as A. gains 5,000*l.* on the whole by the effect of the will, it is probable that he might give effect to it, and elect to take the 10,000*l.*, and give the 5,000*l.* to B. But it would be absurd on that account to hold that, under these words of the statute, duty must be paid exactly in the same manner as if the testator had been possessed of 15,000*l.*, and had given 10,000*l.* out of the 15,000*l.* to A, and the remaining 5,000*l.* to B. And yet it is obvious that it must, if good at all under the words of this statute, be carried to that extent; because it is not in the nature of a charge that the provision of the statute operates at all, but, if sufficient to include the case, it must be because it is a gift by the testator to be satisfied out of some personal estate, which he had the power of disposing of. I am of opinion that these words in the statute apply to funds over which the testator had a power of appointment, but that they cannot be extended to funds which belong to a stranger, and which the testator might induce that stranger to dispose of, as the condition upon which he should be entitled to take another legacy given to him by the testator's will. The argument has not been carried to this extent on the part of the Crown, and I have no hesitation in saying that the mere fact of electing to take under the will does not make this property, which neither belonged to the testator nor was property over which he had the power of disposition, subject to any charge for legacy duty under the first statute.

There is, however, more difficulty in the second branch of the question, and it was on this account principally that I reserved my judgment. The 45 Geo. 3. c. 28. makes legacies charged upon land liable to the payment of legacy duty. The words of the 4th section which apply to this question are as follows. It enacts nearly in the words of 36 Geo. 3. c. 52. s. 7. that "every gift which, by virtue of any will of a person dying after the passing of the act, shall have effect, or be satisfied out of the personal estate of such person so dying, or out of any personal estate which he shall have power to dispose of" (then come the new words), "or which shall have been charged upon or made payable out of any real estate, or be directed to be satisfied out of any monies to arise by the sale of any real estate of the person so dying, shall be deemed to be a legacy." This provision applies exclusively to real estate, and therefore it is not necessary to consider the various instances which were suggested at the bar of a specific chattel being by the operation of the rules of equity charged upon a pecuniary legacy, such as where a testator leaves 1,000*l.* to A, and leaves to B. a painting, the property of A, because as there is no question about the real estate in any of these cases, if any duty is payable it must be under the 36 Geo. 3. c. 52. But the question raised under the 45 Geo. 3. c. 28. is, that it not merely embraces all cases of legacies charged upon the real estate directly and expressly, but all cases where, by operation of the rules of equity, a legacy becomes payable out of the real estate. Now, if a testator shall devise his real estate to A, and by the same will dispose of 1,000*l.* belonging to A. in favour of B, whatever may be the course of conduct pursued by A, B. would, in any event, take an interest in the real estate of the testator to the extent of the 1,000*l.* If A. elected to take under the will, he would take the estate charged with the 1,000*l.* in favour of B, and if A. elected to reject the will, the heir-at-law of the testator would, in like manner, take the estate, but would do so burthened with the payment of the 1,000*l.* in favour of B; and if both A. and the heir-at-law repudiated the real estate of the testator, B. would himself take it as if he had been the original devisee thereof. It is, therefore, contended on the part of the Crown that, in any event, B. would take a bequest of the 1,000*l.* charged on the real estate of the testator, and that if the Court were to hold otherwise the effect would be, that instead of directly charging legacies on the real estate, the testator might produce exactly the same result, and escape the payment of the legacy duty, by devising real estate, and then disposing of the property of the devisee of the real estate to the extent of the legacy intended to be charged upon the land devised. It is difficult to discover any distinction, not merely nominal, between any one of the four following cases, which were suggested at the bar, viz. : a devise of land to A, charged with 1,000*l.* 3*l.* per cent. consols to B ; a devise of land to A, on condition that A. shall transfer the 1,000*l.* consols to B ; a devise of land to A. on condition that A, out of the consols standing in his own name, shall transfer 1,000*l.* to B ; and, lastly, a devise of lands to A. and a direct bequest to B. of 1,000*l.* consols standing in the name of A : and it was argued with great force, that as in the first three cases there would be a clear legacy to B. charged upon the estate devised to A. within the words of the statute, and as the legal effect of the remaining mode of effecting the charge is the same, and that as they will all take effect by means of the doctrine prevailing in courts of equity, the consequence with regard to legacy duty must also be the same. It is suggested that there would be considerable difficulty in working out such a principle, but if that observation is correct it would not be an answer. In the present case it is admitted that the value of the land devised is below 10,000*l.*, the amount of the legacy. The duty, if I adopted the principle in this case, would be charged upon the whole value of the estate, whatever that might be, provided it did not exceed the 10,000*l.* ; and it is argued that, although in such cases this difficulty might be surmounted, still if the testator devised land to A. and bequeathed to B. a valuable picture, for instance, the property of A, and A. repudiated the devise and elected to retain his own property, it would be impossible to determine with precision what sum was to be charged on the estate. It is true that the value of the picture might be a matter impossible to be ascertained without actual sale, or even that the saleable value might be a small portion of its real value both to A. and B, which might consist in a pretium affectionis. But the statute only applies to cases where the gift is charged on real estate, and I have not been referred to, nor am I aware of, any case which decides that the estate would descend to the heir-at-law, charged with the pecuniary bequest in favour of a specific legatee to the extent of the supposed value of the specific legacy;

but even if this were the case, there would not be greater difficulty in valuing the specific legacy for the purpose of charging the value of it, as a sum of money in hand, than there is in valuing a chattel belonging to the testator, which is specifically bequeathed, for the purpose of probate or of legacy duty. Assuming, therefore, that the will of the testator had made this 10,000*l.* a charge upon his real estate, I should not have felt much hesitation in deciding that the legacy duty must be paid upon it ; but upon the preliminary question, which arises on the words of the clause in the statute, whether the 10,000*l.* is a gift which by the will has been charged upon, or made payable out of any real estate of the testator, I have come to a conclusion adverse to the claim of the Attorney General. It does not appear upon the facts before me that the testator has bequeathed to his daughter any stock or property which was the especial property of his wife, the devisee of the real estate. The will, as stated in the petition, is to this effect :—The testator bequeathed to his daughter and her issue 10,000*l.* consols generally, as if he himself had been possessed of stock of that nature, or had possessed personal property sufficient to purchase such an amount. But it is not a specific bequest of any existing or particular sum of consols, or of any portion of such specified consols standing either in his own name or in the name of himself and his wife. If he had expressly disposed of 10,000*l.* consols belonging to his wife, in favour of his daughter, she would have had a charge on the land devised to the extent of that legacy. But if, as appears to be the case, he has simply bequeathed a legacy of 10,000*l.* consols to his daughter and her issue, then, in my opinion, no question of election arises upon the will, but the widow might have kept the real estate and have wholly disregarded the bequest of the stock. If a testator, having no stock of any description, devises land to A. and 10,000*l.* consols to B, no obligation lies on A. to make good the bequest to B, but the bequest simply fails because the testator either has no stock, or, having some when he made his will, has disposed of it since ; or if it is not a specific bequest, but a pecuniary bequest of so much stock, it fails from the deficiency of his personal estate. The latter is the case here. This is not a specific bequest of so much stock the property of the wife, but a bequest to the value of 10,000*l.* consols, which fails because the personal estate is deficient. There is nothing in the will, as here stated, that points specifically to the stock which became the property of the wife on surviving her husband, and in this respect the case resembles Dummer v. Pitcher (1); but unless that had been done by the testator, the widow could not have been put to her election, nor could any question of charge have been maintained. I am, therefore of opinion that this case does not fall within the words of the 45 Geo. 3. c. 28, and that no duty is payable on the legacy of 10,000*l.*, or on so much of it as may be equal to the value of the real estate. I have been in some degree embarrassed from not having the will before me; but I have assumed that the petition states the words of the will,—that, in fact, they could not amount to a specific bequest of the stock which was standing in the name of the widow; and having no doubt upon that, my judgment proceeds upon that ground (2).

Lunacy — Traverse — Supersedeas — Costs—Statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 53.

J. W. L. was found a lunatic as from a certain day. He presented a petition to traverse, and an order was made allowing the same. On the same day an order was made, granting the care and custody of J. W. L. and his estate to C. B. who never perfected his securities, and no grant was ever made to him. On the traverse the jury found that the traverser was then of sound mind. The costs of the inquisition had been ordered to be taxed. J. W. L. presented a petition for a supersedeas of the commission and for the delivering up of his deeds and papers in the hands of C. B. or of those who had issued the commission. These parties applied for an order for the payment of the costs out of the traverser's estate, but the Court refused to make the order, first, on the ground that, independently of the statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 53, there was no jurisdiction, either original or as delegate of the Crown; and secondly, because the 4th section of that statute only authorized the Court to deal with the property pending and notwithstanding a traverse. The Court also decided that it had no authority to make the delivery up of the property dependent and conditional upon the payment of the costs.

This was the petition of the lunatic, and it stated, that on the 21st of January 1851 a commission was awarded and issued, on the petition of John Loveday, the brother-in-law of the petitioner, and of his wife, the petitioner's sister, to inquire whether the petitioner was of unsound mind, so as to be incapable of managing himself and his affairs; and if so, from what time had he been so. That in pursuance of such commission an inquisition was held at the Shire Hall, Gloucester, before Mr. Winslow, one of the Masters in Lunacy, on the 25th, 26th, 27th and 28th of February and the 1st of March 1851; that on such inquisition the jury found that the petitioner was of unsound mind and incompetent to manage himself and his affairs, and had been so from the 16th of November 1850. That on the 7th of April 1851 the petitioner presented his petition, praying, amongst other things, that he might be at liberty to traverse the said inquisition; and that on the 28th of May 1851 an order was made, allowing him to traverse the same. That the traverse came on to be tried at the last assizes for the county of Gloucester (that is to say), on the 14th of August 1851; and that upon the trial thereof no evidence whatever was given of the lunacy of the petitioner at any time, but it was admitted that the petitioner was then of sound mind; and without any evidence, by the consent of all parties, the following finding of the jury was indorsed on the postea: "The jury find that the defendant is now of sound mind and sufficient for the government of himself and his manors, messuages, lands, tenements, goods and chattels." That by an order, dated the 28th of May 1851, the custody of the petitioner and the care and management of his estate were granted to Charles Baker for the time to come, until further order, upon his giving such security as should be approved of by Her Majesty's Attorney General, such security to be perfected on or before the 10th of November then next. That the said Charles Baker did not perfect the security so ordered to be given as aforesaid by the time appointed by the said last-mentioned order, nor had any further proceedings been taken under the said order: and that the said Charles Baker and the said John Loveday, or one of them, had (at the date of the petition) in his or their possession or controul various title deeds and other property belonging to the petitioner, taken possession of by the said John Loveday during the before-mentioned proceedings.

The petition then prayed that the commission of lunacy so issued and all proceedings taken thereunder might be superseded, and that the said Charles Baker and the said John Loveday might deliver over to the petitioner all deeds, documents, goods and chattels of every description in their or either of their possession or controul and belonging to the petitioner. After the finding of the lunacy and before the trial of the traverse an order was made by the Lord Chancellor, directing the taxation of the costs of the commission, and that on the return of the report of the taxation such order should be made thereon as should be just.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Terrell, for the petition, stated the case in the same way as set forth in the petition, and entered into a variety of details of a personal nature, which did not bear upon the question of supersedeas, or upon the right to the delivery up of the deeds and other documents.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Is the supersedeas resisted, or do the respondents ask an addition only to the order for taxation already in existence?]

The Solicitor General said that no resistance was now offered to the supersedeas: all that the respondents wanted was an addition to the order made for taxation, namely, that the costs incurred in the prosecution of the commission might be ordered to be paid out of the estate; those costs had already been ordered by the Lord Chancellor to be taxed. No grant of the estate had been made; and, therefore, if this addition were not made the costs would fall on those who had thrown the protection of the Court round this gentleman.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Terrell were heard on this point.—The inquisition having been successfully traversed, the Court has no longer the jurisdiction or authority to award the costs now claimed. The jurisdiction to give costs only arises from the jurisdiction to administer the property of a party actually lunatic; and if the inquisition be successfully traversed, the property is removed beyond the controul of the Court. This was decided to be the law by Lord Loughborough in Ex parte Ferne (1), and was recognized as such by Lord Eldon in Sherwood v. Sanderson (2). The statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 53. has not altered the law as to the power to give costs after a traverse, but only enables the Lord Chancellor or those deputed by the Crown to exercise the jurisdiction in lunacy to award costs, notwithstanding the pendency of a petition to traverse. The Court before that statute had no authority to deal with that subject until the lunacy should have been established by the failure of the traverse.

The Solicitor General and Mr. Amphlett, contra.—The extreme desire to assist those who throw the protection of the Court round persons in such a state of mind as Mr. Loveday, is shewn by the fact that Lord Loughborough expressed his regret, in the case of Ex parte Ferne, that he was unable to award the costs. The statute was passed expressly to remedy, among other defects in the law, that inability. The 4th section enables the Lord Chancellor, or those exercising the jurisdiction in lunacy, to make such orders as may be deemed right relative to the commitment of the person and the application of the estate and effects of persons who have been found lunatic by inquisition, notwithstanding the depending of any petition or order relating to a traverse of such inquisition. Such an order was made by the Lord Chancellor in this case pending the traverse, by which it was referred to the Master to tax the costs now claimed; and by the same order it was provided that upon the return of the report the Court should make such order as should be deemed just. Such being the case, the Court having recognized the costs, and payment alone remaining to be decreed, the Court can further proceed by making a further order, which will have the effect of a statutory charge on the property in the possession of the respondents for the amount of their costs incurred for the benefit of the lunatic. At any rate, as these documents and property now claimed by the petitioner came justly and properly into the possession of the respondents in the course of the proceedings under the commission, the Court will make the payment of these costs a condition of the delivery up of such deeds and property. That the commission was properly and upon good ground sued out is shewn by the verdict upon the inquisition. In fact, the commission was at the time necessary for the protection of the petitioner and his property, and the costs incurred for such protection ought, in all justice, to be paid.

Mr. Roll, in reply.—The very terms of the statute expressly limit the authority conferred on the Court by it to the dealing with the property of the lunatic in the interval between the inquisition and the traverse. The power over the person of a lunatic, or of an alleged lunatic, is co-extensive, and co-extensive only, with that over his property; and this is so whether as regards the statutory or the general jurisdiction in lunacy. But if the statute is to be regarded as conferring jurisdiction over the property after a successful traverse of the inquisition, the argument must of necessity be carried to the extravagant length of saying that it exists also over the person. This, however, cannot be maintained. The order for taxation does not alter the state of the case, for that order to be of avail must have been executed before the finding upon the traverse; but not having been so, the Court is left without jurisdiction, and cannot direct its completion. The payment of these costs could be enforced only by process against the person of the lunatic, or by the appointment of a receiver of his estate, neither of which proceedings is applicable now, the jurisdiction of the Court over both person and property being ousted by the successful traverse. To impose payment of the costs as a condition for the delivery up of the papers and property would be unjust, and, in truth, of no avail, for an action of trover for them could be brought by the petitioner, and in which he must succeed.

Jan. 15, 1852. — LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—This is a petition by James William Loveday against a commission of lunacy. The prayer is, that the commission and proceedings under it may be superseded, and that Charles Baker and John Loveday may be ordered to deliver up to the petitioner the deeds, documents and property of the petitioner in their hands. The facts of the case are these:—A commission was issued at the instance of John Loveday against James William Loveday. The result was, that James William Loveday was found to be a lunatic. Upon that the parties who sued out the commission proceeded to get the appointment of a committee. The respondent, Charles Baker, was appointed, but no grant was made to him of the property of the alleged lunatic. In the meantime, the alleged lunatic traversed the inquisition. The traverse was tried at the Gloucester Assizes last summer; and the result was a finding, not perhaps strictly correct, but a finding that James William Loveday was not a lunatic at that time; that he was at that time of sound mind and capable of governing himself and his property. Upon that this petition was presented by James William Loveday, praying a supersedeas of the commission, and that Charles Baker, who was to have been a committee under the commission, and John Loveday, who with his wife sued out the commission, may be ordered to deliver up all papers, documents and property in their possession belonging to the petitioner. The grant of the prayer of the petition so far as it seeks a supersedeas of the commission is a mere matter of course.

A question then arises, which is the only question on which I wished for time. John Loveday, who sued out the commission, insisted that it was a proper thing on the part of those who exercise jurisdiction in lunacy to give the costs of suing out the commission. That was disputed by James William Loveday, and that dispute gives rise to two questions; first, is there jurisdiction? And secondly, if there is, then is this a proper case in which to exercise it? With regard to the propriety of giving costs, if there is jurisdiction to do so, that depends on the conduct of the parties in suing out the commission; that is, how far they acted upon proper motives, and other questions of that description relating to the conduct of the parties. Upon that we had before us no information, and we took the opportunity of speaking to the Lord Chancellor upon the subject, from whom we heard that he was satisfied the parties had acted bona fide. Under the circumstances, therefore, if we have jurisdiction, we think the case a perfectly fit one in which to give the costs.

Then arises the next and important question, whether we have jurisdiction. Now there was no such jurisdiction independently of the recent statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 53. That was decided by Lord Loughborough in Ex parte Ferne, in which case the form of the traverse was, that the party was a lunatic at the time of the marriage and at the time of taking the inquisition. That was not the time in question. The time was that of the verdict being given; but the verdict was, that at that time he was not a lunatic. The party not being a lunatic, a supersedeas was of course. Then came the question of costs. The then Solicitor General and Mr. Fonblanque for the family of the Wraggs, pressed for costs, observing that they had established the lunacy at the time. That appears to be a stronger case than the present, where it is left in doubt whether at the time of the inquisition the petitioner was a lunatic; the verdict found being simply that the party was not a lunatic at the time of the finding upon the traverse. In the case of Ex parte Ferne, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Loughborough, wished to give the costs; but he said, "Where is the fund to pay the costs?"

Where the commission is superseded there can be no fund. There is a step to be taken, possession to be taken of the property. The traverse stops that. The lands and goods have never come into the hands of the Crown. The traverse is de jure. It is no favour. The parties apply by petition; stating that they are dissatisfied with the finding, and that stops the commission. There is no amoveas manus here. If I could act cum imperio, it is a very proper case; and the parties have entitled themselves to all the costs I can give them; but I have no jurisdiction." That was the opinion of Lord Loughborough, and in a case of Sherwood v. Sanderson the principle was fully recognized by Lord Eldon. In that case he was able to give costs, not simpliciter by virtue of the jurisdiction in lunacy, but because the property of the lunatic consisted in part of a fund in Chancery over which he had jurisdiction. He thought he might deal with that fund for the purpose of giving costs, but he recognized the doctrine of Lord Loughborough in the previous case. The reason of the doctrine is, I apprehend, that the jurisdiction is one of administering the property of the lunatic, and if this is once gone then nothing remains in the hands of those who exercise the jurisdiction to administer. That being the doctrine previous to the statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 53, then the question is, how far it is altered by that statute. The statute is entitled "An Act for limiting the time within which inquisitions of lunacy, idiotcy, and non compos mentis may be traversed, and for making other regulations in the proceedings pending a traverse." Now if the enactments of the statute are more extensive than indicated by this title, their effect would not be limited by the title, and the fact that the act is entitled only pending a traverse would not be material. Let us see then whether the enactments give any jurisdiction over the property of the lunatic or the costs at any other time except pending the traverse. If not, when once there is a verdict against the lunacy, the law would stand just as it did before the statute. Now the 4th section, which is the material section of the act, enacts "that it shall be lawful for the Lord Chancellor, Lord Keeper, or Lords Commissioners, or other the person or persons intrusted as aforesaid, from time to time after the return of any such inquisition as aforesaid, and notwithstanding any petition or order which may be depending relating to a traverse of such inquisition, to make such orders relative to the custody and commitment of the person or persons, and the commitment, management and application of the estates and effects of any person or persons who shall or may have been found lunatic, idiot or of unsound mind, by any such inquisition or inquisitions as he or they shall think necessary or proper." Does that authorize the Lord Chancellor or the persons acting in the jurisdiction of lunacy to deal with the property of the alleged lunatic after the trial of a traverse finding him not a lunatic? We have come to the conclusion (it being necessary to decide this, because if we had jurisdiction and could act, then we should be inclined to give costs) that we have no such authority given to us by the statute. There are two main grounds on which, after narrowly considering the words of the statute, we think that must be taken to be the result. We reject the words of the title to the statute, but we find exactly the same meaning in the words of the 4th section. The words are "it shall be lawful for the Lord Chancellor, &c. from time to time after the return of any such inquisition, and notwithstanding any petition or order which may be depending relating to a traverse of such inquisition, to make such orders relative," and so on; that is, notwithstanding any petition or other proceeding, the Court may proceed. That is, you need not wait, as before the statute you must have waited, till the absolute establishment of the lunacy on the trial of the traverse, but you may in the mean time deal with the property on the foundation of the inquisition pending the inquiry as to the lunacy. These considerations go far to shew that the power given by the statute beyond what existed before was meant to be conferred only pending the trial of the matter upon the traverse. But that conclusion is made abundantly clear when we see what a contrary construction must necessarily lead to. It must lead to this, that this jurisdiction is given to deal with the person as well as the property of the alleged lunatic. The enactment enables the Court "to make such orders relative to the custody and commitment of the person or persons, and the commitment, management and application of the estates and effects" of alleged lunatics. These words are all of the same sentence, and are all governed by the words "it shall be lawful to make such orders." To what period then is it that that jurisdiction is meant to extend? Is it to the period up to the time when the non-lunacy is completely established, or is it to continue afterwards? If afterwards, it must be meant that the Court should have power to deal with the person as well as the property; and on the other hand, if the Court is not enabled to deal with the person, neither is it enabled to deal with the property. The whole is one enactment, and the whole relates to one period. This in effect is a reductio ad absurdum. That being so, it is unnecessary to point to the other difficulties that have been mentioned, namely, that it is impossible to say in what way the case is to be dealt with; or how to make an order except a personal order to pay, or how to make an order to take possession of the property by a receiver. We have come to the conclusion, therefore, that not being authorized to act cum imperio, as Lord Loughborough expresses it in the case I have referred to, we can only deal with the case under the jurisdiction conferred by the statute, and that this statute does not authorize us to give any costs whatever.

Then arises the other point which has been suggested, namely, whether inasmuch as the party who was intended to be the committee, and those who sued out the commission, have property and papers in their possession belonging to the alleged lunatic, and the petition asks that they may be ordered to deliver them up—whether, although we could not make an order giving the costs, we could not make the delivery up of the property and documents conditional on payment of the costs. We have considered that, and we are of opinion that we are not entitled to impose any such terms. The delivery up of the property and documents by the respondents, now that the alleged lunacy has been successfully traversed, is a matter of simple justice. The respondents took into their possession property and papers belonging to the alleged lunatic, because that was deemed necessary for his protection, by anticipation, as it were, upon the assumption that the result of the inquiry would be to establish a title to them in the respondents. In that state of things it was reasonable that they should hold them; but when, upon the result of the traverse, he is found not to be a lunatic, of course they are his own property and he is entitled to the possession of them. Indeed, any attempt to impose such terms would be nugatory, and would leave the parties open to an action of trover or other action at the instance of the petitioner. The order, therefore, we make is an order to supersede the commission, and that the respondents deliver up the papers and property of the petitioner in their possession (1).

Solicitor's Bill of Costs—Railway Company.

Solicitors in London were appointed to a projected company. Other solicitors were appointed as local solicitors, and were directed to prepare the notices to landowners, and other matters connected with the local board. Errors were discovered in these, and the scheme was ultimately abandoned. The London solicitors in their bill of costs charged for the preparation of these notices, and the taxing Master allowed them. The Master of the Rolls disallowed the claim, and "directed" the solicitors to establish their right at law, on the ground that the facts were disputed, and that on the facts, so far as they were ascertained, there were questions of law to be decided. On appeal the claim was disallowed until it should be established at law, and the solicitors "were to be at liberty" to bring such action as they might be advised.

This was an appeal from an order of the late Master of the Rolls, Lord Langdale, and related to the title to certain items in a bill of costs. The facts so far as they are necessary to be stated are as follows:—

In August 1845 a company was projected for making a railway from Larne to Belfast and Ballymena, and on the 23rd of that month Messrs. Burchell, Kilgour & Parson were, by a resolution of the board of directors, appointed the solicitors of the company, and on the 4th of September following, another resolution was passed appointing Mr. Orr to be the local solicitor of the company at Ballymena. By another resolution, passed on the 20th of the same month, Mr. Orr was intrusted with the parliamentary notices and books of reference, in order that he might prepare the notices to landowners, and with other matters connected with the local board at Ballymena. On the 30th of November, the plans and sections of the railway were deposited pursuant to the Standing Orders of Parliament, but it was immediately discovered that they contained errors which, as the company alleged, and which Messrs. Burchell & Co. denied, rendered it impossible for the company to proceed with their entire scheme, and this circumstance became immediately known both to the directors of the company, to Mr. Orr, and to Messrs. Burchell & Co. In consequence of these errors (the fact of errors existing not being denied) the directors, on the 19th of December, passed a resolution, that the main portion of the line should be abandoned. The preparation of the notices to the landowners, which by the resolution of the 20th of September had been intrusted to Mr. Orr, were, at the request of that gentleman, performed by Messrs. Burchell & Co., it being necessary (if the entire scheme were carried on) that the notices should be served previously to the 31st of December. The time of this being effected was after the 9th or the 15th of December, a date strongly disputed in the evidence. After abandoning the main line, the company attempted to carry forward the branch to Ballymena, for which; however, the bill being rejected by the House of Commons, they were unable to obtain an act of parliament, and the whole undertaking was consequently abandoned. On the 15th of September 1846, Messrs. Burchell & Co. delivered their bill of costs, containing their charges for the preparation of the notices, which was subsequently taxed at 1,963*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*, of which amount the sum of 748*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.* was charged for preparing the notices to the landowners on the main line. These notices having become useless, Mr. Andrew Spottiswoode and others, the former directors of the company, presented a petition to the Master of the Rolls, praying that it might be referred back to the taxing Master to review his taxation, and that he might be directed to disallow those, among other sums of money which he had allowed; and upon that petition being heard, it was decided that, as there was great difficulty in ascertaining the real facts, and as some questions of law arising upon the facts, so far as they were ascertained, existed, the question ought to be tried by an action at law, and his Lordship accordingly directed an action to be brought against the directors for the recovery of the sum which the Master had found to be due to Messrs. Burchell & Co., on the supposition, which was not denied, that the directors were liable for the payment (1). Messrs. Burchell & Co. presented their petition of appeal, and the same now came on to be heard.

(1) In the case of In re Pinks, 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 57, Lord Lyndhurst refused to make any order on the petition of a party who had sued out a commission of lunacy and the lunacy was established, but the lunatic died before a grant of the estate. The petition in that case prayed a reference for the taxation of the costs, or a declaration of the Court that the costs had been properly incurred for the benefit of the lunatic. His Lordship said the petitioner might bring his action.

(1) On the point of the notices Lord Langdale's judgment (11 Beav. 599) was as follows:—"As to those notices, for which so large a sum of money was charged, and for which 748*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* has been allowed by the Master, it is alleged, on the one hand, that they were prepared either by the direct orders or authority of the petitioners, or in the due discharge of the duty imposed upon the respondents as the attorneys or solicitors of the petitioners, and with the knowledge and approbation of at least some of the petitioners. On the other hand, it is alleged, that the petitioners never gave any such authority, and never employed the respondents as their solicitors, for the purpose of preparing these notices, or as their solicitors in such a manner as to make it their duty, or properly their business, to prepare the notices without special order; and that, being without special order, it was, under the circumstances in which they were placed, contrary to their duty to prepare the notices, which proved to be of no use whatever. After reading all the affidavits

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Malins, Mr. Schomberg, and Mr. St. G. Burke, appeared in support of the appeal, and argued that the right of the solicitors was a plain, undeniable legal right to be paid for business done on the order of the company; that the order having been given to them to act as the solicitors of the company, their retainer extended not only to the acts necessary to be done in London, but to all matters connected with the line of railway itself in Ireland; that their duty extended far beyond the deposit of the plans and sections, and having been desired by the directors to send over parties to Ireland in order that the surveys might be completed, and the notices duly served, it was the bounden duty of Messrs. Burchell & Co. to prepare the notices, for if they had not there would not have been time to serve them by the 31st of December, the last day allowed for such purposes. The resolution of the 19th of December for the abandonment of the main line rendered expedition necessary in the preparation of the notices in question relating to the branch line. The whole question depended solely on written documents, with which the Court was equally, if not more, competent to deal satisfactorily than a jury.

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. Lewin, for the respondents, contended that the notices were wholly useless on account of the errors in the plans and sections, and that the preparation of those notices ought not to have been proceeded with after such errors were discovered. It was the duty of Mr. Orr to prepare these notices, and he had no authority to delegate that duty to Messrs. Burchell & Co. For that a special authority was required, and such authority could only be conferred by the directors, who never gave any such authority.

Mr. Bethell was heard in reply.

which have been filed, finding considerable difficulty in ascertaining the real facts, and some questions of law arising upon the facts, so far as they appear to be ascertained, and not being able to satisfy myself that the Master has come to a right conclusion, it appears to me, that the question ought to be tried in an action, which may be brought against the petitioners, for the recovery of the sum which the Master has found to be due to the respondents, on the supposition that the petitioners are liable for the payment."

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE. — The controversy before us relates to a sum of 748*l.* and something more, being the amount of charges in a particular section of a bill of costs. The charges contained in this section were allowed by the taxing Master, but were declined to be allowed by the Master of the Rolls until the solicitors had established their right to them at law. There were three different modes of dealing with the case as presented to the Master of the Rolls. First, the Master of the Rolls might have agreed with the taxing Master, and allowed to the solicitors all they claimed; or, secondly, the Master of the Rolls, altogether differing from the taxing Master, might, without allowing anything to have been due, have struck all these claims out of the bill, and thus ended the matter; or, thirdly, the Master of the Rolls might have given the solicitors an opportunity of establishing their title to those charges at law. The only appeal brought before us is so constituted as, in my opinion, wholly to exclude the second of these alternatives, that is, the total and final disallowance of these sums. That leaves us but two out of three alternatives to be dealt with. After listening attentively and carefully to all that has been said, I have not the least hesitation in saying that if we are to elect between the two alternatives left to our choice, we have no other course than to disallow the charges, unless the solicitors shall establish their right to them at law. At least, for one reason sufficiently obvious, I am not disposed to enter into the reasons which have induced me to adopt this view, unless the appellants' counsel should express a wish that I should do so.

[Mr. Bethell.—We leave the case entirely in your Lordship's hands.]

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Then, the appellants' counsel not desiring a statement of my reasons, I content myself by saying that this demand cannot be allowed unless it be established by an action, and therefore the solicitors are to be at liberty to bring such action for this sum as they may be advised.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—That is quite my opinion, and I have nothing to add. I confess, at one time, I was struck with the observation that the right to these costs was a legal right, and so clear that it need not go to law. In this I cannot agree. The matter is in very great doubt. It was said, too, that the title to these costs depended wholly on documents. That is not so. Here there is a great deal more than documents, and until the present petitioners establish their title at law their right to these costs cannot be sustained to our satisfaction.

On the application of the counsel of the respondents, the costs of the day were allowed them, the order being substantially the same as that of the Master of the Rolls, that is, the solicitors being at liberty to bring an action, instead of being directed to do so, the other part of the order remaining untouched.

Will—Construction—Remoteness.

*W. T. devised real estates to trustees, to receive the rents during the lives and life of the survivor of all the children which his daughter M. G. had or should have, and apply the same in support of his daughter, and her children, in equal shares, and when any of his children should attain twenty-one during the minority of her youngest living child, the share of such child was to be paid to him or her; and when the youngest grandchild should have attained twenty-one, the savings of the rents were to be paid amongst his grandchildren then living equally (with benefit of survivorship amongst his daughter and the survivor of his grandchildren, to be paid to the latter at twenty-one;) but in case any grandchild should leave issue, such issue was to take the parent's share. In case his daughter should be living on the youngest grandchild attaining twenty-one, then in trust to pay her an annuity of 100*l.* a year for life, and to pay the rents from that time amongst his grandchildren and the issue of those dying equally, until the decease of the longest liver of his grandchildren; and after the decease of such surviving grandchild, to* entire the estate on the then eldest living grandson of his daughter. The residue of his real estate he directed to be sold, and gave the proceeds to all his grandchildren, children of his daughter, (except such eldest grandson). The testator also gave the residue of his personal estate to be applied in like manner as the rents of his real estate. The testator died in 1797; his daughter had six children living at his death, two of whom died unmarried in his life, and she died in 1801; and upon a suit instituted by J. G. the youngest grandchild,—Held, that the trusts, substituting the issue for the parent after the youngest child attained twenty-one were void for remoteness; that the trusts of the estate, after the death of the last survivor of the children of M. G. were void for remoteness; and that the trusts of the produce of the residue of the real estates directed to be sold after the decease of the last surviving child of M. G. were void for remoteness.

William Tippell by his will, dated the 24th of October 1792, gave and devised all his freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates to William Bazire and Jonathan Tippell, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, upon trust that they "do and shall receive and take all the rents, issues, and profits of my messuages, lands, tenements, and real estate during the lives and the life of the survivor or longer lives of all the children which my daughter Mary, the wife of John Gooch, hath or shall have, and pay and apply the same, first, in keeping the houses and buildings belonging to the estates in proper tenantable repair, and in discharging the annuities hereinafter mentioned; and the clear net proceeds of such rents, after the above deductions" and the payment of the expenses of trustees, "shall and will pay and apply in the support of my said daughter, and in the maintenance, education, and bringing up of all her children which she shall from time to time have living, in equal shares between her and them; that is, one equal part or share thereof to and for her, my said daughter's, own sole use and benefit, and each child's equal part and share, for his and her use, or so much thereof, and in such manner as my said trustees shall think proper and judge necessary, and in which I wish my daughter to be consulted; save and except, and my will and mind is, that from and after any of her children shall attain the age of twenty-one years, during the minority of her youngest living child, that the part or share of such child or children attaining the age of twenty-one years shall from thenceforth be paid to him, her or them respectively, to and for his, her or their own use and disposal; and when the youngest of my grandchildren which shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years shall have arrived at that age, then I direct that such savings or overplus of the clear rents and profits as shall be then in the hands of the trustees unexpended for the purposes aforesaid, and the rents then due, shall be paid and divided to and amongst my said grandchildren that shall be then living, equally share and share alike."

"And my will is, that in case any of my grandchildren by my said daughter shall happen to depart this life under the age of twenty-one years without leaving any issue of his, her or their body or bodies lawfully begotten then living, then that the part and share, parts and shares, of the said clear rents and profits of such grandchildren and children so dying under age and without issue as aforesaid, shall be paid and applied by my said trustees to and amongst my said daughter and the survivors or others of my grandchildren by her, in equal shares,—as to my daughter's share thereof, to her for her own use and benefit, and as to her children's share, to and for their separate and respective support and benefit, in such manner as my said trustees shall think proper, during their respective minorities, or otherwise to be paid to them at their respective ages of twenty-one years; but in case any of my said grandchildren shall depart this life under the age of twenty-one years, leaving issue of his, her or their body or bodies lawfully begotten, my will and mind is, that such issue shall be entitled to the part or share of the said clear rents and profits its father or mother would have been entitled unto if living, to be paid and applied in like manner for the support and benefit of such issue; and in case my said daughter Mary shall happen to depart this life before all my grandchildren by her shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, then my will and mind is, that her part and share of the said clear rents and profits shall from her decease flow to and be paid and applied for the use and benefit of all her children and their issue, until the youngest of such children shall attain twenty-one, in equal shares, as an increase of, and with their respective parts and shares of such rents and profits, and in like manner and in such proportions as such shares are hereinbefore directed to be paid and applied to and for their respective use and benefit; and in case my said daughter, Mary Gooch, shall be living at the time the youngest of my grandchildren by her shall attain the age of twenty-one years," then, upon trust to pay to his daughter, Mary Gooch, an annuity of 100*l.* a year for life, which he directed might be charged upon his real estate for her separate use; and also in case his brother, Thomas Tippell, and his sister, Elizabeth Seawater, or either of them, should be then living, to pay to them an annuity of 20*l.* a-piece for their lives, both of which he directed might be charged upon his real estate. "And from and after all my grandchildren by my said daughter and the youngest of them shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, then I direct that the clear rents and profits of my real estates accruing from that time shall be paid and applied to and amongst my said grandchildren, and the issue of any of them that shall happen to die leaving issue, equally, share and share alike, and to the survivors and survivor of them until the decease of the longest liver of my said grandchildren; provided, that the issue of any such child or children dying in that time and leaving issue shall only be entitled to such part or share of the said clear rents and profits as its father or mother would have been entitled unto if living, and the part or share of such issue shall be applied in the maintenance and education thereof by the trustees for the time being, as they or the guardians of such issue shall think proper, during the minority of such issue." And from and immediately after the decease of the survivor or longest liver of my said grandchildren, "then upon trust that my devisees in trust, or the trustees for the time being, do and shall convey, surrender, settle, and assure all that my messuage, &c., and real estate at Sutton, subject to the payment, with the rest of my real estate, of a proportionate part of the annuities previously given, unto such son of any one of my said grandchildren as shall at such decease of the survivor or longer liver of them be then the eldest living grandson of my said daughter, and his heirs for ever," whom he directed to take the surname of "Tippell," and use the arms of the family, with a gift over in case of non-compliance to the next eldest grandson of his daughter, who should take and use the surname and the arms of Tippell, and his heirs.

"And all the residue of my real estate, whatsoever and wheresoever, subject to the payment of the residue of the said annuities, I direct shall be sold by the then trustees as soon as conveniently can be after the decease of the longest liver or survivor of my grandchildren; and the monies arising by sale thereof, and from the rents and profits thereof, from the decease of such surviving grandchild until such sale, I give and bequeath unto all and every my grandchildren, the children of my daughter, whether male or female, other than and except such eldest grandson of my said daughter who will be entitled to the Sutton estate by virtue of the devise afore-mentioned, equally to be divided between them, share and share alike."

Power was then given to the surviving or continuing trustee, with the approbation of his daughter, to appoint new trustees.

The testator then gave the residue of his personal estate to his trustees, upon trust to invest the same until his youngest grandchild which should live to attain the age of twenty-one years should have attained that age; and after paying certain annuities out of the interest, the residue thereof was to be added to the clear rents and profits arising from his real estate, and be considered as a consolidated fund, and be paid and applied therewith to and for the benefit of his daughter and her children and their respective issue in equal shares, parts and proportions, and at such times and in like manner as such clear rents and profits were directed to be applied during the minority of his said youngest grandchild as aforesaid; and upon such youngest grandchild attaining twenty-one he gave the principal money unto and amongst his said daughter, in case she should be then living, and her children, and if she should be then dead, then unto her said children, and the issue of any of them that should be then dead, in equal parts, shares, and proportions, save only that such issue of his said daughter's children should be entitled only to the part or share of such principal money as its father or mother would have been entitled unto if living.

Provision was then made for the accumulation of the portion of rents of his daughter's children not wanted for maintenance, and also for dividing his estate at the end of twelve, or, at the latest, at fifteen months after her youngest grandchild should have attained the age of twenty-one years; and the testator appointed William Bazire and Jonathan Tippell executors of his will.

The testator died on the 18th of January 1797, leaving Mary Gooch his only child and next-of-kin, and also his heiress-at-law, and heiress by the customs of the manors of which the copyholds were holden. She had six children, Mary Bazire, John Tippell Gooch, Anna Gooch, Maria Gooch, George Gooch and the plaintiff James Gooch. They were all living at the death of the testator, and were all infants with the exception of Mary Bazire, who was a child by a former husband. She died in 1800 unmarried. Mary Gooch died in 1801. Anna Gooch died in 1807 unmarried, and John Tippell Gooch died in 1837 intestate as to real estates, leaving the defendant Watson Gooch his eldest son and heir-at-law, who was also the heir-at-law of the testator and of Mary Gooch.

Maria Gooch intermarried with Robert Cann and had issue.

George Gooch was also married, and had issue.

The real estate of the testator consisted of freeholds and of copyholds, all of which with the exception of one were of the tenure of Borough English.

The plaintiff, James Gooch, as the youngest son of Mary Gooch, was her customary heir, and also the customary heir of the testator.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Craig, for the plaintiff.—The time for distribution is the period to ascertain the vesting of a fund. The youngest grandchild might have attained twenty-one in the lifetime of Mrs. Gooch. It was material, therefore, to ascertain who were the grandchildren contemplated, and at whose death the substitution was to take place, and whether it was a gift to those who survived the period when the youngest child should attain the age of twenty-one years, and was not, as a trust substituting the issue for the parent after they attained twenty-one, void for remoteness. The trust relating to the Sutton estate was to take effect after the decease of the survivor of the grandchildren. The trusts respecting the rents and the proceeds of the residuary real estates directed to be sold were to take effect upon the same event. A limitation to an unborn child for life has been held not to be good unless the remainder vested in interest at the same time—Hayes v. Hayes (1), but the authority of this case has been doubted—1 Jar. on Wills, 239. The construction of a will is not to be influenced either by a desire to destroy the limitations or to escape from so doing; but assuming the limitations to be void, the criterion is not whether they might be vested, or whether in the events that have happened they would have vested, but whether they ought not to be considered according to the circumstances as they existed at the death of the testator—Cadell v. Palmer (2). The gift would comprise all grandchildren who came into existence before the youngest child of Mary Gooch attained twenty-one. Cases are not wanting to shew the gift will not be confined to children living at the death of the testator.

Mr. Walpole and Mr. Dickinson, for Watson Gooch.—The limitations cannot be considered as too remote. The words of the will can only be satisfactorily construed by confining the reference to such only of the children of Mary Gooch as were living at the death of the testator; it would otherwise be inconsistent with the direction, that on the youngest attaining twenty-one, Mary Gooch was to become entitled to an annuity, and was to cease to participate in the rents.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Baily, for Mr. and Mrs. Cann.—The deed which was to grant the annuity to the testator's daughter was by his will to secure it to her for her separate use. It is evident therefore that the gifts in the will were confined to children who should be living in her lifetime—Jee v. Audley (3). When time, express or implied, is referred to in a will, it must be considered with reference to the class. The will refers to all the children of Mary Gooch which "she hath or may have." This is a construction which the Court will adopt in the absence of anything to prevent it. In Mogg v. Mogg (4), respecting the Lower Mark estate, the words of the testator's will were narrowed in the range of objects by limiting it to the children who were living at the death of the testator; but in this case every one of the donees was to attain twenty-one, and it could not operate during the life of the daughter. The words of this will therefore ought to be narrowed in their construction so as to bring its limitations within legal limits. The testator has also used the words "my grandchildren by my daughter." This is a possessive pronoun, and it is not likely he would have applied it to persons to be born—Harvey v. Harvey (5).

Dec. 1.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—By this will the testator gave all his freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates to trustees, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns—"In trust to receive the rents and profits of my real estate during the lives and life of the survivor or longer liver of all the children which my daughter Mary, the wife of John Gooch, hath or shall have," to be held in trust,—which may be divided for the sake of reference into three branches:—The first set of trusts relates to the income of the trust estates from the death of the testator until his youngest grandchild attains twenty-one: the next set of trusts relates to the income of the trust estates after the time of the youngest grandchild attaining twenty-one until the death of the last surviving grandchild: and the third set of trusts professes to dispose of the property after the death of the last surviving grandchild of the testator. The first set of trusts which relate to the income of the trust estates until the youngest grandchild attains twenty-one are, that the rent shall be applied first in keeping the houses and buildings relating to the estate in repair, and in discharging annuities after mentioned; secondly, in paying expenses of trustees; thirdly, "in support of my daughter Mary Gooch, and in the maintenance and education of all her children who may be living, from time to time in equal shares, that is to say, one share to my daughter, and one other equal share to each of the children," and when any child attains twenty-one during the minority of the youngest living child, the proper share is to be paid to that child. If any child dies under twenty-one without issue the share of that child is to be equally divided between Mary Gooch and the surviving children. If any child dies under twenty-one with issue, the issue are to take the share of the parent. If Mary Gooch dies before the youngest child attains twenty-one, her share is to be divided among the children and their issue until the youngest child attains twenty-one. Then comes the second set of trusts, which provides, that when the youngest child attains twenty-one all arrears and accumulations, and the rents then due, are to be divided among the children then living equally. If Mary Gooch shall be living when the youngest child attains twenty-one, then the estates are to be charged with an annuity of 100*l.* per annum for Mary Gooch for her life for her separate use, and also an annuity of 20*l.* to the testator's brother, Thomas Tappell, and a similar annuity to the sister, Elisabeth Seawater, if they are then alive; and subject thereto, when the youngest child has attained twenty-one, the rents and profits are to be divided among the children and the issue of any of them that shall happen to die during the life of the surviving child, and providing that the issue of a child dying within that time shall only take the parent's share. Then comes the third set of trusts, which provides, that on the death of the surviving grandchild the trustees shall convey the property at Sutton charged with the subsisting annuity to the eldest living grandson of his daughter Mary Gooch in fee, with a proviso for shifting the estate to the next eldest grandson of Mary Gooch, in case the eldest does not take the name and arms of Tappell; and the testator then directs the residue of the real estate, subject to the payment out of that residue of the subsisting annuities, to be sold, and the produce thereof, together with the rents until sale to be paid, in these words, "unto all and every my grandchildren the children of my daughter other than and except such eldest grandson of my daughter who may be entitled to my Sutton estate, equally." The will contains a clause directing the receipts of the trustees to be good discharges. It contains a power of appointing new trustees, and a direction to the trustees and executors to convert the whole personal estate into money, and thereout to pay legacies, finer, or admissions to the copyholds. And the testator then directs that the residue of his personal estate shall be invested until his youngest grandchild attains twenty-one, and out of the produce thereof they are to pay the annuity, and the balance of the income is to be applied in aid of the rents of the real estate as before directed; and upon the youngest grandchild attaining twenty-one, the principal is to be divided between his daughter and her children, or such of them as should be then living, and the issue of the deceased child is to take the parent's share. The testator then appointed his trustees executors of his will, and died in 1797. He left his daughter Mary Gooch surviving. She had at that time by her first husband one daughter living, but who died before her mother without leaving issue; and by her second husband, Mary Gooch had living, at the death of the testator, five children, all of whom survived her, and of whom three are now living, one of them is James Gooch, the plaintiff, who is her youngest son and customary heir in Borough English of the testator, and also his legal personal representative. Watson Gooch, the first defendant on the record, is the grandson and heir-at-law of the testator as far as regards the freeholds. Mary Gooch had no children born after the death of the testator.

The plaintiff contends the true construction of the will of the testator to be, first, that the trusts for the substitution of the issue for the parent after the youngest child has attained twenty-one; secondly, that the trusts of the Sutton estate, after the decease of the last surviving child; and, thirdly, that the trusts as to the proceeds of the residue of the real estate directed to be sold on the death of the last surviving child, are all void, because they are not limited to take effect within the time prescribed by law; and that being void, the testator has not by his will made any disposition of his property given to each child of Mary Gooch after the death of that child, and that, consequently, the plaintiff is entitled to the lands held in Borough English, as the heir of the testator, according to the custom, on the decease of each child of Mary Gooch. This question depends on what children of Mary Gooch are included in the words of the will, and whether the word "living" confined the gift to the children of Mary Gooch who might be living at the date of the testator's death; or secondly, whether it is to be extended to the period of the decease of Mary Gooch, and thus include all children whom she might by possibility have; and thirdly, whether it is to be considered as including the children who might be alive from time to time until the youngest of them for the time being attains the age of twenty-one years.

The words of the gift are "during the lives and the life of the survivor or longer liver of all the children which my daughter Mary Gooch hath or shall have." It is urged by those who contend for the validity of this devise, that the time specified for ascertaining the class is the death of the testator, and although the words "shall have" import children born after the date of the will, they are, it is said, usually satisfied by referring them to the period which might elapse between the execution of the will and his decease; and in support of this view of the case, I might refer, among others, to the cases of Sprackling v. Ranier, Storrs v. Benbow and Butler v. Lowe. In all those cases, the words importing futurity were so confined; and it was held by Sir J. Leach in Storrs v. Benbow, that the Court would not interfere to construe a will to include all the issue which might be born, for this reason, that the Court will not impute to any testator an intention so improbable as to postpone the distribution of the residue until the death of all the children who might be born to the person named in the will. They contend also, that the rule prevailing in the construction of instruments of this description is, that the class is to be ascertained when the distribution is to take place, and that the distribution here takes place immediately on the decease of the testator, by the devise of the rents between Mary Gooch and her children; but the cases cited relate exclusively to personal estate, and have been considered as defining an excepted class, but not as shaking the general rule, and where, in the absence of any particular words importing the contrary, the class to take would be determined at the death of the testator; if effect is to be given to the words importing futurity, it must be to admit children born subsequent to that period. This was determined in the case of Mogg v. Mogg; where the testator devised an estate to trustees, in trust to pay the rents for the maintenance of the child and children begotten and to be begotten of his daughter Sarah. The same argument was urged there, as was urged here, that the words might be satisfied by admitting the children born after the date of the will and previous to the death of the testator; but the Court of King's Bench certified that all the children born after the death of the testator took interests under this devise, and Sir William Grant confirmed this certificate. Upon looking attentively at the words of this will, I am unable to distinguish the expressions contained in it from those employed by the testator in Mogg v. Mogg. There the words were "begotten and to be begotten." Here the words are "hath and shall have." The case of Mogg v. Mogg has always been considered a leading case in illustrating the rules which regulate the class of children entitled to take under devises, whether immediate or future. I concur in the conclusion come to in that case, and I consider that it settles and concludes the question here as far as to let in the children of Mary Gooch who might be born subsequently to the death of the testator, unless there are other passages in the will cutting down or destroying the effect of these words. The circumstance that no child of Mary Gooch was born after the death of the testator cannot, it is manifest, affect or alter this conclusion. The rule of law is clear, that the gift is bad altogether if some of the class are incapable of taking by reason of that rule, and were it not so, the validity of the devise would depend on the fact of whether the testator died a few years sooner or later.

Upon looking through the rest of the will, I find no words to qualify or weaken the effect of the words I have referred to, letting in the children of Mary Gooch. On the contrary, the whole scope and object of the will plainly points to their admission to share in the rents of children who might be born after the testator's death. Thus he afterwards speaks of "all the children she shall from time to time have living," and the ultimate devise of the rents, on the youngest child attaining twenty-one, is, "amongst my said grandchildren that shall then be living." Assuming, however, children born subsequently to the date of the decease of the testator, it is still a question up to what period it was the testator's intention to admit them. On this subject I have arrived at the conclusion, that the words of the will do not point to the death of Mary Gooch as the period, and for this reason, the will provides for the event of the youngest child of Mary Gooch attaining twenty-one in her lifetime. It is obvious that it would be wholly inconsistent with this provision that it should remain a matter of uncertainty until the death of Mary Gooch who was or might be her youngest child. I think that the words used by the testator here and throughout the will, shew that he considered that the class of his grandchildren was to be ascertained when the youngest child of Mary Gooch for the time being attained twenty-one, and that he considered the possibility of any child being born to Mary Gooch after the next former living child had attained twenty-one as a contingency so remote as not to be worth providing against.

The real construction of the will of the testator appears to me to be the only remaining point I have not referred to, namely, that it includes the children who might be let in from time to time during the life of Mary Gooch, whether born after or before the death of the testator, until the period when the youngest of her living children attained the age of twenty-one years. This is confirmed by various expressions in the will, which, with what I have already stated, is sufficient to shew the meaning of, without reading the context, such expressions as these, "all the children she shall from time to time have living," "the youngest living child," "when the youngest of the grandchildren shall have attained twenty-one years," "among my said grandchildren who shall then be living, equally." The obvious primâ facie meaning of all those expressions is, not only to include children of Mary Gooch who might be born after the decease of the testator, but also to point to the fluctuations that might take place in that class until the youngest child for the time being attained the age of twenty-one years.

The result of this construction, if correct, is, that the testator has attempted to do that which by law he is not permitted to do, and has attempted to give interests as purchasers to the unborn children of his daughter, Mary Gooch.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the limitations to the issue of Mary Gooch who might be born after the decease of the testator, are void for remoteness, and that in these respects I must declare that the testator died intestate.

The description of the residue of the real estate is obscure, by reason of some clerical error, which appears to have crept into the copy of the will. The words I read again are, "unto all and every my grandchildren, the children of my daughter, other than and except such eldest grandson of my daughter who will be entitled to my Sutton estate." As it stands, there is a contradiction in terms, but I think that the meaning is clear. The testator has previously exhausted the limitations in favour of his grandchildren, and, after the decease of the survivor of them, has disposed or endeavoured to dispose of the Sutton estate in favour of one great-grandchild, namely, the eldest; and he then proceeds to dispose of the residue of the real estate in favour of the remaining grandchildren other than his great-grandson who takes the Sutton estate. Any other construction than this would be absurd and repugnant to the rest of the will, and this is obviously the only construction which is intelligible and consistent with what he has previously declared. It is manifest to my mind that the testator has not given this residue to his grandchildren, and unless I can put upon it the construction in favour of the great-grandchildren which it appears to me that the testator intended, I should be compelled to say that the passage was unintelligible, and that an intestacy from uncertainty of meaning would be the result. Assuming it to mean a gift to the great-grandchildren, here, again, the testator has attempted to do what the law will not permit, and has directed persons to take his real estate as purchasers whose parents may not be in existence at the time of his death. I am of opinion, therefore, that the devise of the Sutton estate, and the devise of the residue of the real estate, or rather the produce of the residue of the real estate after the decease of the last surviving grandchild of the testator, are both void for remoteness.

I have also considered the point suggested, that the children might take estates tail under the cy-pres doctrine and under the authority of Vanderplank v. King; but in my opinion that case and the rules relating to the cy-pres doctrine, whereby the particular interest is sacrificed to the general interest of the testator, would not be effected in this case by giving the children of Mary Gooch estates tail. There are many observations which are obvious which shew that the general intent of the testator is not that each grandchild's share shall devolve on the children of that grandchild. Among them may be stated that the class of great-grandchildren to take is not to be ascertained until the decease of the last surviving grandchild; and thereupon the grandchildren then living are, if the testator's wishes should prevail, to take the residue of the estate equally between them, although several great-grandchildren might have previously died leaving issue; and where the class is ascertained, they are not to take the estate themselves, but the estate is to be sold, and the produce of the sale is to be divided among them; that is, the legal estate, which up to that time has remained vested in trustees. Upon the whole, therefore, I see nothing in this will which can enable the Court to put such a construction on the expressions used by the testator as will prevent an intestacy as to the limitations I have above referred to. I am of opinion, therefore, that I must declare that the trusts for the substitution of the issue for the parent, after the youngest child of Mary Gooch attained twenty-one, are void for remoteness; that the trusts of the Sutton estate, after the death of the last survivor of the children of Mary Gooch, are void for remoteness; and that the trusts as to the produce of the residue of the real estate, directed to be sold after the decease of the last surviving child of Mary Gooch, are also void for remoteness.

Dec. 16, 1851.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I have been considering this case since it was last before me. I was then of opinion that it was a contingency with a double aspect, in which the testator intended, when the youngest child should attain twenty-one, the property should be divided in this manner, if all the six grandchildren were alive to be divided amongst them; if any died without leaving issue it was to be divided amongst the number of children who were surviving; if any died leaving issue, then it was to be divided into the joint number of the surviving children and the children of the child leaving issue. In that case, of the child dying leaving issue, there would have been an intestacy. That is my decision. But what is there illegal in a man saying "I give to A. for life, and after his death to his children for their lives, and on the death of the survivor of those children to A. B. if he is then alive in person"? That would be perfectly good; "but if A. B. is dead then I give it to the children of those children." That would be clearly bad. But because he has given in one event to the children of his child, that would not make the gift to A. B. bad. That is the general view I take of this case.

Mr. Walpole and Mr. E. F. Smith were then heard upon this point.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I look at this will from the death of the testator. He gives a set of trusts, (which it is not necessary to regard because it has nothing to do with the present question), which is to continue until the youngest grandchild shall attain twenty-one. Then he says what is as nearly expressed as possible in these words,—upon the youngest grandchild attaining twenty-one, I desire that the rents shall be divided into as many shares as there shall be grandchildren then living and grandchildren dead having left issue. It follows, if there are no grandchildren then living but there are grandchildren who died leaving issue, it would be divided into this number of shares; if there are only grandchildren alive without grandchildren dead leaving issue it would only be divided into the number of shares of the grandchildren then alive. He had six grandchildren, two had died not leaving issue; by what possibility in accordance with the terms of the testator's will can you divide it into six parts? He says it is to be divided then into as many shares as there are composed of those two classes of persons, that is to say, living grandchildren and stirpes of deceased grandchildren,—just as much as if he had said grandchildren and children of A, as many as there are of those two classes combined; then, if there are none of the grandchildren who died leaving issue, why are you to give them shares? It appears to be directly opposed to the words of the testator's will; he has directed it to be divided into as many shares as there are to be derived from two sources; one of those sources fails, the other takes the whole; and then what is there that is void in it, because it is only in case there were grandchildren who had left issue that it would be void? He might have said, I desire it to be divided into as many shares as there are children of A. and children of B, and I desire to die intestate with respect to those shares of the children of B; that would be perfectly good; and if there were no children of B. the children of A. would take the whole. In my opinion, therefore, the order of 1812 is correct (7).

(7) The order referred to was dated the 5th of November 1812, and was made upon the petition of John Tippell Gooch, Maria Gooch, George Gooch and James Gooch, stating that the plaintiff, as the youngest child of Mary Gooch, attained twenty-one on the 8th of July 1812; that they conceived themselves entitled, under the will of the testator, to be let into the possession of the freehold, copyhold and leasehold estates for life, and to be let into receipt of the rents and profits thereof, from the 24th of June 1812. It was ordered that the petitioners should be let into possession of the estates and into receipt of the rents, issues and profits from the 24th of June 1812, and the tenant was directed to attorn, and the receiver was discharged; and it was further ordered that the personal estate of the testator then remaining to the credit of the causes should be paid to the petitioners in equal shares.

It was a class of shares to be ascertained when the youngest child attained twenty-one; and the number of shares according to the testator's will were four, and accordingly it is to be so divided. It seems, therefore, according to the construction of the will, the same process was to take place upon the death of any child until they all died, and when the survivor died a new set of limitations was to take place. By the same process there was to be a new class ascertained whenever any grandchild died. Then, supposing a grandchild died without leaving issue, it would be divided into thirds; and supposing two grandchildren died without leaving issue, it would be divided into halves; on the other hand, supposing a grandchild died leaving issue, it was to be divided into fourths; then that fourth given to those children was too remote and was void. I may be wrong; but at the same time it is fit that the view I take should be clear that it may be set right if I have miscarried. It does not appear to me that the order of 1812 goes further than to say that upon the youngest grandchild attaining twenty-one the rents were to be divided into fourths. That appears to be correct. That order does not appear to go beyond that upon the death of a grandchild leaving issue. My view of the case is, that thereupon it was still to be divided into fourths and that one of those fourths would become void for remoteness, and it would go to the heir-at-law or customary heir. I will mention the case to-morrow morning.

Dec. 17, 1851.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I have looked carefully at this case, and I adhere to my decision, when I stated that the new distribution took place on the death of each successive child. I had present in my mind that the words which relate to the distribution of the fund when the youngest child attained twenty-one were repeated. The fund is given to them and their survivors, and the limitation over being void will not cut down or destroy their estate.

Injunction—Medicines—Breach of Confidence—Secret of Compounding Unpatented Medicines.

A party who has a secret in a trade and employs persons under contract express or implied, or under a duty express or implied, can restrain by injunction such of those persons as have gained a knowledge of the secret from setting it up against the employer.

The particulars of this case, and the judgment of Vice Chancellor Turner are reported at full length in 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 513. It will be sufficient here merely to say, that the arguments before the Court below were substantially repeated on the appeal of the defendant, Mr. William Crofton Moat; and that ultimately the injunction was made perpetual.

The Solicitor General and Mr. Metcalfe were for the appeal.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Shapter supported the order of the Vice Chancellor.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE expressed an opinion that the injunction should be continued on an undertaking, which the plaintiffs' counsel gave, to be answerable in damages if the injunction should ultimately be dissolved: but the judgment of the Court was deferred.

Jan. 22.—LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—The principles that were argued in this case are principles really not to be called in controversy. There is no doubt whatever that where a party who has a secret in a trade employs persons under contract, express or implied, or under duty express or implied, those persons cannot gain the knowledge of that secret and then set it up against their employer: that is perfectly clear, and the only doubt there is in the case is on the question of fact here, as was put by Vice Chancellor Turner in giving his judgment. Now, the preponderance of evidence is immensely in favour of the plaintiffs here. The statement made by the defendant Moat is extremely vague. I take the statement from his first affidavit, which is a little varied in the answer, but is substantially the same. He says, "That pursuant to the articles of agreement" (and I do not mean to advert to all the facts of the case, because they are fresh in the memory of every one present), "I did attend in the office of the said co-partnership, and I conducted the affairs thereof in the place of my said father the said Thomas Moat, and in the performance of my duties I gained a knowledge of the ingredients used in making and compounding the said medicine and medicines, and of compounding, preparing and mixing the drugs for the same." Now, that is a very vague statement of it, if it is meant to be a statement that is to lead the Court to suppose that he thereby acquired a knowledge of the secret. Then it goes on, "And I further say that when I did, as hereinafter mentioned, become possessed of the recipe or prescription in writing for making and compounding such medicine or medicines, the said written recipe or prescription agreed with the facts respecting the making and compounding the said medicine or medicines of which I had so previously acquired a knowledge as aforesaid." With regard to the mode in which he did acquire the recipe, what he says, is this—which I will presently advert to, and in the mean time he goes on further to speak about his acquiring that knowledge, that it was by superintending the workmen. He says, "My father having died on the 11th of August, I became an active partner in the said co-partnership in the place of my said father, and I was so treated and acknowledged by the said James Morison, and by the said plaintiffs, and upon so becoming a member of and active partner in the said co-partnership, I did for a period of about two months in common with my co-partners, or some of them, superintend the business of the said partnership, and during that time I saw the mode and manner of making and compounding the said medicine or medicines called 'Morison's Vegetable Universal Medicine,' and the ingredients thereof, and the proportions in which such ingredients were used, and I thereby acquired a complete practical knowledge of the ingredients of the said medicine or medicines, and of the mode of compounding and mixing the same, and I became fully capable myself of making and compounding the said medicine or medicines." Then, with regard to the mode in which he acquired the actual recipe, he says, "That the recipe for making and compounding the medicine or medicines called 'Morison's Vegetable Universal Medicine,' in the handwriting of the said James Morison, was communicated to me by my said father immediately before his death, and in contemplation of my succeeding him as a member and active partner of the said co-partnership." That is what he represents as to how he acquired the knowledge of it; and to the extent to which that language goes, it shews he did acquire the knowledge between the last day of July, I think, and the 11th of August, and also by superintending as a partner from the 11th of August for a period of two months; and he also says, that immediately before the death (that would be about the same day, we will say the 11th of August,) his father in contemplation of his succeeding him as a member in the partnership gave him the recipe in writing, which he has.

Now, it is to be observed, if the knowledge which he had acquired was by that communication from the father, the plaintiffs fully make out their case, because the father had no right whatever to communicate that recipe; the father was bound not to communicate it. If he acquired it by being, with the consent of the Morisons, admitted as a partner, and so permitted to superintend and see everything that was necessary for him to see in order to acquire the knowledge of the secret, then I should hold, and I have no doubt my learned Brother would hold, that was, in fact, a communicating of the secret by the Morisons; whether in writing or letting the party see it, is quite immaterial. But when we are called on to decide on the balance of testimony, there cannot be a doubt on which side the balance preponderates, and it preponderates to a most enormous extent in favour of the plaintiffs; for, putting out of the case the acquisition of the recipe from the father, all he says is, that for the time, during the eleven days, I think, he was acting as his servant, he was employed in the concern and so acquired a knowledge of the ingredients and the mixing and so forth; and, then, when admitted a partner, he superintended in common with the other partners the manufacture of the medicine, and so acquired the knowledge which he says he had acquired, because he says it corresponds with the recipe. Now, it must be observed, that in order to meet that, there is, in the first place, the positive denial by Morison, and the denial, as far as I can collect, by all the servants,—certainly by five different servants,—who all swear positively that that is absolutely untrue, and they go into a great deal of detail, which it is not necessary for me to go into here, as to the mode in which the drugs were kept locked up in a particular closet, and the mode in which the mixing took place, in which they say it is quite clear that Moat had no participation. The result of that is, that the evidence is overwhelmingly strong in favour of the plaintiffs and against the defendant, and therefore we think that this injunction ought to be continued. Of course, the undertaking will be given which was called for, namely, that the parties will be responsible to make compensation or reparation in damages if it shall eventually turn out they do not sustain the injunction. That is the judgment of the Court.

Jan. 22.—On this day Mr. Shapter stated that an order had been taken for making the injunction perpetual, and making arrangements as to the application of the assets of the testator.

In re MANSON.

Lunacy—Committee—Defending Suit.

A lunatic was made a defendant as one of the next-of-kin of an intestate. He and his committee presented a petition entitled in the suit, and also in the lunacy, praying that the lunatic might defend by his guardian, and that the committee might be appointed such guardian. The committee prayed that, as such, he might be at liberty to prosecute the claim of the lunatic as next-of-kin, and that all such costs as should be properly incurred, and as should not be paid out of the estate to be administered in the suit might be raised and paid out of the lunatic's estate. The Court gave liberty to the committee to defend the suit, but refused to appoint a guardian as being unnecessary, or to make any prospective order as to costs, and directed the title in the cause to be struck out.

This was a petition presented by the lunatic and the committee of his person and estate, and was entitled as well in the lunacy as in a suit in Chancery, to which the lunatic had been made a defendant. After stating the lunacy of James Manson; the appointment of the committee, William Thacker; that the committee's accounts had been passed; that on the 20th of December 1851, W. Anderson and G. Delmar filed a bill against the lunatic and several other persons who claimed as next-of-kin of Margaret Manson deceased, who (under the circumstances stated in the petition) left personal estate divisible among her next-of-kin, praying that administration accounts might be directed and taken, and the rights of the parties declared; and that the undisposed-of residue of her estate consisted of 6,000*l.* or thereabouts. Other facts were then stated not necessary to be adverted to, and it was prayed by the lunatic that his committee might be appointed his guardian, by whom he might answer the bill, and appear in the suit and prosecute his claim to be one of the next-of-kin of Margaret Manson; and the committee prayed that he might be at liberty as such committee to take and concur with the other defendants or any of them in taking all necessary steps to prosecute the lunatic's claim as one of such next-of-kin. The prayer of the petition concluded thus: "and that all such costs as shall be properly incurred by both your petitioners, James Manson and William Thacker, in appearing to and answering the said bill, and generally in the said suit, or otherwise relating or incidental to the said claim and suit, and consequent thereon, respectively, and as shall not be paid out of the estate to be administered in the said suit, including the costs of this application and consequent thereon, may be raised and paid out of the estate of the said petitioner, James Manson."

Mr. W. Collins, who appeared for the petition, stated in answer to questions from the Court, that the reason why the prospective order as to costs was asked, was that extensive inquiries were expected to become necessary in proving that the lunatic and five other persons were the only next-of-kin of the intestate. The family had been extremely numerous, and although it was almost certain that no more than six persons were now in the situation to claim as next-of-kin, the inquiries would probably be very extensive.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH said it appeared to him that speaking of such costs was crying out before the petitioner was hurt. The preliminary inquiries in the Master's office might shew that such further investigation was not necessary, and the costs would not be incurred. His Lordship was quite willing to give leave to the committee to defend the suit in the ordinary manner. If costs should be incurred by the inquiries suggested, and the same were not otherwise provided for, the committee could come to the Court and proper attention would be paid to him. As to making any prospective order, that was quite out of the question.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE considered that the entitling the petition in the cause as well as in the lunacy was wrong, and should be altered. It must be entitled in the lunacy only. No appointment of a guardian was necessary. The lunatic, having been made a defendant, would answer the bill and defend the suit as a matter of course by his committee, and in the common and ordinary manner. All that the Court could do would be to make the common order, giving leave to defend, and reserve liberty to apply.

Ex parte STAPLES, in re
 BROWN, AND In re
 THE OXFORD, BLETCHLEY JUNCTION AND BUCK-INGHAMSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY'S ACTS.

Railway Company — Re-investment — Tenant for Life—Remainder-man—Service of Petition.

*Lands had been settled on A. for life, with remainders over. A railway company took part of the lands and the money was paid into court. An eligible property being found for the re-investment of part of the money, the tenant for life petitioned for the payment of so much out of court for that purpose :—
 Held, that the petition need not be served on the parties entitled in remainder, but the order could be made on the petition of the tenant for life alone.*

This was a case where the Oxford,
 Bletchley Junction and Buckinghamshire Railway Company had purchased a portion of certain estates, which were settled, by the will of the grandfather of the petitioner, Mr. Brown, upon the petitioner, Mr. Brown, for life, remainder to his children in equal shares as tenants in common, and in default of children then upon similar trusts successively for two other of the testator's grandsons and their children, with an ultimate limitation to the testator's own right heirs. The purchase-money of the land taken had been paid into the Bank and invested in consols by order of the Court, pursuant to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. The petitioner contracted for the purchase of property, upon which a part of the money could be re-invested upon the trusts of the will. This purchase was approved of by the Master, and the petitioner, the first tenant for life, presented a petition, praying that the Master's report might be confirmed, and that so much of the fund in court as would be sufficient to raise the purchase-money of the lands the subject of contract might be sold out and the proceeds paid to the vendor on his executing a conveyance of the same. The petition was originally heard before Vice Chancellor Sir Richard Kindersley, who declined to make the order until the parties entitled in remainder to the inheritance of the settled estates should have been served with the petition. Upon that occasion the 69th, the 70th, and other sections of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act were cited, which provide for the payment into court of money paid for settled lands and the re-investment of the same, at the instance of the party who would be entitled to the rents and profits for the time being;

 and it was then argued that the Court of Chancery was, in effect, the protector of the interests of all parties, and that it had never been the practice to require the presence of the parties entitled in remainder upon a petition for re-investment; and further that the expenses of the company, who had to pay the costs of the re-investment, would be greatly increased if such a practice were adopted. It was admitted that possibly the practice was more that of the Registrar's office than of the Court.
 Vice Chancellor Kindersley observed that in fact the clause referred to was the same as the clause for sale and exchange in an estate act, and that his own opinion and that of two other Judges with whom he had conferred was, that the persons entitled in remainder ought to be before the Court, as that was the only mode in its power of protecting the interests of all parties.
 His Honour also observed that, in his opinion, the legislature never could have intended any other mode of proceeding to be followed. The fact was, it was admitted, that the practice was that of the Registrar's office, and not one sanctioned by decision; and that no person having been hitherto interested in raising the point, the question had not been discussed, and orders had been taken sub silentio.
 His Honour then declined to make the order, but said that if the parties wished it, he would permit the petition to be mentioned to a higher Court, so that the question should be finally settled and the practice rendered certain and unambiguous.
 The petition was then, by leave, placed in their Lordships' paper, and now came on for hearing.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Speed, for the company.—The requisition now made by Vice Chancellor Kindersley is an entire novelty.
 It has been the uniform practice, since the commencement of railway transactions in the year 1832, to make these orders without requiring the parties interested in remainder to be served. The Court in these cases acts, not by virtue of its ordinary jurisdiction, but under a statutory power conferred upon it by the legislature, and which it is enabled to exercise upon a summary application by the tenant for life or the parties entitled to the rents and profits of the lands in settlement. By the 7th section of the statute conferring this power, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, the party entitled to the rents is enabled to convey without the concurrence of the parties interested in remainder; and by the 70th section the same power is given to the tenant for life, upon petition, to have the money laid out in the purchase of other lands, and to have the money invested in government or real securities in the mean time. In none of these cases has the Court ever refused to act in the absence of the parties entitled in remainder. The legislature intended to make the tenant for life a sort of protector of the settlement in the same way as he is so made by the real property statutes. In all instances the acting party throughout is the tenant for life, who pursues the course pointed out by the statute. He conducts the sale to the company, and upon the purchase-money being paid into the Bank he suggests the manner in which it is to be dealt with by the Court. The Court acts upon that suggestion, and itself has regard to the interests of the parties entitled to the inheritance. That has been the course hitherto invariably pursued. If after twenty years of uniform practice, and after hundreds of thousands of pounds have been invested on the faith of this uniformity of practice, a contrary rule is to be adopted, the effect will be to put in hazard all this enormous amount of capital paid away by railway companies and to shake the safety of numberless titles founded on such practice. If this old custom is not now adhered to, the effect will be to defeat the whole scheme and object of the statute, which was to enable such purchases and investments to be made in a summary way at the instance of a tenant for life.

ture intended to make the tenant for life a sort of protector of the settlement. I observe, too, that where the fund is less than 200*l.* the 71st section of the act provides that it may be paid to two trustees nominated by the tenant for life and approved of by the company, and by them applied in the purchase of other lands. It appears that in that case the trustees might act without the consent of the cestuis que trust under the settlement.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—In the case of a private settlement the tenant for life alone consents, but there the trustees are present to protect the inheritance. You contend that here the same practice is pursued, except that the Master or the Court is substituted for the trustees. As Vice Chancellor, I, for nine years, made many orders similar to that which is here asked, and no one seems to have considered them wrong.

The case of a private settlement where the estate of inheritance is protected by the trustees, and the Court being substituted for the trustees, is probably the analogy most applicable. Where the Court proceeds under a statutory power, it acts only under the statute; otherwise it would be necessary to apply all the rules of the Court upon these summary applications. If the presence of the inheritance be necessary, all the parties interested must be ascertained, but as no machinery is provided by the statute for this purpose, how is it to be done except by the ordinary dilatory and expensive machinery of the Court? The effect of such a course would be extremely onerous upon companies already sufficiently burdened by the expenses of carrying into effect these purchases. In the present case, where there are several successive tenants for life, with limitations over to their children at twenty-one, and an ultimate limitation to the testator's right heirs, service upon a multitude of parties would be requisite, and their separate attendance by counsel at the expense of the company would be entailed upon that body. If the party intrusted to sell, namely, the tenant for life, be not intrusted to reinvest, where is the limit to the expense? Put the case of land charged with a number of legacies, would it be necessary in such a case to serve all the legatees?

Mr. Baggallay appeared for the tenant for life, and submitted that service on the parties in remainder was needless.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—Great difficulty might frequently occur where the parties in remainder are under disabilities. It would appear that the party intrusted to sell the property might be equally intrusted to select a proper re-investment, especially as such investment is required to be made with the sanction of the Master. I have inquired of the Registrar whether the practice has been to serve the cestuis que trust, and he says that it has not. If this question had come before me in 1832, when first the statutes were passed, and had I been called on to say what course ought to be adopted, and what rule of practice ought to be laid down, I might have come to the same conclusion as now presses on Vice Chancellor Kindersley, or probably my decision would have been in accordance with the practice hitherto adopted; but (whether my opinion would have been according to the present rule or not) when it appears as a matter of fact that this practice has gone on for twenty years, and that no inconvenience has resulted from it, I am certainly not prepared to say that that practice should not be persevered in. Taking analogy and practice together, I think it inexpedient to interfere to change the course hitherto pursued in these matters.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—By way of security in cases of this description, there is the superintendence of the Master, the improbability of the tenant for life seeking to injure the inheritance, and lastly the presence of the railway company, which, if anything gross were done, and through supineness or collusion they should be held to have connived at it, they would probably be themselves treated upon the footing of trustees, and thus have to pay the money over again. For these reasons I think, and Lord Cranworth concurs, that the order may be made as asked by this petition without any service on the parties entitled in remainder under this will.

V.C. } WOOD v. SUTCLIFFE.
Dec. 2, 3, 4. }

Watercourse—Injunction—Long User—Pecuniary Compensation—Acquiescence.

The plaintiff had occupied for many years a manufactory for worsted spinning on a stream, and claimed a right of having the water come to his works in a pure state. The defendant erected dye-works on the same stream, by which the water was polluted. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant and recovered a farthing damages, and now applied for an injunction to restrain the defendant from a continuous infringement of his rights. Held, that a person may by long user acquire a right to the water of a stream free from pollution, though he may have no proprietorship in the stream, and may acquire a right to pour polluted matter into a stream as against all new comers: that a person having established his right at law is not, as a matter of course, entitled to an injunction, particularly where the injunction would not restore the plaintiff to the right he has established, and where the act complained of may be compensated by pecuniary damages: that in this case the evidence proved that, owing to the increase of polluting matter poured into the stream from other sources than that of the defendant's works, the plaintiff never could be re-instated in his original rights: that the damage might be compensated by money; and that the plaintiff had been guilty of such an amount of acquiescence as would disentitle him to an injunction. Injunction refused.

The facts of this case and the arguments used are fully stated in the judgment.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Daniel appeared for the plaintiffs.

The Rochdale Canal Company v. King, 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 675.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—If I thought that by a careful perusal of the affidavits, which are very numerous, I should acquire a more full and accurate knowledge of the facts than I consider myself now to have, I should certainly postpone giving judgment until I had read through those affidavits; but in this case, as in many others, although the affidavits are numerous, when attention is paid to them throughout, the matter which those affidavits purport to contain is far more bulky in paper than it is with respect to the substance of the facts which the evidence goes to; and feeling as I do that I have a sufficiently full and accurate knowledge of the facts of the case, so far as any facts are at all material to the decision of this question, I think it better not to postpone giving judgment, but at once to express my opinion upon the whole case.

The injunction which is asked is an injunction to restrain the defendant Sutcliffe from pouring into this stream or beck, called the Bowling Beck, by means of that channel which connects his works with the beck, any dye water, or dye liquors, or madders, or indigo, or potash, or matters of that description, or any other matters which tend to pollute the stream, to the damage of the plaintiffs' works. Now, the case which the plaintiffs make in support of this application may be stated in substance to be this:—They say that more than twenty years ago, they established their works on this stream or beck, their works being those of worsted-spinners; that at the time when they established their works the stream came to their works in a pure and serviceable state; that they have acquired by long user as against all new comers a right to have the water still come to them in that pure state,—not that they affect, of course, to be proprietors of the stream, or the proprietors of the water through the stream, but the proprietors of the right to have the water come to their works in a pure and serviceable state, and that they have that right against Mr. Sutcliffe, whose works are of comparatively recent construction, being only completed in the early part of the year 1845; and that Mr. Sutcliffe, by means of his dye works, does pollute the stream—pollutes it by a colouring matter and the other matters which are held in suspension in the water as it flows down to the plaintiffs' mill, and by that means the plaintiffs are damnified in carrying on their works; and that, moreover, the plaintiffs have brought an action against Mr. Sutcliffe, in which action Mr. Sutcliffe did not raise the question of the right of the plaintiffs, but put in issue only the questions whether the operations of the defendant did damage the right of the plaintiffs; and whether there was any and what damage arising from the works of the defendant; that in that action the plaintiffs have recovered a verdict, and that verdict was followed by judgment, and that judgment was entered up on the 7th of January 1851.

The plaintiffs insist that, inasmuch as their right is clearly established, and not, in fact, controverted by Mr. Sutcliffe, and inasmuch as the verdict of the jury has established that that right is infringed and damaged by Sutcliffe, and inasmuch as the acts constituting that inquiry are continuous acts, they have a right to come to a court of equity and ask the Court to give effect to the legal right by restraining the defendant in the continuance of those acts. Now, there is no doubt that a person establishing works on a stream may, by long user of the water of that stream, although he has no proprietorship of the river or the water, acquire a right such as that which the plaintiffs here insist they have; and it appears to me clearly established that the plaintiffs have such a right, such a legal right I mean; a right to have the water come to them in a pure and unpolluted state, so that no pollutions or impurities in the water which are poured in by other persons who may be called new comers shall interfere with the effective carrying on of the works of the plaintiffs' manufactory. And not only may a person acquire such a right as that which I have mentioned, but, I may observe, he may also acquire another right, which is, that whereas the carrying on of his manufactures may require him to pollute the water which he uses, he may have acquired a right to pour his polluted water into the stream as against all new comers, so that those below him coming after he has acquired the right may not have the right to complain of what he does to the stream, while he may still have the right to complain of what new comers do above him with respect to the pollution of the stream. Those legal rights may be acquired; it is not necessary to consider whether the plaintiffs have acquired the latter right, that is, the right to pollute the stream as against those below them, because that is not now in question. It appears to me, as I have said, that the plaintiffs have clearly established the first of those rights, namely, the right to have the water come to their works in a pure and unpolluted state.

Now, that being the legal right of the plaintiffs, another question arises, and that is a question which comes into controversy here. What right does that give them to apply to a court of equity for an injunction? It is not my intention to enter at all into a general disquisition upon the grounds on which courts of equity will interfere in all the different sorts of cases that arise where the Courts have been applied to for injunctions to restrain acts done to the injury of the plaintiffs. I shall confine my observations entirely to the precise sort of case that this is. Now, I conceive that if the plaintiffs have established such a legal right, as that which I have mentioned, and while they are in the enjoyment of that right, another person comes and erects machinery or any manufacturing works on that same stream above the plaintiffs' works, and by his manufacturing process so fouls the water as that, instead of coming as before pure and unsullied to the plaintiffs' works, it comes in a less pure and serviceable state than before, so as seriously and continuously to obstruct the effective carrying on of the plaintiffs' manufacture; if that be the case, and if the restraining of those acts by injunction will restore or tend to restore the plaintiffs to the position in which they have a right to stand and in which they before stood, and if, moreover, the injury which is occasioned by the works complained of is of such a nature as that the recovery of pecuniary damages would not afford an adequate compensation, that is, such a compensation as would, though not in specie, in effect place the plaintiffs in the same position in which they stood before: and if, moreover (for there are several conditions), the plaintiffs do not sleep upon their rights and do not acquiesce either actively or passively in the acts which they now complain of, but use due diligence and vigilance to take such steps as are proper and necessary for the vindication and protection of their rights—if these conditions occur in such a case as that which is now presented here, the plaintiffs, the parties so injured, I conceive, have, as a general rule, a right to come to the court of equity and say, "do not put us to bring action after action for the purpose of recovering damages, but interpose by a strong hand and prevent the continuance of those acts altogether, in order that our legal right may be protected and secured to us." I say as a general rule and principle, because it must not be forgotten that, of necessity, whenever a court of equity is asked for an injunction in cases of this nature, or at all resembling this, it must have regard not only to the dry, strict rights of the plaintiff and defendant, but must have regard to the surrounding circumstances, to the rights and interests which may be more or less involved in it. It must have, I say, regard to those matters in using its discretion as to whether it shall exercise the strong jurisdiction, for unquestionably it is a strong one, of granting the injunction which is asked for.

I have said that if the water, by the acts of the defendant, arrives in a less pure and serviceable state at the plaintiffs' works, so as to cause a serious obstruction,—I have used the term serious because I cannot concur in the proposition, if it is meant to be asserted, that the mere dry fact of the plaintiffs having the abstract right, as of itself, and that right be infringed in ever so minute a way, or ever so little to the practical damnification of the plaintiffs,—the court of equity will, as a matter of course, interfere upon the right being established at law by an injunction; that is a proposition which, I conceive, according to all the cases, not to be a tenable proposition, and therefore I have used the term serious. On the other hand, I am far from saying that because, in the action at law, the court of law and a jury have only given 1s. damages or a farthing damages, that is a ground for saying that the injury is not serious and that it may not be a case for granting the injunction. I have also used the term continuous injury. By continuous I do not mean never ceasing, but recurring at repeated intervals, so as to be of repeated occurrence, and to be the same root of damnification to the plaintiffs as an actual continuous mischief would be. It appears to me also, as I have said, that one of the conditions requisite to induce the Court to grant an injunction in such a case as that is, that by granting an injunction, and by stopping the acts complained of, the party complaining who has got the legal right will be restored, or rather that the injunction will restore, or tend to restore, the party complaining to the right he has established as against the defendant. And I put it in that way for this reason :—I conceive that it would be no defence to an application of this sort for the defendant to say, “It may be true that what I am doing does in some degree damage the plaintiff and prevent the effectual carrying on of his works, but there is another person, A. B., who is as much a wrong-doer as I am, who is doing ten times more harm to the plaintiff than I am doing; and, in fact, although what I pour into the stream is not pure, it is so much purer than what he pours into the stream, that, in fact, when you get the water it is purer when it arrives at your mills or your works than it would have been if A. B.’s pollutions had been poured in without the admixture of any less polluted water.” I do not understand that that is meant to be contended for by the defendant’s counsel; but I mention it as a reason why I use the term, in endeavouring to enunciate what I conceive is applicable to this particular sort of case. I am not speaking of copyright cases or other cases which may stand on a different footing, but I am stating the reason why it appears to me that to induce the Court of equity to interfere by injunction, the injunction must restore, or tend to restore, the plaintiff to the full exercise of his rights.

Now the facts of the case, as I think they fairly appear as the result of the masses of affidavits presented, seem to lie in a narrow compass. Here is a stream flowing through a valley which flows into and through the town, or part of the town, of Bradford, a great manufacturing place, whose worsted and woollen manufactures have become, I may say, perfectly gigantic at present. From time to time persons have established different works on the banks of this stream; and we all know that most manufactures—perhaps you may say all manufactures—at least, when carried on upon a large scale, require, if not worked by water power, at least the use of water in very large quantities for the various purposes connected with their manufacture. A very great number of those different works and factories appear to have been established at different intervals of time, some more remote, some more recent, on the banks of this stream, or on the tributaries and feeders which flow into the stream. I mention that, because one of the tributaries, called Low Beck in the map, on which, in fact, the defendant’s premises may be considered to stand, and a drain or water-course through which it is said the defendant pours this matter, is almost parallel to the channel of that tributary stream, called Low Beck. Among the various works which have been thus established on the banks of this stream are the works of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs, I understand, are wool-spinners, and for the purpose of their works it is of great importance to them to have pure water; and, as I collect, the purposes for which pure water is most essential to the effective carrying on of their works may be considered as resolving themselves under three heads. The one is, that they want water to wash the wools, when it is perfectly obvious purity is an essential ingredient in the character of the water that is used; another is, to use the water in the boilers of machinery for the purpose of generating steam; a third is, to use it in a cold state for the purpose of condensing the steam. Other wool-spinners, or wool-combers, or persons connected with the manufacture of wool and worsted, have all at different intervals of time, many of them at comparatively recent periods, established works upon this stream. Among the works established are two dye-works,—the one is the dye-works of the Messrs. Ripley, higher up the stream than that of the defendant, and the other is that of the defendant Mr. Sutcliffe. With respect to Messrs. Ripley's dye-works, it appears by the evidence that they have been established on a more or less extensive scale for a great number of years. It appears from Mr. Ripley's affidavit, that even as far back as eighty years his father and grandfather had works there. It is admitted that the works were upon a less extensive scale than they have since become, and I think Mr. Ripley also speaks of his own carrying on the works there for some forty years or thereabouts, a period considerably anterior to the time when the plaintiffs' works were established. The defendant purchased his land only in the year 1844, and he immediately proceeded to build his works, and had completed them, so as to bring them into operation in his manufacture and his trade as a dyer, as early as February 1845. Besides the various manufacturing works which have been established on the banks of this stream, a very large and dense population has gradually sprung up on the banks, or contiguous to the banks, of the stream. There was no doubt a time, and probably a time not very far remote, when the stream, or that portion of it which lies between Messrs. Ripley's works and the plaintiffs' works, flowed through open fields and meadows and cultivated ground; that for some time past has ceased to be the case, and a very large population has arisen, contained in about 1,660 houses, which have been built in streets and otherwise, as a sort of continuation of or suburb to Bradford, which lies somewhat lower down the stream. These houses have had the effect of more or less polluting and altering the character of the stream, as an inevitable consequence; it is impossible but that the aggregation of human beings on the banks of the stream must tend to make that stream a polluted sewer, more or less, instead of being a pure stream. I am satisfied from the evidence that to some considerable extent the pollution of this stream, I do not say from the defendant's works or anybody's works in particular, is inevitable, and that no court of law or equity, nor all the courts in the world, except there were a power of removing all that mass of human beings which is congregated about its banks, ever could restore this stream to the state in which it once was. But still it does not follow that, because there is a certain degree of pollution, which perhaps cannot be very accurately measured, and which is inevitable, everybody has a right to make the stream, by pouring in immense quantities of filth and pollution from his own works, ten thousand times worse than it was without it.

These being the general facts of the case, and although doubtless there had been a considerable degree of deterioration of the stream, from various causes, up to 1844, there appears never to have been any dispute between the different riparian owners upon the stream. The plaintiffs have themselves been obliged to submit to the inevitable effect upon such a stream,—that of ceasing to use it for the purpose of washing their wool; and one sees obviously, even without any information from affidavits, that to wash wool and worsted must necessarily require very pure water. The plaintiffs, for many years past, before the defendant commenced or brought his works at all, had been obliged in that respect to submit to the inevitable necessity of seeking for pure water from another source; and they and the other proprietors of works upon this stream seem to have sunk artesian wells or bored holes, and by that means have been able to raise large quantities of pure water for the purpose of washing the wools. It appears, moreover, that for several years, and before the defendant had begun to use his works, the plaintiffs had been also under the necessity, for their advantage, to cease using generally the waters of the stream for boiler purposes, because from the quantity of matter held in suspension in this water, the use of it in the boilers, as the steam evaporated, caused a large deposit of matter round the boilers, and we know what the effect of that is, that as that incrustation increases, the water no longer touching the iron, the iron is very easily burnt through, and a great impediment is produced to the carrying on of the works. They had been obliged for years to resort to the artesian water for that purpose also; they still continued, however, to use the waters of the beck for the purpose of condensing. Now, in the year 1844, which is the first time that any litigation had arisen about these water-rights in this part of the stream, Messrs. Waud having established some works, they being also themselves worsted-spinners, in the business carried on by the plaintiffs, and having established works a little way above those of the plaintiffs on this stream, and the plaintiffs, complaining that they injured the water by their works, brought an action against Messrs. Waud to recover damages for polluting the stream. The defence set up by Messrs. Waud to that action raised not merely the question whether their operations did damage the stream, but the question of the plaintiffs' right and title. A verdict was obtained in 1845, subject to the opinion of the Court upon a special case. The question upon the special case affected the question of the right of the plaintiffs, and the judgment of the Court was not obtained upon that special case until Easter term, 1849, when the Court of Exchequer gave final judgment for the plaintiffs (1); and on the 1st of August 1849 that judgment was signed and entered up. About the time that that action began, namely, in the year 1844, the defendant, Mr. Sutcliffe, bought the land on which he has since proceeded to erect his works. Now Mr. Sutcliffe states most positively, and I see no reason to doubt the truth of his statement, for there is no contradiction to it, that he was not at all aware of any question or action whatever as between the plaintiffs and Messrs. Waud on the subject of the polluting this water, until a considerable time after his works had come into operation. The defendant continued to carry on his dye-works, pouring in, in not any less quantity, as far as I can see on the evidence, than he does now, the dye liquors and dye wares, and so on,—in short, the matter which is complained of as polluting the stream from the beginning of 1845, without any notice from the plaintiffs, until the 8th of January 1850, a period within a few weeks of five years; and then, on the 8th of January 1850, a formal notice was given on the part of the plaintiffs to the defendant to cease, in effect, from polluting the water. After that notice was given, and on the 3rd of June 1850, the plaintiffs entered into that deed of arrangement with another proprietor, another manufacturer, who is likewise on the stream, Mr. Dixon; the effect of which is this, that instead of litigating the question, Mr. Dixon agrees that he will pay at the rate of 2*l.* per horse power per annum for the same, the plaintiffs not bringing an action against him, and as damages for what he is doing to this water, from the hour of five in the morning to seven in the afternoon; and I understand, though it is not very distinctly in evidence, similar deeds of arrangement, that is, more or less similar, have been entered into between the plaintiffs and some of the other proprietors of the factories immediately contiguous to those of Messrs. Waud, Messrs. Greenwood, and other persons whose names are not material, all lying in what is aptly enough called the nest of factories, immediately above the works of the plaintiffs. The notice having been given to Mr. Sutcliffe on the 8th of January, on the 5th of June 1850 an action was commenced against Sutcliffe by the plaintiffs, to which the defendant pleaded "not guilty;" and it is admitted the question of the plaintiffs' title was not in controversy there at all. The question really in issue there was, whether the acts of the defendant were acts which went to the damage and injury of the plaintiffs. The trial came on on the 27th of July 1850, and then a verdict is given for the plaintiffs, with one farthing damages. I should further mention, that after the trial of the action and the verdict, on the 24th of December, (the verdict having been given in July,) the plaintiffs served a written notice upon the defendant to desist, and stating that they should file a bill against him for an injunction to restrain his continuing the acts which they complained of. That was on the 24th of December, and on the 7th of January following, 1851, judgment in the action against Sutcliffe was entered up. On the 19th of February 1851 the bill was filed; on the 27th of February 1851 a notice of motion was given for the 10th of March.

Adverting to what I conceive to be the conditions which must concur to induce this Court to interfere, the first question which arises is, whether, assuming that damage is done by the defendant's works, the restraining of that damage will restore, or tend to restore, the plaintiffs to the right which they had originally of having the water clean to their works. Now, as I have said, if it was only this, "there is somebody else fouling the water besides me," the saying that would be no defence to such an application; but if by reason of the whole change in the condition of the surrounding country and neighbourhood the stream has become polluted to such an extent that it cannot be used for the purposes of the plaintiffs' works, the granting the injunction to restrain this one wrong-doer, if he be such, from continuing his works would do no good to the plaintiffs. It will not do them that good, the doing of which is alone the ground on which a court of equity will use its strong power to interfere to restrain the defendant's works from going on. If, notwithstanding a certain degree of pollution of the water, the plaintiffs can still use the water, although not so usefully, and then the defendant pollutes it to make it so much worse that they can use it in a less effective manner than they did before, or if the degree of pollution existing, we will say, from Messrs. Ripley's works, may be prevented by the plaintiffs by the same process which they were using against Mr. Sutcliffe; if that were the state of the case, of course they would have a right to say, "This is a case in which an injunction would restore, or tend to restore, us to the rights which we originally had with regard to the stream." Now, there is nothing to shew me, and I am not able to say from the evidence before me, how far the non-user of Messrs. Ripley of that extent of pollution which they have of late years caused to this water—how far, if they were away, the water is polluted by the other works (for there are a great many of them, and I have only three brought here before me particularly), or how far the pollution arising from these works would be so comparatively small as that the plaintiffs might continue to carry on their business effectively by using the water. But I have this fact, that Messrs. Ripley's increase of works has been comparatively recent, the defendant's dye-works did not come into operation until the early part of 1845. Then, were the plaintiffs, before the defendant's works came into operation, able to use the water of the stream for their works, either in the shape of using it for washing wool, or in the shape of using it in boilers? Clearly not. And, therefore, I think that that affords a very strong ground for saying that the mere removal of the defendant's works, or preventing the defendant from carrying on his works in the manner in which he now does, really would not have the effect of causing the water of this stream to come down to the plaintiffs' works in the same pure and unpolluted state, which the plaintiffs, according to their original right, ought to have. I do not feel sure, therefore, even if it turned upon this part of the case, that the granting the injunction, while it would have the effect, if not of ruining the defendant, of doing him most serious mischief, would, on the other hand, have the effect of benefiting the plaintiffs by restoring them, or tending to restore them, to the rights which they contend for, and which I admit that they have.

But it does not rest merely upon that; another condition, which I conceive, beyond all controversy, is a necessary condition to induce a court of equity to interfere by injunction in a case similar to that now before me, is, that the mischief complained of is such as cannot properly and equitably be compensated by pecuniary damages. Now, let us see how this matter stands; for years past, and long before the defendant began his works, the plaintiffs had not the use of the beck for washing purposes, or for boiling purposes. Other persons carrying on either the same trade as the plaintiffs themselves, or trades of a similar description, have entered into arrangements with the plaintiffs, whereby, very wisely indeed I must say, in order to avoid litigation, it has been agreed that although what those other parties do tends to pollute the stream to the damnification of the plaintiffs, they shall continue to do that (I am speaking now of Dixon's case, and the others are said to be of a similar character,) during fourteen hours out of the twenty-four, and shall pay a certain rent or tax for the right to do it. Now, if an arrangement can be made such as that, by which even without litigation the defendant and other parties of whom the plaintiffs complain may come to an arrangement which is to give each a certain fair use of the water, the plaintiffs ought in fair dealing, and it would be right for them to say this:—"We do not want to ruin you; we do not want merely, like a dog in the manger, to prevent your using the water while we cannot; but we want, by having reservoirs and filtering beds, or some other method, to come to such arrangement with you as we have come to with other persons." If that be the purpose (and it is a very legitimate purpose), it is perfectly right, and I do not at all agree with the defendant's counsel that that amounts to an attempt to levy a tax upon those persons, and to use a strict right merely to enforce an unrighteous demand of money from the party. But if that be the case, surely the bringing an action against the party who ought, as the plaintiffs say, to come into such arrangement, would be nearly as efficacious and might just as well be used to bring them to those terms. Ought I then to say I will grant the injunction in order to compel the defendant to come into terms, by which he is to pay you so much for using it so many hours, or any other arrangement? If any force applied to the defendant would bring him to that, I think I ought to leave him to the force which would be applied by means of an action brought. If all this were represented to the jury, and if the jury were satisfied that he did not come into terms, they could say, instead of a farthing or 1s. or 40s., "We will give you 50l. or 100l. for the damage that has been inflicted upon you by the defendant." It appears to me, therefore, that upon that ground even, the plaintiffs themselves have shewn that it is a matter which may in some way be compensated by money.

But I do not rest my decision upon either of those two points. The principal ground upon which I conceive I must refuse this injunction is, I will not say the acquiescence, using that term in the active sense, but that from the beginning of 1845 down to the beginning of 1850 the defendant was allowed to construct and to use his dye-works for a period of five years, without any hint being given on the part of the plaintiffs that he was doing anything that he had not a lawful right to do. Now, let us see for a moment how this matter stands. The plaintiffs say, "What we knew was, that there were some works being erected in the neighbourhood. We did not know who the person was that was erecting those works, still less did we know to what purpose those works were to be applied." Now, it must be borne in mind that at this very time, when the defendant was erecting his works, the plaintiffs were stirring about the protection of their own rights in this water; they were then commencing the first of a series of proceedings, to protect and vindicate their rights in this water, by bringing an action against Messrs. Waud; they were informed, as they say, that somebody, they did not know who, was erecting some works, they did not know for what purpose, in a situation upon the banks of a rivulet which flowed into this very beck; was it not their business not to be content with their ignorance, but to ascertain who it was that was building these works, and to give notice to the person who was erecting those works that if he used them for any purpose which tended to the pollution of the stream, he would erect and carry on those works at his peril, for that they, the plaintiffs, had a right to have the water come pure to their works, and that they would apply to a court of equity for an injunction to restrain them? Instead of that, not only are the works allowed to be erected, but for five years the works are carried on, and not a word said. Without admitting that the defendant has a right to come and erect works upon a stream without asking questions, and then leave others to find out whether he is infringing their rights or not, what does he find? He finds that there are, I think it is said, some thirty different works of different kinds, all more or less pouring noxious, or injurious, or polluting matter into this stream, and among the rest of those works, an actual dye-work, which has subsisted for seventy or eighty years, so long that it was not to be supposed there was any question about the right to use the dye-works upon that stream, and pour the dye wares and dye liquors into the beck. Therefore, although I do not at all mean to suggest that the defendant is not put to inquiry, still the defendant, if he did inquire, would have seen the same thing being done all round him which he was proposing to do himself, and it is a striking circumstance that he erects his dye-works upon a pre-existing open drain which was not, so far as I can see, a drain for the purpose of draining the upper country, but actually being used for the purpose of draining off the refuse matter from other factories—I mean the factories of Mitchell and Turner, and two or three other names that have been mentioned as having their works in the neighbourhood of Mitchell & Turner's. Well, the defendant, I feel, was put upon the inquiry, but the answer would be—"Circumspice,—see what is being done around. I see every manufacturer here has poured his refuse matter, more or less pollusive to the stream, into the waters of the stream;" What else was he to do? Was he to go to every man—because that is what he was bound to do if he had done more—who had got works built upon this stream, not only down to Bradford, but all through the town of Bradford, and inquire of him—"Do you mean to say that you have any right to use this stream as a sewer, that is, as a drain, and that I am not to be able to do so?" I cannot conceive that there was any necessity for that. But what were the plaintiffs put upon? The plaintiffs were really put upon this, it was not that they were caught napping, for they were then in the very act of stirring and rousing themselves, even to the point of conflict with Messrs. Waud, to protect their rights. They knew the defendant had purchased or was purchasing ground, and was erecting works in such a manner so that the refuse of his works, whatever they turned out to be, whether that of a worsted-spinner or a worsted-comber, would come into the stream; surely their business was to have gone or sent to the spot and ascertained who the gentleman was who was erecting the works, and communicated with him. If they had only done that, and if they had followed that up as soon as they found the defendant was using this stream in the way of which they complain, and had come at once for an injunction, the Court would have said, and with great justice, "You have used due diligence, and vigilantibus non dormientibus servit lex"; instead of which, not only is no notice given to prevent the outlay in these works, which is stated to be to the amount of some 10,000*l.*, but the carrying on is permitted for five years and it is not suggested as being a nuisance, nor is any complaint made of it by the plaintiffs to the defendant. Now the answer is, "Yes, but all that time the plaintiffs were busy establishing their title as against Messrs. Waud." Still, that was no reason why notice should not be given to the present defendant to prevent his incurring the enormous expense. It was no reason why he should not have been told there were things that he was doing which the plaintiffs objected to,—“We are litigating actually with Messrs. Waud, and we tell you that you will come under the same sort of litigation if you do the same thing which Messrs. Waud are doing, namely, erecting works, and by the refuse of those works polluting the stream.”

Although I do not think the judgment ought to turn upon this, I cannot say that I think anything like activity or diligence was used even when they began to bestir themselves. For only see what occurred: they had got the final judgment against the Wauds establishing their right in Easter term, 1849, but the judgment was not actually signed and entered up until August 1849. Then, if they were only waiting until they had got their right decided against the Wauds before they took any step with regard to Mr. Sutcliffe, were they not bound as soon at least as they got that, to take steps? But what do they do? Having got final judgment pronounced by the Court of Exchequer in Easter term, they never stir a step until January 1850, and then they send their formal notice to the defendant Sutcliffe to require him to desist from his works. Then again what do they do? So far from stirring again, it is not until the 5th of June 1850, that they commenced an action against Mr. Sutcliffe, a year and a quarter after the Court of Exchequer had established their right by pronouncing final judgment in the case against the Wauds. Then the action against Mr. Sutcliffe being brought, proceeds speedily to trial: there is no delay there on the part of the plaintiffs. It is tried on the 27th of July 1850; and then what takes place? Instead of entering up judgment in the Michaelmas term following, it is entered within two or three days after the commencement of the following term. In the mean time no bill is filed and no step taken, except that on the 24th of December 1850, there is a threat that they will file a bill. Well, that bill was not filed until the 19th of February 1851. Now, without saying that upon this portion of the delay alone the judgment ought to turn, it does appear to me that there has been that sort of very serious delay in prosecuting the proceedings against the defendant when once they were begun, which ought to make me hesitate very much about granting the injunction; but when I couple this with what I must call the acquiescence for five years in the defendant carrying on his works, it does appear to me that I should be violating the elementary principles of a court of equity in granting an injunction in such a case as this, and therefore I say that if it turned on this last point, and if I considered this the principal point, I should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction upon this motion. Upon the second of the points, as to its being capable of being compensated by money, I incline to think if it turned upon that, I should not grant the injunction. I also doubt very much whether there would be upon the first of the points I have mentioned sufficient ground, namely, that by granting the injunction and inflicting such serious damage upon the defendant, I should be doing any real practical good to the plaintiffs; but, however, upon the last of the grounds—the delay at the commencement of the five years—suffering the defendant to erect his works, I had almost made up my mind, but I could not decide finally until I had heard the whole case. Having heard the whole case out, I think justice requires not that I should refuse the motion with costs, but that I should refuse the motion, reserving the costs until the hearing of the cause.

GREENWOOD v. ROBERTS.

Will—Construction—Remoteness.

A testator directed his trustees to set apart sufficient stock to produce 700l. a year, and pay, among others, an annuity of 200l. a year to his brother Thomas for life, and after his decease to continue it amongst his brother's children then living, in equal shares, during their lives, and, at the decease of any of them, the stock, from which the 200l. a year arose, was to be sold, and the produce divided equally amongst the children of him or her so dying, as they should severally attain twenty-one, with interest in the mean time to be applied for their benefit; and he said, "I give them vested interests therein;" and if any of his brother's children should at his decease be dead, and have left issue, such issue should be entitled amongst them to the money they would eventually have been entitled to had their parent outlived his brother. If any of the parties anticipated the payment, or sold his interest before due, it was declared to be forfeited, and applied as if such parties had died before the legacy fell due. The testator then appointed his trustees, executors and residuary legatees. 23,333l. 6s. 8d. was set aside to answer the 700l. a year. The testator's brother Thomas died leaving six children, of whom Richard was one living at the date of the will, and he, after the decease of his father until his death, received an annuity of 33l. 6s. 8d., being one-sixth of the 200l. a year. Richard died leaving three children surviving, one of whom was born in the lifetime of the original testator:—Held, that the children of Richard were not entitled to the money representing the annuity to which he was entitled, but that it fell into the testator's residuary estate.

Richard Nicholson, by his will, dated the 18th of April 1827, after reciting that he was possessed of considerable capital in the public stocks or funds, gave and bequeathed the said capital stock, with the accumulations thereof, and all other Government stocks and securities and personal estate and effects which he might hold or be the proprietor of at the time of his decease, unto his brothers Thomas Nicholson and Joseph Nicholson, his nephew Richard Greenwood (one of the plaintiffs), and Richard Nicholson, the son of his brother Thomas Nicholson, their executors and administrators, upon trust, in the first instance, to appropriate and set apart, immediately after his decease, so much thereof as would produce an annual dividend of 700*l.*, and then, upon trust, to pay or retain therewith and thereout, as the case might be, the several life annuities therein mentioned, viz., to his said brother Thomas Nicholson, the annuity or yearly sum of 200*l.*, and to various other parties therein mentioned, including those mentioned and excepted in and by the clause next hereinafter set forth (and to which other persons the question in the case does not in any way relate), the several yearly sums therein mentioned, all which amounting in the aggregate to 700*l.*, the testator directed to be paid to the several annuitants during their natural lives, half-yearly, at such times as the dividends of the stocks or funds from whence the same were to arise should become due. The will then proceeded in the words following:—"And from and immediately after the decease of the said annuitants, or any of them, except the said Richard John Greenwood, and the son, and three first-named daughters of my sister Mary Pickup, it is my will and desire to continue and extend the annuity of each of them to the persons and in manner following, that is to say, my brother Thomas Nicholson's annuity of 200*l.* to and amongst such of his children as may be then living, in equal shares and proportions, during their respective natural lives; and at the decease of any of them, I order and direct that so much principal or capital stock as had been adequate to the payment of the annuity to which the child so dying had been entitled during his or her life, shall be forthwith sold and converted into money by my trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, his executors or administrators, and the actual produce thereof shared and divided equally amongst the children of him or her so dying, as and when they shall severally attain the age of twenty-one years, with interest in the mean time to be applied for their benefit and advantage; and I give them vested interests therein. And I further direct, if any of the children of my brother Thomas shall at his decease be dead and have left issue, that such issue shall nevertheless be entitled, amongst them if more than one, to the same sum of money as they would eventually have been entitled to had their parent outlived the said Thomas Nicholson the father."

And by the will, after the dispositions hereinbefore set forth, the testator also extended and continued the several other life annuities, and disposed of the capital stocks or funds which should be set apart to answer the same; and the will also contained a provision, to the effect that if any of the therein above-mentioned parties should, in order to anticipate the payment of the money thereby given to them, sell or dispose of the same previous to the time of its falling due and payable, then and in every such case the share and interest of such parties should be forfeited and cease, and should be applied and paid in such manner as was thereby directed in the event of the death of such parties before the time of their legacy falling due. And after giving several pecuniary legacies, the will concluded in the words following:—"I do hereby constitute and appoint the said Thomas Nicholson, Joseph Nicholson, Richard Greenwood, and Richard Nicholson executors of this my will, and also my residuary legatees, revoking all former wills by me made." The testator died on the 6th of May 1829; and on the 13th of June 1829 the will was proved by all the executors in the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of London. The executors set apart 23,333*l.* consols, in their joint names, for raising an annual dividend of 700*l.*

The testator's brother, Thomas Nicholson, received the annuity of 200*l.* a year during his life. He died on the 16th of December 1832, leaving six children surviving, namely, Richard Nicholson, who was living at the date of the will, and was named in it, and five others, and no children or child of the said Thomas Nicholson died in his lifetime leaving any issue them, him, or her surviving.

After the decease of Thomas Nicholson, an annuity of 33*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, being one-sixth of the annual sum of 200*l.*, was paid to Richard Nicholson up to the 26th of June 1847, when he died.

Richard Nicholson had four children, one still born, and three others; the defendant, Frances Amelia Roberts, born on the 5th of June 1824, in the life of the testator, and who intermarried with William John Roberts on the 13th of July 1842; and the defendants, Richard Thomas Nicholson and George William Nicholson, who were respectively born on the 2nd of June 1833, after the testator's decease.

No settlement or agreement for a settlement was ever made between W. J. Roberts and his wife.

By an order, dated the 24th of July 1851, Thomas Burleigh Stott was appointed the guardian of the infant defendants, R. T. Nicholson and G. W. Nicholson, for the purpose of concurring on their behalf in this special case.

And the questions now raised were, whether the children of Richard Nicholson, or any or either of them, became upon his decease entitled to the principal monies or capital stock producing the annuity to which the said R. Nicholson was entitled during his life, or to any part or parts thereof; or whether such principal monies or capital stock upon such decease fell into and became part of the testator's residuary personal estate.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Baggallay, for the plaintiffs, the residuary legatees.—The limitation to the children of R. Nicholson is a limitation to a class, and as this might and did in this case include a party in esse, the vesting of whose interest depended upon the same event which was to give effect to the interests of others of the same unascertained class, the entire gift was void. The interests of those living and those unascertained cannot be separated; if they cannot be supported together, they must wholly fail. The limitation over to the children of the children of Richard Nicholson is open to the same objection; it is or it may be given over after the death of a person not in esse at the testator's death, and who could not take any vested interest, and consequently was too remote. The limitation, therefore, to the children of Richard Nicholson, with the gifts over, are too remote, and on his death fell into the residue—Porter v. Fox (1).

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. F. T. White, for W. J. Roberts and Frances Amelia his wife.—The gift of the principal stock was to the children of Richard Nicholson as a class, with a direction that it was to be equally divided between them. It was also expressly stated that they should have vested interests, and though the gift might be expressed in words which would include all the children coming in esse after the decease of the testator, yet as each share was defined and was to be vested, that interest could not depend upon any contingency, but immediately on the decease of the testator became an interest vested in such of the children who were living; and consequently Mrs. Roberts became entitled, and her being joined as a co-defendant with others, who were not entitled, did not deprive her of her right—Roberts v. Roberts (2), Bristow v. Warde (3), Routledge v. Dorril (4).

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Rogers, for Richard Thomas Nicholson and George William Nicholson.—The gift was made to a class, which must of necessity be ascertained in the lifetime of Richard Nicholson. One of that class was living at the decease of the testator; the interest of that child in the fund was therefore vested, and was subject only to be divested by the birth of other children of Richard Nicholson; this, therefore, was within the time allowed by law for vesting, and the children born subsequent to the decease of the testator were entitled to participate in the principal monies jointly with the child who was living at the decease of the testator—Viscount Dungannon v. Smith (5), Leake v. Robinson (6), Jee v. Audley (7).

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I must declare that the children of Richard Nicholson did not, nor did any or either of them, become entitled upon his decease to the money representing the capital stock from which the apportioned annuity of 33l. 6s. 8d., to which Richard Nicholson was entitled during his life, arose; but that such money or capital stock upon his decease fell into, and became part of, the testator's residuary personal estate.

BRIGGS v. PENNY.

Will — Trust — Precatory Words — "Well knowing"—Resulting Trust for Next-of-kin.

A testatrix by her will gave to S. P., whom she appointed her sole executrix, 3,000l., and a like sum of 3,000l. in addition for the trouble she would have in acting as executrix; and she gave all the residue of her personal estate to S. P., her executors, administrators and assigns, "well knowing that she will make a good use and dispose of it in a manner in accordance with my views and wishes." Among the papers of the testatrix were found some memorandums in writing made since the statute 1 Will. 4. c. 40. and unattested, specifying certain charitable and other bequests which the testatrix desired to be made, one of which was addressed to S. P. S. P. by her answer denied all knowledge of the "views and wishes" of the testatrix previously to her death:—Held, affirming the decision of the Court below, that upon the words of the will S. P. did not take the residue beneficially, but that she was a trustee for the next-of-kin.

Quære—whether the unattested papers were admissible in evidence for the purpose of explaining the intentions of the testatrix.

This was a suit, instituted by the executors of the will of the late Earl of Oxford, for the administration of the estate of the Hon. Frances Harley, of whom the Earl was the sole next-of-kin at her death, and to obtain the declaration of the Court as to the effect of the residuary clause in her will. The sole defendant to the suit was Sarah Penny, her executrix and residuary legatee.

Frances Harley, by her will, dated the 13th of May 1835, after giving various charitable and other legacies, gave and bequeathed "to Sarah Penny 3,000l. and a like sum of 3,000l. in addition for the trouble she will have in acting as my executrix." And after divers other specific and pecuniary bequests and a devise of all her real estate, the testatrix bequeathed as follows:—"And lastly as to all the residue and remainder of my personal estate and effects, subject to and chargeable with the aforesaid several legacies and annuities, save and except such of them as are of a charitable nature which I exclusively charge upon such part of my personal estate as by law I am empowered to charge therewith, and not out of any part of my lands, tenements and hereditaments, I give and bequeath the same unto the said Sarah Penny, her executors, administrators and assigns, well knowing that she will make a good use and dispose of it in a manner in accordance with my views and wishes: and I hereby appoint the said Sarah Penny sole executrix of this my last will."

The testatrix, on the 19th of March 1836, made a codicil to her said will, revoking a bequest contained in her will, of her house and furniture, pictures, books, &c. but not further altering or affecting her said will. The testatrix further wrote a certain memorandum, without date and unattested, by which she gave certain annuities and pecuniary and specific legacies, but did not thereby otherwise alter or revoke her said will and codicil.

The testatrix died on the 25th of November 1848, leaving her brother, Edward Earl of Oxford, her sole next-of-kin, her surviving; and on the 28th of December 1848 Edward Earl of Oxford died, having by his will duly executed appointed the plaintiffs his sole executors. Probate of the will, codicil, and memorandum in writing of the testatrix was granted to Sarah Penny, though the granting of the same was opposed on behalf of the next-of-kin.

The bill, after setting forth the above facts, stated that a great portion of the annuities and legacies given by the will had lapsed, and that the residue in the hands of the defendant was of large amount; and it charged that, it not appearing by the will, &c. of the testatrix that Sarah Penny was entitled to take the residue beneficially, the next-of-kin were entitled, and that by virtue of the statute 1 Will. 4. c. 40. the defendant was a trustee of such residue for the next-of-kin; and that certain papers in the handwriting of the testatrix marked B, C, D, and E. not admitted to probate, clearly shewed that the defendant was intended to take in trust, to carry out the wishes and intentions of the testatrix expressed or to be expressed, and that no valid declaration of such views and wishes was ever made; that the testatrix was desirous of bequeathing her property for charitable purposes, and being aware that such bequests were void in law, communicated her views and wishes in that respect to the defendant, and it was arranged between them that such charitable intentions should not appear upon the face of the will, but that the testatrix should afterwards disclose the same to the defendant, who undertook and agreed to carry them out, and that upon the faith of that understanding and agreement the residue was bequeathed to the defendant.

The bill then set out the four several papers B, C, D, and E, which were found in the writing-desk of the testatrix, and were exhibited in the proceedings in the Prerogative Court in respect of the probate of the will.

Paper B. was as follows;—"It is my desire that Mary Lyford and Thomas Wheatley, if living with me at my death, shall have an annuity of 30*l.* a-year during the term of their natural life, free of legacy duties. I give to St. George's Hospital the sum of 1,000*l.*; to the Middlesex Hospital and the St. Marylebone Hospital the sum of 1,000*l.* each; to the Charing Cross Hospital, the London, the Fever, the Ophthalmic, and the Consumptive Hospitals, 500*l.* each; to St. Ann's School, to the London Orphan, and the Infant Orphan Asylums, 1,000*l.* each; to the National Benevolent, 1,000*l.*; to the Propagation of the Gospel, and the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1,000*l.* each; to my goddaughter Mary Prior 1,000*l.*; to my goddaughter Frances Darby 1,000*l.*; to my goddaughter Maria Frances Owen, 1,000*l.*; to the Church Building Fund, 5,000*l.*"

Paper C.—"My dearest friend,—You will see by my will that I have appointed you my sole executrix and residuary legatee, being well aware of your peculiar integrity in fulfilling my wishes. In law, I cannot leave much of my property in charities; I therefore request that you will consult with Mr. Harrison in what manner you can carry my wishes into effect. This paper must not appear. I wish some land to be purchased, and six almshouses erected and endowed in the same manner as those at the Hay; a marble tablet to be put up in Brampton Church to the memory of my dear father, mother, brother, sister, and self; 1,000*l.* to the Propagation of the Gospel; Miss Margaret Hewell, daughter of the late Benjamin Hewell, 20*l.* per annum during the term of her natural life; to Brecon Infirmary 1,000*l.*; to give at the rate of 500*l.* towards building churches, where there are to be free sittings for the poor; to build and endow a school for girls to be taught reading, writing, plain work, and their duty to their God; 20*l.* per annum to each of six clergymen's daughters that are old and infirm; to Mr. Harrison 10,000*l.* for his faithful services."

Paper D.—"My wishes, F. Harley.—The school I built at Cowley I wish to be endowed, with a salary to the schoolmistress of 30*l.* per annum, the sole controul of which to be vested in the rector of Cowley. I likewise wish to leave 500*l.* to the poor of Cowley, the interest to be laid out in any way the rector thinks best at Christmas. I leave 100*l.* to my goddaughter Frances Darby; to my goddaughter Mary Prior 1,000*l.*; to Caroline Watchurst, 1,000*l.*; to Augusta Maryon, 500*l.*; to Sophia Kennydy, 500*l.*; to Miss White, 100*l.*; to Mrs. Evans, 500*l.*; to E. Dalton, Esq. 200*l.*; to Mrs. Harrison, 1,000*l.*; to Wheatley and Lyford 30*l.* per annum during their lives; my law books to William Hilliard and 100*l.*; my books on divinity to Joseph Hilliard and 100*l.*; to the Society for bettering the Condition of the Poor, 100*l.*—F. Harley."

Paper E.—"Directions for Miss Penny. A piece of land to be purchased in a convenient spot near a market town in Brecon or Herefordshire, and almshouses erected on the same plan as those at the Hay, with a garden to each and 20*l.* per annum to each, allowance to each woman; a marble tablet to be put up in Brampton Church to the memory of my dear father, mother, brother, sister, and self, plain but handsome; 1,000*l.* to the Missionary Society; ditto to the Bible Society, and 5,000*l.* to the building of different churches, where the seats will be free for the lower class of people; 500*l.* to the ; 300*l.* to the Humane; 300*l.* per annum for yourself to keep a carriage during your life, at your decease to be distributed in charities as you think proper."

The bill then charged that the defendant ought to set forth whether she had ever been informed by the testatrix of the contents of the said several papers, or had any communications with the testatrix on the subject of the said charitable bequests contained therein. The bill prayed the usual decree in an administration suit, and a declaration that the plaintiffs, as representing the next-of-kin, were entitled to the clear residue of the testatrix's leasehold and other personal estate, and that the defendant was a trustee thereof on behalf of the plaintiffs, and for an injunction and a receiver.

The defendant, by her answer, stated that she was on intimate terms of friendship with the testatrix for upwards of forty years before the date of her will, and she denied that the testatrix communicated to her her views and wishes in respect to such charitable disposition of her property as alleged in the bill; or that the testatrix ever communicated to her, or that she knew of the dispositions of the testatrix's property until after her death, or that it was ever arranged or promised by or between them that the will should be so prepared that the charitable intentions of the testatrix should not appear, or that she should afterwards explain to the defendant her views and wishes in respect thereof, or that the bequest of the residue was made upon the faith of any such agreement. The answer further stated that the will and two codicils of the testatrix were found in her desk inclosed in an envelope, and that the papers B, C, D, and E, were found lying loose in the same desk, and were in the handwriting of the testatrix and without date; that the defendant brought the said four writings into the registry of the Prerogative Court, and that she was advised that she ought not and that she did not propound the same for probate; she submitted that the same could not be regarded for the purposes of the suit, and she insisted that she was entitled to the whole residue beneficially; or if the said paper writings should be held to be valid declarations of trust, then she claimed what should remain of the residue after the performance of such trusts, and she denied that the said paper-writings or the contents of the same were ever communicated to her by the testatrix.

Mr. Turner replied.

Aug. 6, 1849.—Knight Bruce, V.C.
 —The plaintiffs in this cause sue as the executors of the Earl of Oxford, lately deceased, who for a short time survived his sister, Miss Frances Harley, of whom the defendant is the executrix; the object of the bill being to establish the claim of Lord Oxford as Miss Harley's sole next-of-kin at her death, which he is admitted on each side to have been. The residuary personal estate, however, is by her will given in terms to the defendant, who contends that it is so given to her beneficially without qualification or with such qualification only as is effected (if any is effected) by four papers written by Miss Harley, which are mentioned in the pleadings, and marked respectively B, C, D, and E, under no one of which, as the defendant contends, Lord Oxford took or could have claimed any benefit. The plaintiffs insist, that Miss Harley gave the residue of her personal estate to the defendant, not beneficially, but for certain purposes, either wholly undisclosed and wholly unknown, or apparent only on one or more or all of the four papers just mentioned; and that the purpose, if any, thus apparent, being, to a considerable extent such as the statute of Geo. 2, called the Mortmain Act, has prohibited from being so effected, must, to that extent at least, be held to have failed for Lord Oxford's benefit; and the plaintiffs lay claim to the whole of the residuary personal estate, or, failing that, to a great portion of it, accordingly. They therefore do not admit that any one of the four papers, marked B, C, D and E, is, for any purpose or to any intent, valid, effectual, or to be regarded. The defendant, on her part, distinctly maintains that, as against her, the four papers are, for every purpose, void; and that the case ought, as against her, to be treated as if none of them had ever existed. I may here observe, that on neither side has any objection been made on the ground that the four papers are, as I believe them to be, unstamped; nor has the defendant, by her answer or at the bar, objected that the suit is defective in parties. Of the four papers, neither has been admitted to probate, and neither can, for any purpose of this cause, be treated or considered as testamentary. If either of them is valid at all, it can only be deemed valid in some other character than as a testamentary instrument; therefore, as far as the present suit is concerned, the two codicils were admitted to probate with Miss Harley's will; but of these two codicils it has not been contended, and it does not seem, that either is material for any present purpose.

The first question is on the construction of the will, and arises as well on the manner in which particular legacies are given to Miss Penny, the defendant, as on the language in which the residue is bequeathed. Among various legacies to various persons there is this bequest to the defendant:—"To Sarah Penny, of Great James Street, Bedford Row, 3,000*l.*, and a like sum of 3,000*l.* in addition for the trouble she will have in acting as my executrix." The residue is given thus.—[His Honour here read the residuary bequest.]—The will is dated the 13th of May 1835, one of the codicils the 19th of March 1836, the other is neither dated, attested, nor signed. The testatrix died in 1848. Now, though the language of the particular bequest to the defendant is not conclusive as to the construction of the gift of the residue, yet a person reading the will for the first time and pausing immediately after that particular bequest would, of necessity, I think, expect to find in the succeeding part of the instrument either no express disposition of the residuary personal estate or a disposition of it otherwise than for the benefit, absolutely and without qualification, of the executrix. The effect of the terms of that particular bequest must, I say, as it appears to me, be thus to affect the mind of the reader. Anything much less likely to be said by a testatrix, particularly one in Miss Harley's circumstances, if she designed the residue for the absolute benefit of her executrix, can hardly, perhaps, be reasonably imagined, especially when it is observed that the particular bequest consists of two legacies, to one of which the declared motive or object appears confined. Under the law, as it stood before the 1 Will. 4. c. 40, those or equivalent words used in a case of two executors having unequal legacies, or of whom one only had a legacy, would have excluded them from all title to the residue beneficially in the character of executors. On the whole, I cannot agree that on the question of the interpretation of the residuary gift in this will the language of the particular gifts is to be forgotten or disregarded, especially when, to borrow a remark made by Lord Eldon in Langham v. Sanford (1), it is remembered that every part of the will became, at one and the same time, the will of the testatrix, namely, by the act of subscription, not one part before another; the will says together and at the same moment everything that it does say. The words, "her executors, administrators and assigns," and the words "make a good use" are probably rather favourable than unfavourable to the defendant's argument, but are also not conclusive; nor is the remark, if indeed well founded, that the words "in a manner in accordance" are, in point of grammar and syntax, connected as directly and as much with the words "good use" as with the word "dispose." This observation was, I think, suggested by myself; but I am not sure that it is correct, and I attribute no weight to it against the defendant. The words "make a good use," however, cannot be read as if they were disjointed and separated; they are part of the same sentence or paragraph that contains the word "dispose;" and the expression "views and wishes," which forms an important part of the context, seems to affect materially and restrict the phrase "good use." Then, as to the words "well knowing," these cannot be understood literally. The testatrix did not nor could know that which she professes to know. She used the expression in a sense in which it is often used, as indicating belief and confidence with respect to the future: and how do belief and confidence differ from faith and trust? The phrase, "well knowing," and the expression "being well assured," that of "not doubting," that of "desiring," and that of "hope," have in various cases—some, if not all of which, and many others relative to the present dispute, are collected by Mr. Lewin in his valuable book—been held sufficient to denote an intention to create a trust, in the sense in which the Court of Chancery uses that word. Then, what is the force, what the meaning of the words "my views and wishes," as used in the will? If the testatrix had made her will and had died before the statute of 1 Will. 4.

c. 40, had not given any legacy to Miss Penny, and had not expressly disposed of the residuary personal estate, but had said in the will, "I have certain views and wishes concerning the residue of my personal estate, and in accordance with these views and wishes I know that my executrix will dispose of it," would the executrix, in the absence at least of any knowledge by her, and of any evidence of what the testatrix meant by those words "views and wishes," have been a trustee of the residue for the next-of-kin? An affirmative answer to this question could not properly be given by a person taking the defendant's view of the construction of the will before the Court; but the words "in addition, for the trouble she will have in acting as my executrix," being, in my opinion, as I have said, material and weighty in this case, a negative answer to it would not be necessarily inconsistent with that of the plaintiffs. Whether the statute 1 Will. 4. c. 40. has a bearing on the present cause may be a disputable point. Certainly, however, it cannot affect the cause favourably to the defendant. Part of the argument for her has been tantamount, perhaps, to a contention that the words "my views and wishes" are to be read as if they were Miss Penny's views and wishes. It was, in terms, argued that the language accompanying the residuary gift was only the statement of a reason for making a bequest to a legatee beneficially, as if the testatrix had merely said, "I give her the residue of my property because I know how worthy she is of it," or "because, from her past conduct, I know how well and wisely she will employ it;" and it is true that the words may be, in a sense, said to denote the cause or motive of the gift, but the cause or motive of the gift for what purpose? If not the cause or motive of a gift to the legatee beneficially, the argument fails. The words appear to me, in denoting the cause or motive, to denote also the object and end, and that object and that end, not the benefit, or not necessarily the benefit, of the legatee. It was contended also for the defendant, that the expression "views and wishes" ought to be construed as referring to the testatrix's general habits and character, or to the general course, manner, and tenour of her own life. It is, however, as it appears to me, more specific and particular in its nature and application. She has used, I think, the word "views," as meaning design, plan or intention, or, plurally, designs, plans, or intentions; and the word "wishes," which cannot, surely, be interpreted to mean "example," must be taken, I conceive, to have a meaning little, if at all, different from "desire" and to be not less strong, certainly, in the plaintiffs' favour, than the word "views." "To wish" is explained by Mr. Charles Richardson as meaning "to look after eagerly, desirously; to desire." Dr. Johnson gives to the substantive three interpretations, which are, "longing desire, thing desired, desire expressed."

The testatrix, by the will, appears to me to have said, in substance to Miss Penny, "I give you the residue, believing and trusting that you will dispose of it in accordance with my design, intention and desire"; and this in a will, in a prior part of which the testatrix had treated the appointment to the executorship as a burden and charge, by the words "in addition, for the trouble she will have in acting as my executrix." According, however, to the proper construction of the words "my views and wishes," understood as I have said, and considered in connexion with the context, do they also mean views and wishes, that were designed to be, or that had been, communicated by the testatrix to Miss Penny, either in writing or verbally, but otherwise than by the will? I am of opinion that they do, understanding the expression "communicated by the testatrix to Miss Penny" as extending, though not necessarily confined, to any paper on the subject that might be left for the purpose by the testatrix at her death. Miss Penny could not, of course, execute a plan of which she was left in ignorance, and except from the testatrix's information the scheme of the testatrix could not be known. If I am right in thus reading the will, does it or does it not exhibit an intention, that, merely by virtue of the will, without more, Miss Penny should not take the residue beneficially? I think that it does exhibit such an intention. I think, in effect, that by it the residue is given to that lady, not necessarily for her benefit wholly or in part, but is given to her for a purpose possibly not for her benefit wholly or in part—that is to say, for a purpose of which the instrument does not contain an explanation and disclosure, but refers for the explanation and disclosure to some other source of information, past, present, or future. Supposing, then, that source of information to fail—supposing the explanation and disclosure to be not obtained, and to be unattainable, the executrix, being also the residuary legatee, must be treated, in my judgment, as holding the residue in trust for the next-of-kin—a conclusion which appears to me not opposed to Gibbs v. Rumsey, Lechmere v. Lavie, Wood v. Cox, or any of the authorities cited at the bar during the argument; but is probably, if I rightly interpret the will, necessary in order to avoid a departure, at least, from some of them. I may observe that, in Wood v. Cox the will contained the words “for his and their own use and benefit for ever,” and though it contained the word “wishes,” the codicil or additional testamentary paper had the word “wish”; and the Lord Chancellor appears to have thought that the latter was to be considered as declaring and explaining the words mentioned in the will; and that the gift to Sir George Cox was not a gift in trust, but a gift subject to a charge. In the case of Mordaunt v. Hussey (2), which occurred long before the stat. 1 Will. 4. c. 40, the then Lord Chancellor thus expressed himself:—“Upon the whole disposition the testatrix has made, she has reserved an ulterior disposition of the residue; that ulterior disposition being either not made, or not known to be made; of course the executors can claim nothing.” The cases of Morice v. the Bishop of Durham (3), Lord Cranley v. Hale (4), Mence v. Mence (5), Giraud v. Hanbury (6) and Ellis v. Selby are decisions, or contain at least observations, by Lord Eldon, by Sir William Grant, and by the present Lord Chancellor, which have, I think, a bearing, and as to some of them a strong bearing, on this case. There are also the cases of Ommanney v. Butcher and Vezev v. Jamson; nor is perhaps Braddon v. Farrand (7) inapplicable. And in the judgment delivered by Sir James Wigram in the case of The Corporation of Gloucester v. Wood I find these two passages:—“Upon the cases I have referred to,” he says, “the plaintiffs founded the general proposition, that, if a will contains an absolute gift to an individual, that individual must take for his own benefit, unless by other parts of the will that absolute gift is with certainty reduced to a trust. Now, after repeated consideration of this case, it appears to me, as it did during the argument, that the cases referred to have no application to a case like that before me. Those cases suppose the whole intention of the testator, so far as he has committed it to writing, to be before the Court. In such cases it may be right (in the first class referred to) to hold, that a gift in one part of a will to an individual, in terms which, if uncontrouled by the context, would give him an absolute interest, shall not be reduced to a trust by equivocal expressions in another part of the will. And (in cases of the second class) it may be a sound rule of law that a gift which, if uncontrouled by the context, would give an absolute interest, shall not be reduced to a trust by a mere recommendation to the legatee to give an unascertained part of the legacy to an individual, or any part of the legacy to an unascertained object. But I confess my inability to apply the reasoning upon which those cases are founded to a case like the present, in which the difficulty arises from this: that the Court has not the expressions of the testator before it for its guidance. I cannot accede to the proposition which was urged upon me, that—because in both classes of cases referred to, uncertainty (in a sense) is the foundation of the judgment of the Court in favour of the legatee, excluding trust,—it is immaterial what the cause of uncertainty in any other case may be. The testator tells me, in the third codicil, that his ascertained intentions are declared in another place: those ascertained intentions are not before me; and the plaintiffs’ argument requires me to believe that, if those intentions were brought before me, the case would necessarily fall within one or other of the cases I have mentioned. Taking this, then, as the case of a legacy to an individual, I am satisfied I should be making and not expounding a will, if I were to give the plaintiffs the decree they ask, so far as the 60,000*l.* is concerned." Then, further on, he says, "But no rule of law can be better settled than this,—that, unless the legatee intended to be benefited by a particular bequest can be ascertained, the mere intention that the residuary legatees of a testator should not take will be inoperative. The whole doctrine of lapsed legacies assumes that the interests of residuary legatees are abridged only in favour of particular legatees, and if the particular legacies fail, the residuary legatees take the whole." The Vice Chancellor was dealing with a question upon a particular legacy given, in effect, as it was successfully contended, to an unascertained legatee. But with reference to a claim of residue by a testator's next-of-kin (at least since the statute 1 Will. 4. c. 40), it may be equally asserted that such a claim does not need the existence of intention in his favour—does not require the absence of expressed intention against him, but sustains itself where there is an inability to shew, by any means which our law allows, the existence in another's favour of a settled intention, legitimate in its nature, expressed intelligibly, and capable of execution. Lastly, on the appeal from the decision just mentioned, my Lord Lyndhurst is reported (8) as saying: "But the former codicil is not produced, no account is given of it, and we have, therefore, no means of ascertaining the purpose for which the gift was made, or to what it is to be applied. In the same sentence in which the legacy is given, and immediately after the words of gift, the gift is stated to be for a purpose which the testator had defined, but which is wholly unknown, and cannot be discovered. How, then, could the legatee be allowed to take the legacy for his own use? The purpose is a qualification of the legacy; it is an essential part of it, and till this is ascertained, it is wholly uncertain what the legatee is to take, whether for his own benefit, or for the benefit of others, and for whom; whether for private purposes or for public or charitable objects. It is, therefore, I think, clear that if the legacy had been to an individual, it must have altogether failed. What the testator intended, whom he meant to benefit, does not appear, and cannot be ascertained."

I proceed to the question, whether this testatrix has in an effectual or available manner explained or disclosed, wholly or to any extent, her views and wishes; that is to say, as I read her will, the purpose for which it gave the residue of her personal estate to Miss Penny. The only evidence in the cause, exclusively of the probate, and the four papers marked B, C, D, and E, consists of the answer, which affords probably accurate information, and beyond which it is probable that there cannot be obtained, and does not exist, any useful information either on the subject of the intent or object of the residuary bequest, or with reference to either of the papers marked B, C, D, and E. The only parts of the answer to which it can be material to refer, for any present purpose, seem to be the following passages.—[His Honour here read at length all the passages of the answers, the substance of which is before set out.]—It is not, therefore, admitted or proved, nor do I think it likely to be proveable, that the testatrix made or gave, communicated or left, any explanation or disclosure, wholly or partially, of her views and wishes mentioned in the will, save so far, if at all, as the papers marked B, C, D, and E, contain any such explanation or disclosure, or that either of those four papers was written before the making of the will, or before the year 1838. I mention the year 1838 with reference to the act passed in 1837 for the amendment of the law with respect to wills. But is either of the four papers effectual or available for any purpose? Assuming, as the Ecclesiastical Court is said to have held, and, as at present I consider at least highly probable, that each of them was written in or after the year 1838, I do not, considering the statute of 1837, think that either of them can be treated as of any avail, or effectually for any purpose. Whether if the statute of 1837 had not passed, either of them might properly have been admitted to probate, is a question which, on the facts, so far as they appear, and on cases decided at Doctors' Commons, and on appeal from Doctors' Commons, so far as I am acquainted with them, may, perhaps, be thought disputable. But, however this may be, the statute of 1837 seems to me to exclude them. Before that statute—(I need not particularly refer to cases such as Addington v. Cann (9), Habergham v. Vincent, Muckleston v. Brown, and Stickland v. Aldridge.)—a man could not, by his will, enable himself to devise freehold estate by an unattested codicil.

But the rule may, I conceive, be more largely stated. I apprehend that a testator, by a will, whether made before 1838 or after the commencement of that year, could not enable himself to make a disposition of any of his property by any means which, if the will had not been made, he could not effectually have used. Nor do I recollect any exception or qualification beyond the well-known one, as to affecting real estate, by means of a will, with debts incurred and legacies given, after it, which is now restricted, so far as the statute requires particular formalities for the effectual gift of a legacy. The power of a testator to incorporate in his will another existing paper, which the will by specific reference and description identifies, and the prevention of fraud, by compelling a legatee to perform, after the testator's death, a promise made by him to the testator, upon the faith of which the testator, to the knowledge of the legatee, gave the legacy, are scarcely exceptions or qualifications. The four papers under consideration being assumed not to have existed before 1838, being not testamentary, and being unattested, can, as I conceive, have only such effect (if any) on Miss Harley's property as they could have had if she had died intestate. But would either of them, in that case, have been of any force or efficacy as an agreement, or gift, or a declaration of trust, or in any other manner? I am not aware of a ground or principle on which that question can be answered, otherwise than in the negative. It follows that, subject to the consideration that I am about to mention, I must hold the plaintiffs entitled to an administration decree. It may be as unnecessary, formally, as it is substantially, to direct an inquiry whom the testatrix left her next-of-kin; though of this I am not quite sure. But can it, in point of form at least, or indeed in point of substance, be, even on this record, right to make an administration decree, without ascertaining, by means of a report, whether the testatrix explained or disclosed the views and wishes mentioned in her will, and in what manner, if at all? Is it, even on this record, certainly right to assume the total invalidity of these papers? If not, will it be correct to declare the decree to be without prejudice to the rights (if any) of persons not parties, though no such persons could probably, even without a declaration of that kind, be precluded by the decree: (and the case is not, perhaps, within the 40th Order of the 26th of August 1841,) or what course should, with regard to the four papers, be taken? These are points on which I shall be glad to receive any suggestions from the Bar. In the absence of any such suggestions, the decree that I am disposed to make is to this effect:—"Declare that the testatrix bequeathed the residue of her personal estate to the defendant, as a trustee, for some purpose or purposes which the will and codicil of the testatrix do not disclose, and the nature of which does not at present appear. Refer it to the Master to inquire and state whether the views and wishes concerning the disposition of the residue, which are mentioned in her will, were ever and when declared or made known by her, in or by any instruments, papers, or writings, or any instrument, paper, or writing; and if the Master shall so find, he is to state what the same was or were, and the particulars and circumstances thereof; but if the Master shall not so find, then there must be the common administration decree, with liberty to state any circumstance specially."

The defendant appealed from this decree. The Solicitor General, Mr. Malins, and Mr. Walford, for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Russell, and Mr. Hislop Clarke, for the appellant.

Nov. 7, 1851.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.
—This is an appeal from the decree made by Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, on the hearing of the cause, declaring that Frances Harley, the testatrix in the pleadings mentioned, bequeathed the residue of her personal estate to the defendant, as a trustee, for some purpose or purposes which her will and codicils did not disclose, and directing an inquiry whether the views and wishes of the testatrix concerning the disposition of such residue were declared by her in any instrument, paper or writing; and if the Master should find that they were not so declared, the decree directed the usual accounts to be taken and the estate to be administered in the usual manner. The question arises upon the terms of the residuary bequest of the testatrix. The question involved in this case has very frequently occurred, and is the subject of very numerous decisions; and considering the infinitely various forms of expression and the minute differences in them to which those principles had to be applied, it is not surprising that it should be difficult to reconcile them all one with the other. But I think the principles themselves are now sufficiently certain, and that the duty which remains consists in the application of them to the peculiarities of each case as it arises. I therefore think that it would be an unnecessary occupation of time to go through the very long series of cases in which they have been recognized. The greater part of them occurred in the case of The Corporation of Gloucester v. Osborn, in which I was of counsel, and which was argued, a few months before I left the bar, in the House of Lords; those numerous decisions there came under review, and they will be found collected in that case as reported in 1 House of Lords Cases, 272. I shall therefore content myself with stating the principles which I deduce from the present state of authority, and how I apply them to the words of the will in question, so as to lead me to the judgment which I have formed, referring to the judgment given in this case in the court below, in which I generally concur.

I conceive the rule of construction to be that words accompanying a gift or bequest expressive of confidence or belief or desire or hope that a particular application will be made of such bequest, will be deemed to import a trust upon these conditions—first, that they are so used as to exclude all option or discretion in the party who is to act, as to his acting according to them or not; secondly, the subject must be certain; and thirdly, the objects expressed must not be too vague or indefinite to be enforced. With respect to the first of these conditions, I am of opinion that there is no doubt that the words “well knowing” used in the present case are equivalent to, if not synonymous with, the expression “in the fullest confidence,” and that they are, in my judgment, used in such a manner as to exclude all option or discretion. Similar words have occurred in some of the cases, but they have been accompanied with other words which have had a material effect in construing them; such as the words following the gift “for his and her own use and benefit,” and other expressions of a similar nature. With regard to the second condition no question exists. With reference to the third condition, it has been contended that the object is not certain; and it has been argued, and with truth, that vagueness in the object is regarded as evidence that no trust was intended to be created; and it has been in effect argued, and indeed with great plausibility, that the words which are superadded to the bequest are merely expressive of the testatrix’s full conviction from her reliance on the character of Miss Penny, that she would make as good use of what was given her, as of her own property, and would, in fact, dispose of it in such a way as would further those objects which, as the intimate friend of the testatrix, she well knew that the testatrix was desirous of promoting. Specious, however, as this construction undoubtedly is, I am of opinion that it is not the true construction of these words. It is assuming the whole question to say that “views and wishes” are too vague to import a trust. The fact that the testatrix “well knew” or believed that Miss Penny would dispose of the property in a manner in accordance with the testatrix’s views and wishes, of necessity implies that the testatrix assumed that such views and wishes were already, or would thereafter, either in writing or verbally, be made known. There is, therefore, nothing on the face of the words which necessarily implies what is vague or indefinite, as in those cases where the Court has held that the uncertainty of the object has afforded evidence that no trust was intended.

But suppose that it cannot be found that the testatrix did, in fact, ever make known her views and wishes, or has made them known in a manner of which the Court cannot take judicial notice; even then it is impossible to say that she never did express them in writing. She may have done so, and the writing may have been lost or destroyed, or be incapable of receiving judicial notice. But it is not necessary even to argue this. It is sufficient that the will distinctly indicates that Miss Harley intended to make them known, or had previously made them known, as otherwise the legatee could not do that which the testatrix "well knew" the legatee would do, namely, act in accordance with them. There is no real and substantial distinction between such a case and the case of a testator who gives all his property to A. on trust, but never declares that trust. In the latter case, the objects are unknown, but there is the fact that a trust nominatim exists or was intended. Here is the fact that views and wishes exist, and the bequest is made in confidence that they will be accomplished, but the objects of the views and wishes are unknown. It is true that, possibly, the objects included in such views and wishes might, if known, be too vague and indefinite to be enforced, but so might the objects of the trust nominatim if they were known. It is most important to observe that vagueness in the object will unquestionably furnish reasons for holding that no trust was intended; yet this may be countervailed by other considerations which shew that a trust was intended, while at the same time such trust is not sufficiently certain and definite to be valid and effectual. And it is not necessary to exclude the legatee from a beneficial interest that there should be a valid or effectual trust; it is only necessary that it should clearly appear that a trust was intended. Now, this is precisely the case with the present bequest. I agree with the Vice Chancellor in interpreting "views and wishes" to mean "designs and desires"; and the very expression of confidence that Miss Penny would make a good use and dispose of the property in a manner in accordance with the testatrix's designs and desires or intentions, appears to me to amount to a declaration that Miss Penny was to hold the property for that purpose, or in other words to the same effect, upon trust. It seems to me to be tantamount to a bequest upon trust, and if so, that is sufficient to exclude Miss Penny from taking the beneficial interest. On establishing that a trust was intended, the legatee is excluded from taking beneficially. If a testator gives upon trust, though he never adds a syllable to denote the objects of that trust, or though he declares the trust in such a way as not to exhaust the property, or though he declares it imperfectly, or though the trusts are illegal, still, in all these cases, as is well known, the legatee is excluded and the next-of-kin take. But there is no peculiar effect in the word "trust." Other expressions may be equally indicative of a fiduciary intent, though not particularly apt or clear. But in this case we are not left to spell out a trust from the residuary clause alone. There are collateral circumstances in the will which tend to authorize that construction. The fact that besides a legacy of 3,000*l.* another legacy, in addition, is expressly given to Miss Penny "for the trouble she will have in acting as executrix," clearly shews that she was not intended to take the residue beneficially; because, if Miss Penny was to take the whole residue beneficially, as the testatrix must be presumed to have acted upon the belief, which the fact warranted, that her estate was abundantly sufficient to satisfy all the bequests, there could be no object in taking out of that residue, of which she was to have the whole, 3,000*l.* for her trouble. The legatee gained nothing by the legacy. The fact of the legacy not only strongly confirms, but is only consistent with the hypothesis, that the whole residue was not to be taken beneficially. Further, this cannot be referable to the trouble she would have in the execution of the bequests in the will itself or the proved codicils, for though the bequests are numerous, not one of them involves any amount of trouble, whereas the views and wishes of the testatrix to which she alluded might be such that the carrying them into effect might involve the executrix in very difficult trusts.

I am clearly, therefore, of opinion upon these grounds, that a trust was intended; and consequently the question whether the unproved papers may be looked at in order to prove the intention to create a trust does not arise, or at all events it is unnecessary for me to consider it. I have, therefore, wholly excluded them from my consideration, and my judgment is formed on the words of the will alone.

The judgment of the Court below must be affirmed.

M.R. }
1851. } POPE v. POPE.
Nov. 11. }

Will—Construction—“Issue” restricted to Children.

Under a bequest for all and every the “issue” of E. living at the decease of her and her husband, but if any of the issue of E. should die in the lifetime of the survivor of E. and her husband leaving issue, the issue of such issue so dying should take the share his parent would have been entitled to:—Held, that the word “issue” meant children, and that if the testator had intended to express descendants, the words “issue of issue” would not have had any meaning.

This was a special case, filed under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35.

John Field, by his will, dated the 13th of January 1833, appointed his two sons John Field, since deceased, and the defendant William Field, and Joseph Smith, since deceased, executors and trustees, and he directed his trustees to appropriate 10,000*l.* consols, and to stand possessed thereof and of the dividends thereof, upon trusts for the benefit of his daughter Mary and her issue, similar to those declared for the benefit of his daughter Elizabeth and her issue, which were as follows:—upon trust to pay the income thereof to his daughter Elizabeth during her life, and after her decease to pay the income to the husband of his daughter Elizabeth who might survive her during his life, and after the decease of the survivor of his daughter Elizabeth and her husband, the testator directed the trustees to stand possessed of the trust fund, and the interest, dividends, and produce thereof, “upon trust for all and every the issue of my daughter Elizabeth as shall be living at the time of the decease of the survivor of them my daughter Elizabeth and the husband of my daughter Elizabeth; but my will is, that in the event of any of the issue of my daughter Elizabeth dying in the lifetime of my daughter, and the husband of my daughter, or the survivor of them, leaving issue, the issue of such of the issue of my daughter so dying shall stand in the place of his or their parent as to the share which such parent would have been entitled to if such parent had not departed this life.” This was followed by a bequest over on the decease of his daughter Elizabeth and her husband, and “in the event of the decease of all the issue of my daughter Elizabeth, and of the issue of such issue of my daughter Elizabeth, without taking a vested interest in the stocks or securities,” to the testator’s sons John, William and James, and his daughters, as tenants in common.

The testator died on the 19th of April 1833.

Mary Field intermarried with John Gould, who died in her lifetime, and she died on the 27th of August 1849, leaving Mary Gould her daughter, and only child, her surviving.

Mary Gould, the daughter, intermarried with John Robinson Pope, and there were two children of the marriage, John Gould Pope and Ernest Pope. And the questions now raised were, whether Mary Pope was entitled to the whole fund, subject to the life interest of her mother, or whether she and her children John G. Pope and Ernest Pope were entitled to any and what interest in the fund.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Shapter, for J. R. Pope and his wife.—The question in this case is, whether from the context the word “issue” is not to be read “children.” Under the first clause in the will the children would have taken under the word “issue,” but the second clause restricts it, for in speaking of issue the testator shewed an intention that they should take the parent's share by substitution.

Sibley v. Perry, 7 Ves. 522.

Pruett v. Osborne, 11 Sim. 132.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Bevir, for the infant defendants J. G. Pope and Ernest Pope.—Evans v. Jones (1).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The word "issue" means descendants; if the testator did not mean to specify more, he should have stopped at that word, but when he speaks of issue of issue, it was clear that he did not speak in the larger sense. Here the gift was general to issue, so that the word "issue" was applied to the stirps, in place of the parent; the word "issue," therefore, was restricted to children, the testator meaning that if any child of his daughter should die in his lifetime, the children of that child were to take the share to which that child would have become entitled. I must, therefore, declare that by the word "issue" the testator meant children, and that Mary Pope is entitled to have the fund paid over to her.

Legacy Duty—Annuity.

A testator gave real and personal estate, subject to one "clear" yearly rent-charge or annuity of 100l. a year to S. G.:—Held, that it was to be paid without any deduction for legacy duty, and that the legacy duty was to be paid out of the real estate, as the personal estate of the testator was exhausted.

Kendrick Cofield, by his will, dated the 28th of May 1822, gave his real and personal estate to his wife, Ann Cofield, for life, "but subject, nevertheless, to one clear yearly rent-charge or annuity of 100l. a year, which it is my will shall be paid to Sarah Gregory;" and after the decease of his wife the testator gave his real and personal estate to other persons. Sarah Gregory intermarried with Henry

Bailey, and now filed this claim to obtain payment of the annuity, and insisted that the legacy duty ought to be paid out of the real estate of the testator, as the personal estate was exhausted.

Mr. Buxton, for the plaintiff.—The word "clear" in the gift of the annuity implies an intention to give that sum free from all deductions, and it was not liable to the payment of the legacy duty, which ought to be paid out of the testator's estate.

Gude v. Mumford, 2 You. & C. Exch. 448.

Mr. Forster, on behalf of the parties entitled to the real estate.—The liability to the payment of the legacy duty is not disputed; but the question is, who is to bear the burthen as the personal estate of the testator has been exhausted? The defendants insist that the amount of duty ought to be deducted by them, from time to time, out of the annuity; and that the annuitant, and not the estate of the testator, ought to pay the legacy duty upon the annuity, the same as any other legatee would upon the legacy of a given sum of money. The word "clear" meant only that an annuity of that amount was to be raised out of the estate, but by no means meant that it was to be clear of parliamentary charges, which could only attach upon the annuity, and not upon the estate of the testator.

Marris v. Burton, 11 Sim. 161; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 373.

Mr. Waller, for H. Bailey, the plaintiff's husband.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—In Gude v. Mumford the words "without deduction," "clear of all deductions," &c. were considered sufficient to free a legacy from duty, though, from the nature of the property upon which it was charged, there were other outgoings to which they might apply. In this case, was it intended that the legatee should take the legacy free from the legacy duty, and was that intention to be collected from the will itself? In Sanders v. Kiddell, the testatrix gave such a sum of money to trustees as, when invested in the funds, would produce the "clear" yearly sum of 500*l.*: she then declared the trusts of the fund in favour of relations and other persons, some of whom were not ascertained at her death. The Vice Chancellor was of opinion that the investment ought to be made at once, and as the rate of legacy duty chargeable on the successive interests must depend upon the relationship of the parties to the testatrix, and render it uncertain what sum ought to be invested to meet the charge, he held that the legatees were not entitled to have the bequest free from legacy duty. In this case the annuity itself is to be "clear," and in Marris v. Burton the testator directed his executors to set apart a sum not more than 7,500*l.*, the dividends of which, when invested, would produce the clear yearly sum of 300*l.*, "clear of all deductions whatsoever"; and it was held that the annuity was to be paid clear of legacy duty. I think these cases govern the present, and that the annuity must be paid free from legacy duty.

Will — General Bequest — Restriction — Specific Enumeration of Articles.

A specific enumeration of articles after a bequest to J. E. K. of "all and everything I die possessed of," followed by a declaration that "I leave everything I die possessed of to J. E. K. for her entire and sole use and benefit," held to be a general residuary bequest.

Russell Kendall, while travelling on the Continent, made his will, dated the 2nd of February 1846, as follows:—

"I, Russell Kendall, at present residing in the Albergo d'Italia at Venice, being very ill, but in sound possession of my senses, do will and bequeath to my adored mother Jemima Elizabeth Kendall, of Aldeburg, in the county of Suffolk, all and everything I die possessed of, namely, money at my bankers Messrs. Coutts & Co., as contained in my letter of credit of 2,000*l.* now here, and bills of Messrs. Coutts, my carriage now here, my plate, books, clothes; harness and sundries as existing here and in custody of Messrs. M'Cracken, of Old Jewry, London, for her sole use and benefit. And lest there be any dispute, I declare again that I leave everything I die possessed of to my dearest mother for her entire and sole use and benefit, as stated above. I beg my dearest mother to let M. Noel Poidebard select whatever books he wishes from all my books. I should like Mrs. Reynolds to have 20*l.* at least, and George Lappet a very handsome present in clothes; and I beg my mother to continue the 10*l.* a-year I allow Elizabeth Hinton. I beg my mother will be sole executrix, and guardian of my children during her life, and that she will at her death appoint a successor. To my dearest father I owe every affection, and to my wife I bequeath my fond love and my blessing, also to my dear children."

The testator died on the 9th of February 1847, leaving his wife, who was provided for by the settlement made upon their marriage, and three children him surviving; and at the time of his decease he was possessed of very considerable sums of stock in the public funds, and he was also interested in other sums of stock which were vested in trustees upon the trusts of his marriage settlement.

The funds of which the testator was possessed were paid into court under the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96, and this petition was presented by Peter Kendall, the husband of the testator's mother, who had since died, asking for a declaration that the stock was by the testator's will well and effectually bequeathed to Jemima Elizabeth Kendall.

Two questions were now raised: first, whether the general words in the testator's will were not limited to things ejusdem generis with those enumerated; and secondly, whether the general words did not amount to a general residuary bequest, by which the testator intended to include the whole of his property unrestricted by the enumeration of the specific articles.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Simpson, in support of the petition.—The testator, in the bequest to his mother, intended to include the whole of his property. This was manifest on the face of the will. He contemplated that in the commencement and concluded by the same expression. The intermediate enumeration of various articles was not intended as a restriction to the general gifts.

Taylor v. Taylor, 6 Sim. 246.

Arnold v. Arnold, 2 Myl. & K. 365; s.c. 4 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 123.

Mr. Metcalfe, for Mary Moss, a legatee under the will of the testator's mother. The general words in the will coupled with the words for her "sole use and benefit" expressed a general bequest, intended to comprise the entire residuary estate, and the enumeration of specific articles was not intended to limit the general expression to a mere restricted sense.

Mr. Shebbeare, Mr. Estcourt and Mr. Thring, appeared for other parties.

Mr. Walpole, for the testator's widow.—The general words of the will were not intended as a residuary bequest. They were explained by the enumeration of particular articles, which must confine the general gifts to things of the same sort. Had that not been intended, their introduction was wholly unnecessary, unless they were considered as an indication of the meaning intended to be conveyed by the will.

Cook v. Oakley, 1 P. Wms. 302.

Ommanney v. Butcher, Turn. & Russ. 260.

Wrench v. Jutting, 3 Beav. 521.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—It is important to abide by a general principle, but each case must be governed by its own peculiar circumstances, the particular words used, and the express or clearly implied intention of the testator from which the extent of the bequest may be arrived at. Had the bequest stopped at the words "sole use and benefit," I might have considered that the intention was to confine the gift by the specific enumeration of articles, upon the principle that enumeration would have been unnecessary if the testator had contemplated a gift of his general residue. But that idea seemed to have crossed the mind of the testator, as he adds, "and to avoid all disputes, I again declare I leave all I die possessed of to my dearest mother." Has he then expressed an intention not to confine the bequest by the enumeration of articles? I think he has by his subsequent declaration. So far his meaning is distinct and clear. "I have made a general bequest, and then enumerated particular articles, but to avoid disputes as to my meaning, I again declare that I leave all I die possessed of to my dearest mother." That is rendered rather obscure by the words "for her sole use and benefit," but, as his father was living, I consider that was a gift to his mother, who was to take and enjoy the gift, and that they were used to secure the enjoyment to her, and this is confirmed by the request made to her to continue allowances to various persons. At the time also of making his will, his wife was present in his mind. He bequeathed to her his love and blessing. It is a singular expression to use if he meant her to take any benefit, as she would have taken had there been no residuary bequest. This Court does not go so far as the Roman law, which required that the heir should be present to the mind of the testator before he could be disinherited. Still it may be a circumstance in favour of a party to whom a bequest is made; but in this case the wife was present to the testator's mind, and all question respecting any intention that she should take any thing is set at rest. I, therefore, consider that the words "sole use and benefit" express the purpose of the bequest, and do not refer to the thing given, and I must declare this to be a gift of the general residuary estate.

In re PATTINSON.Lunacy—Trustee Act, 1850.

Whether the Lords Justices acting in lunacy under the royal sign manual have jurisdiction to make an order vesting a trust estate, of which a person of unsound mind, who was heir-at-law of a deceased trustee, was seized,—the words of the Trustee Act, 1850, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, being "the Lord Chancellor intrusted by virtue of the Queen's sign manual"—quære.

This was a petition for a vesting order under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60. the Trustee Act, 1850. The heir-at-law of a last surviving trustee, in whom the estate was vested, was of unsound mind not found so by inquisition.

Mr. J. V. Prior supported the petition.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—Without meaning to say that we have no authority to make this order, there is certainly a point well deserving consideration. The statute which constitutes this Court, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 83, enacts in section 13. that nothing therein contained shall affect any of the powers, duties or authorities of the Lord Chancellor under and by virtue of any appointment under the sign manual of the Crown, as having the custody of the persons and estates of lunatics. It is true we also are now exercising a jurisdiction in lunacy by a warrant under the sign manual, but then the Trustee Act, 1850, like the former act, 1 Will. 4. c. 60, only authorizes the Lord Chancellor, empowered by the Queen's sign manual, to do what is here asked. It seems to us that it would be safer to make the application to the Lord Chancellor, who strictly comes within the words of the statute. I repeat, we do not mean to say that we have not the power, but we think the point one well worthy of consideration. Had the statute contained after the words "Lord Chancellor" the words "or other person or persons authorized as aforesaid," or some such words, the case would have been free from the difficulty we find.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—If that which my learned Brother has suggested be the true construction—and I do not dissent from it,—all that we can do will do the applicant no good. If we make the order, and the property is offered for sale, the vendors will fall into the hands of the conveyancers. It rests with the Crown who shall be the person or persons to exercise these functions in lunacy. The warrant is directed so that the Lord Chancellor and ourselves, or the Lord Chancellor alone, or his Lordship with either of us, can adjudicate on such a matter; but this statute speaks only of the Lord Chancellor. We have called your attention to the point; but if you like to hazard the difficulties liable to be raised by the conveyancers, we may be disposed to make the order.

Mr. J. V. Prior said he would make the application to the Lord Chancellor.

On a subsequent day, the petition was brought before the LORD CHANCELLOR and the order was made,—the Lord Chancellor saying, that without deciding whether the Lords Justices had or not the jurisdiction, it was clear that he had, and therefore it was the safer course that he should make the order. The inclination of his opinion was that the Lords Justices now had the same authorities in lunacy as his Lordship himself possessed.

PARKER, V.C. } In the matter of YATES'S
Dec. 6, 8. } TRUST.

Will—Construction—Vesting—“Die before entitled in possession.”

*A testator gave 25,000*l.* to trustees upon trust to pay the income to his daughter for life, and after her death to pay the capital to the children of his daughter equally, on their attaining their ages of twenty-one years; the interest of their shares until their becoming entitled to the principal to be applied for their maintenance; and in case any of the children should die before being entitled in possession to his, her, or their shares, the shares of those so dying should go to the survivors. The testator's daughter had two children living at his death, who both attained twenty-one, one of whom died in the lifetime of her mother:—Held, that the representatives of the deceased child were entitled to a moiety of the fund.*

William Yates, by his will, dated the 15th of January 1810, bequeathed the sum of 25,000*l.* to trustees, on the usual trusts for investment, and directed them to pay the income to his daughter Elizabeth Peel for her life. The will then proceeded as follows:—“And, from and after the decease of my said daughter, in trust to pay and apply the said principal sum of 25,000*l.* unto and amongst all and every the child and children of my said daughter Elizabeth equally, share and share like, if more than one, and their respective executors, administrators and assigns, and, if but one, then the whole to such one child, his or her executors, administrators and assigns, on the respective attainments of such children to the age of twenty-one years, being sons, or on their respective attainments to that age or day or days of marriage, which might first happen, being daughters; the interest, dividends, and proceeds of their respective portions being from time to time, until their respectively becoming entitled to the principal, to be applied in their respective maintenance and education, and all surplus of the said interest, dividends, and proceeds being from time to time placed out at interest, or vested and applied in like manner as the respective principal sums in respect of which the same surplus should arise. And, in case any of the children of *my said daughter Elizabeth should happen to die before being entitled in possession to his, her, or their share or shares under this my will, I do direct that the share or shares of such of them as may so happen to die shall go and be applied unto and amongst all and every the survivors of them, if more than one, equally share and share alike; and, if but one, then the whole to such one child, at such time and in such manner as their, his, or her original shares or share are and is by this my will directed to be paid and applied. And, in case all the children of my said daughter Elizabeth shall happen to die before being entitled in possession to their respective shares under this my will, then the principal sum of 25,000*l.,” &c. The testator then declared certain trusts of this sum.

The testator died in 1813, and Mrs. Peel died in 1850.

Mrs. Peel had two children who attained twenty-one. One of them, Mrs. Cockburn, attained the age of twenty-one in the lifetime of her mother, and died before her. The other, Mrs. Ethelston, attained twenty-one, and survived her mother.

The trust fund was paid into court under the Trustees Relief Act, and a petition was presented for the purpose of determining the rights of Mrs. Peel's children to it. This petition now came on to be heard.

Mr. Russell and Mr. Milne, for Mrs. Ethelston, contended that, by the words “in case any of the children of my said daughter should die before being entitled in possession,” it was intended that, in case any child should die in the lifetime of the mother, her share should go to the other children. In the case of Henderson v. Kennicott (1), the gift was to the testator's brothers and sisters, with a gift over if any should die before they became entitled. On the authorities there cited, Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce held, that these words meant before they were entitled in interest; but he added, that but for these authorities he should have thought that the word “entitled” ought to be read as “entitled in possession.” The use of the words “in possession,” in his opinion, would then have removed all doubt. They also cited Crowder v. Stone (2).

Mr. Malins and Mr. Collins contended, that the words "entitled in possession," must be taken to mean "entitled in interest," and cited Schenck v. Legh (3), Fry v. Lord Sherborne (4), (which were cases where, in settlements, the words used were "die before the money became payable," and the death in the lifetime of the tenant for life did not divest the interest), Hallifax v. Wilson (5), and Jones v. Jones (6), (which were cases where, in wills, the words used were "die before the money became payable," and the death of the legatee in the lifetime of the tenant for life did not divest the interest). They also referred to—

Mr. Russell replied.

PARKER, V.C. said, that his opinion in this case was that the personal representatives of Mrs. Cockburn were entitled to a moiety of the funds, although she had not survived the tenant for life. He thought that the case was governed by the authorities cited. The general rule was not to divest an interest vested unless there was a clear direction to that effect in the will. There were many cases under wills, and also under settlements for the benefit of children, in which the Court had applied this rule, so as not to make the interests of the children depend on their surviving the tenant for life. In other cases the Court had tried to construe the interests as vested at the particular ages at which the testator intended, and not to make the vesting depend on their surviving. In the case of Powis v. Burdett (7) the circumstances were stronger than in the present. Lord Eldon in that case, referring to the cases which had been cited to him, said, "These cases, if they are to be shaken, must be shaken in the House of Lords." In the same judgment, speaking of a former case decided by him (8), he said "that he had looked to see whether, under the words of that settlement, he could not put it upon the circumstances that there happened to be some children living." And then he said, "But if that circumstance had not occurred, the result of my opinion is, that I should have been called upon by preceding authorities to decide that case upon a larger principle, and I agree it is mischievous to decide these cases upon small circumstances." That was a case of a settlement, but it appeared to him that these principles of construction applied to wills as well as settlements. That was shewn, amongst others, by the cases of Maitland v. Chalie and Casamajor v. Strobe. He considered that this case was governed by Hallifax v. Wilson. That case turned upon the meaning of the word "payable." He thought that the words "entitled in possession" were not more ambiguous than the word "payable." "Payable" might be taken in two senses: one the literal signification, the other short of its full meaning. In Hallifax v. Wilson it was used in this latter sense. The words "entitled in possession" were open to the same observation; that is, they were capable of two meanings: one, the being in the actual possession of the subject; the other, in a subordinate sense short of its full meaning. Here, there was a life estate given to the daughter, and, after her death the fund was to go to her children at twenty-one or marriage. The testator intended to provide for the event of the children marrying or attaining twenty-one. He also directed the interest of their respective portions to be applied for their maintenance, on the assumption that the children would be under age or unmarried at the death of the tenant for life. Then he said, "And in case any of the children of my daughter should die before being entitled in possession to his, her, or their shares" under his will, such share or shares should go over—that is, if any of those children of whom he had been speaking, should die, &c. This part of the will obviously referred to the case of children not having had any interest in the money at all, in case of their dying before they attained twenty-one or married. He thought that the representatives of Mrs. Cockburn were entitled to one moiety of the fund, and that, in deciding thus, he was not going beyond the authorities.

Feb. 11, 13. } TRIBE v. NEWLAND.

Will—Construction—Vesting—Benefit of Survivorship.

*A testator bequeathed the interest of 3,000*l.* at 5*l.* per cent. to his daughter for life, and, after her death, he gave the said sum of 3,000*l.* to trustees in trust for all the children of his daughter, share and share alike, to be paid to sons at their ages of twenty-one and daughters at their ages of twenty-one or days of marriage, with interest in the mean time on their shares for their maintenance and education, and benefit of survivorship, in the event of any of the said children dying without issue. The testator's daughter had five children living at his death, one of whom attained twenty-one and died in her lifetime without issue:—Held, that the representatives of the deceased child were entitled to his share.*

John Newland made his will, dated the 30th of October 1804, which was in part as follows:—"I give and bequeath unto my daughter Mary, the wife of William Tribe, the interest of 3,000*l.* sterling, at 5*l.* per cent. per annum, to be paid unto her for the term of her natural life; and, from and after her decease, I give and bequeath the said sum of 3,000*l.* unto my sons, George Newland and Richard Newland, their executors and administrators, in trust for the use and benefit of all and every the children of her my said daughter, Mary Tribe, share and share alike, to be paid in equal proportions unto such of them as shall be a son at his or their age or ages of twenty-one years, and unto such of them as shall be a daughter or daughters at her or their age or ages of twenty-one years or day or respective days of marriage, which shall first happen, with interest in the mean time upon their respective shares or proportions of the said sum of 3,000*l.* at 5*l.* per cent. for their maintenance and education, and benefit of survivorship, in the event of any of the said children dying without issue; which said sum of 3,000*l.* and the interest thereof as hereinbefore directed I hereby charge my said manor and farm, lands and hereditaments, hereinbefore devised unto my eldest son John Newland, with the payment thereof accordingly."

John Newland died in 1806. At the death of the testator Mrs. Tribe had five children. One of these children, Frances Tribe, attained twenty-one, and died in 1848, in the lifetime of Mrs. Tribe, without ever having been married. Afterwards Mrs. Tribe died.

The question in this suit was, whether one-fifth of the fund belonged to the representatives of Frances Tribe or to the four surviving children.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Grove, for the plaintiffs, contended that the share of the deceased child belonged to the four surviving children.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Freeling, for the representatives of Frances Tribe, contended that the share had absolutely vested in her.

In re Yates's Trust, ante, p. 281.

PARKER, V.C.—It was contended in this case that nothing vested in the children of Mary Tribe until after her death, and, for this construction, the case of Billingsley v. Wills was relied on as an authority. I think that this case has been sometimes misunderstood. The gift there was to the younger son and sons, in case there were any younger sons, and all and every the daughter and daughters of Capel Billingsley, share and share alike; but, in case he should have only daughters, then only unto and amongst the younger daughter or daughters, and to be paid to them all at their respective ages of twenty-one years. Upon a careful examination of the provisions in that will Lord Hardwicke considered that younger sons and daughters meant those only who should be living at the death of Capel Billingsley, and, consequently, that Letitia, one of such daughters, who died in his lifetime, took no share under the bequest. She was excluded, not because she took an interest which did not vest, but because she did not come within the class which the testator intended to benefit. The question in that case was, at what time the class was to be ascertained, not whether individuals of the ascertained class took vested interests. In the present case the question is very different. The gift here is for the use and benefit of all and every the children of Mary Tribe, share and share alike; and therefore the question is not as to the class, but whether a child included in the gift took a vested interest in her share. I think that this question does not admit of a doubt. I consider it very plain that every child of Mary Tribe living at the testator's death or born afterwards took a vested interest in the fund.

The question remains as to the effect of the words "with benefit of survivorship in the event of any of the said children dying without issue." I consider that these words were meant to divest the share of any child dying without issue before the time of payment mentioned previously in the sentence, which fixed the period of payment. The collocation of the sentence seems to point to that construction. It runs thus:—"with interest in the mean time upon their respective shares or proportions of the said sum of 3,000*l.* at 5*l.* per cent. for their maintenance and education, and benefit of survivorship in the event of any of the said children dying without issue." These words form part of the sentence providing when the shares were to be payable and what was to be done in the mean time, that is, until the shares become payable under the preceding clause which I have just mentioned. The difficulty is as to the words "dying without issue" applied to daughters. In my view they ought to be read as applicable to sons, and as surplusage or incorrect, with respect to daughters. They do not refer to survivorship before the death of Mary Tribe; they are found in the clause which referred to an event not to take place until after her death, and which proceeded throughout on the assumption that her life interest had previously ceased. The Court does not, without a clear indication of intention, admit a construction which would make the provisions for children depend on the circumstance of their surviving the parent, more especially when the testator has pointed out the period of the age of twenty-one years as to sons and twenty-one or marriage as to daughters as the time when the shares were to be paid.

For these reasons, I think that the representatives of Frances Tribe are entitled to her share.

done, and the company was ordered to be wound up under the Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Act. The Master made a list of contributories, in which all the parties to the subscription contract were included. It appeared that a suit and an action were in prosecution by and against the official manager, and that the official manager had no assets in hand, and that it was necessary that some funds should be supplied. The Master made a call on all the subscribers to the subscription contract. This was resisted by some of the subscribers on the ground that the managing committee, who were included in the list of contributories, had received large sums which they had not accounted for, and that these sums ought in the first instance to be obtained and applied. In answer to this, evidence was given that the persons forming this committee were not in solvent circumstances:—Held, that, under all these circumstances, the Master had authority to make the call, and that he had properly exercised his discretion in making it.

The above-mentioned company was projected in 1845.

By an indenture, dated the 16th of August 1845, and made between certain persons of the first and second parts, and the subscribers to the undertaking of the third part, it was provided that certain persons should be appointed the managing committee, and that they should have the power of appointing bankers, engineers, surveyors, clerks, and other persons, and of paying them such salaries as they might deem right, and of entering into any contracts for making the necessary surveys and all other measures necessary to the application to parliament for carrying out the project. The deed then contained an agreement, that if the intended application to parliament should not be successful, the parties thereto should bear and pay all the costs and expenses which should have been incurred, whether before or after the execution thereof, with the view to the establishment or promotion of the said undertaking, or incidental or preparatory to the proposed undertaking; all such expenses, costs, and charges to be assessed rateably on the sum or sums respectively subscribed by the parties thereto.

This deed was executed by Mr. Gay.

The project was abandoned, and the company was ordered to be wound up under the Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Act.

The Master charged with the winding-up of the company made out a list of contributories, dividing them into two classes—the first class comprising those who had executed the subscription contract, and the second, other persons who had not executed it.

On the 22nd of July the Master made a call of 1*l.* 13*s.* a share on the persons comprised in the first class.

This call was objected to on the part of some of the persons on whom the call was made, on the ground that the managing committee (who were comprised in the first class) had received large sums of money, for which they had never duly accounted, and which they ought to refund, and that these sums were, in the first place, applicable to the payment of expenses, and that, until that question was disposed of, no call ought to be made on the other contributories. A motion, having for its object the suspending of the call, was heard by K. Bruce, V.C., who discharged the order on the above ground on the 31st of July. In giving his judgment his Honour said, “that he could conceive a case in which there might be an urgent necessity for a call, and which might render it not unfit, for a time, to disregard the contention of those who opposed it.”

The question came again before the Master. It appeared that a surveyor and engineer had brought an action, which the official manager had been directed to defend, and which was still pending; and also that a suit had been instituted by the official manager against a canal company, to recover 10,000*l.* paid by the company, and which was also still pending. It appeared also that the official manager had no funds in hand, and that there was reason to believe that the managing committee, who were sought to be charged in the first instance, were unable to pay the sums which, it was alleged, they were liable to pay.

The Master thereupon, on the 3rd of December, made a call on all persons forming the first class of 1*l.* 13*s.* a share.

This was a motion to discharge the order made by the Master, on the grounds before stated.

PARKER, V.C.—I do not think that I can interfere with what the Master has done. The first question is, whether the Master has power to do what he has done. The facts are these: the Master has divided the contributories into two classes—those who have executed the subscription contract, and those who have not executed it, and has not made any subdivision of those who have executed the subscription contract. If any one is liable, if there is any liability at all, it must belong to that class who have executed the subscription contract. With regard to Hunter's case, before Lord Cranworth, I do not think that that will at all interfere with the view which the Court takes now, because that was the case of a person who belonged to a class of contributories, as to whom it was doubtful to what extent they were liable, if at all. The company there had not gone so far as this, and a person had agreed to take shares which were allotted to him; but, although he was on the list of contributories, it had not been ascertained what amount of liability that class had incurred. Lord Cranworth says, "Surely it is one ingredient in the exercise of that discretion that the Master should find that Mr. Hunter belongs to a class, the whole of which is liable together to a call of some given amount, be it 5*l.* or be it 5,000*l.* Surely the Master has not proper data on which to exercise his discretion, until he has ascertained those facts." It appears to me that the Master has got proper data here, because the class which is represented upon this application is the only class that can possibly be liable, and is the class which has made itself liable distinctly by executing a deed of covenant to contribute towards the payments that have been made. Now, what are the costs that have been talked of here? They are costs which have been incurred for the common benefit; they are costs incurred in prosecuting a suit and defending an action, the object of the suit being to increase the assets, and the object of the action being to defend the assets, and, therefore, they must have been costs which have been incurred for the common benefit of all parties. Therefore it appears to me that this is as much a case in which the Master had power to act as the case of Ex parte Preece, referred to before Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, where he thought the Master was right in making a call for costs in circumstances not very dissimilar from the present. Then, if the Master has power, it is a case within his discretion, and the Court cannot interfere with the discretion of the Master until it is satisfied that the Master has erred in the exercise of it. Now, what the Master has done is not final—what he has done is merely provisionally making an order for payment. The proportions in which the amount paid is to be borne, with regard to those who may be primarily or secondarily liable, is a thing that may be adjusted afterwards in the course of winding up the estate. Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, in his judgment when this case was before him, says, "There may be a case of necessity rendering that temporary injustice unavoidable; the question still remains whether this is such a case," &c. and so on. What he means by temporary injustice is, that provisionally, parties may be called upon to pay money which they may eventually get back from persons liable to indemnify them.

It has been urged before the Court that the Master has on this occasion acted not in accordance with the view taken by the Court in the order of July last. As I understand it, when the Master made the call in July last he made that call to pay not costs only, but debts and costs, and, in coming to that conclusion, he does not appear to have had regard, or not to have had sufficient regard, to the circumstance that there was a question, which I am fully aware will eventually be a most important question, that there is a certain class of these contributories who may be liable to bring forward a large sum in the way of accounting for money which they have already received. A portion of the assets of this company may hereafter be recovered, which will go in relief of the general body of contributories. It appears that the Master either had no regard to that circumstance, or had not sufficient regard to it, and the Court, under these circumstances, considered it right to discharge the former order of the Master. It is a thing particularly in the discretion of the Master what regard should be had to that; because he must not only have regard to the quantum to be recovered from these parties, but as to the time of getting it; because there may be a very clear liability on the part of these persons which may not be capable of being enforced until it is too late to get the money to meet the exigency for which the money is wanted.

It is said that the Master was not justified upon the evidence in going against certain of the members. Suppose there are fourteen, and seven can pay, and seven cannot pay, it is said that the Master must first go against the fourteen, each for his own contribution. After he is satisfied in the course of this proceeding that seven cannot pay, he is to go against the seven that can pay, and so on toties quoties. But it would be a long time before the amount could be obtained for paying these costs by those means. And it appears to me that the circumstances now before the Court differ in many most material points from the circumstances which were before the Court in July last. The Court, of course, is bound by what it did in July last, and I do not consider I am in any degree going against the view taken of this case by the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce when it was before him. The matter has gone back to the Master, the Master has had regard, and has applied his discretion to, the circumstances which the Court thought he had erred in not sufficiently regarding before, and, having had regard to these circumstances, he now makes an order, which is something in the nature of a special report, by which he does not make this call now in respect of debts; he puts the debts on one side, and makes it only in respect of costs. He says that it is a matter of absolute necessity that these costs should be provided for, and it is obvious that this must be so, because, if the company is attacked on one hand, and is to assert claims by means of litigation on the other, this cannot be done unless the official manager be in possession of funds to enable him to do what is necessary. The Master says, it is absolutely necessary that there should be funds put into the hands of the official manager for that purpose, and the Master comes to that conclusion, having had before him, what he had not sufficient regard to before, the probabilities and possibilities of the claims against the managing committee. It appears to me, therefore, as far as I understand the case, that this call must be paid, as a provisional payment to be adjusted afterwards; and that, if it turns out that you can eventually make the managing committee liable, there will be a portion of the assets recovered which may possibly go in relief of the other parties, and in relief of the party who makes this motion. Therefore, quite in accordance with the view taken by the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, I do not think it right to interfere with the discretion which the Master has exercised upon all the new circumstances brought before him. I do not think that I interfere with Hunter's case, or any other case, in coming to the conclusion that the Master has done what he had a power to do, and that he has exercised a sound discretion.

Upon the coming on of the case—

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Malins, and Mr. Swift, for the official manager, moved that an affidavit might be received by the Court, to the effect that the managing committee were not in sufficiently solvent circumstances for the official manager to expect to receive from them the sums of money received by them, and which it was alleged were improperly applied by them.

The Solicitor General, Mr. Daniel, and Mr. Cole, for Mr. Gay, objected that the affidavit could not be received as evidence, and that pursuant to the 99th section of the Winding-up Act, 1848, no evidence could be received which had not been already before the Court below; and further, that the act required the evidence to be either by depositions, or visd voce, unless parties did not object to affidavits. Such a class of evidence was, therefore, not receivable in any branch of the Court, if objected to, as it was objected to here.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said, that in a motion from one branch of the court to another, leave was always given to add to the evidence, and affidavits might be resorted to, if necessary. The rule applicable to ordinary appeals was equally applicable to appeals under the Winding-up Act. The Court always has it in its power to receive evidence which, although not tendered in the Court below, would put it more fully in possession of the merits of the case; and on that ground, as well as on the ground of their having expressed a desire to hear such evidence, they thought the affidavit ought to be received. The affidavit must be received, but counsel would say whether they wished to file any answer to it.

The Solicitor General declined.

The Solicitor General, Mr. Daniel, and Mr. Cole, for the appellants.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Malins, and Mr. Swift, for the official manager.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—This was an order for a call made by the Master, on the 3rd of December 1851, and the object of the call is stated in the order to be to provide a fund for the payment of the costs of the winding-up. There was an appeal to the Vice Chancellor Parker, and he confirmed the order, and the motion before us to get rid of the call is made by one only of the contributories, namely, Mr. Gay.

All the contributories on the list to be affected by this order, including Mr. Gay, had executed the deed which in the argument before us was described as the subscribers' contract, and by that deed it was provided that the parties were to raise a fund by contribution amongst themselves (I think) to the extent of 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share, which was in fact paid. The fund which was thus provided was to be applied in discharge of the expenses which were incurred, and to be incurred, in forming the company, engineers, solicitors, and other matters of that sort. Then there was this proviso: "and the said several persons parties to these presents, for themselves severally and respectively, and for their several and respective heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, do hereby undertake and agree that in the event of the intended application to parliament not being successful, the said parties to these presents shall and will well and truly bear, pay, allow and discharge all the costs and expenses which shall have been incurred, whether previously or after the execution of these presents, in or about or with a view to the establishment or promotion of the said undertaking, whether in or about the making, obtaining or completing of any surveys or estimates for the said railway, branches, and works, or any of them, or on account of any solicitor's charges, counsel's fees, and also the costs of or incidental to the preparing, applying for, soliciting, or procuring any such act as aforesaid, travelling expenses, and all other costs and charges of every description incidental or preparatory to the proposed undertaking: all such expenses, costs and charges to be computed and assessed rateably on the sum or sums respectively subscribed by each of the said several persons parties to these presents." The company never was completely registered, the scheme having proved abortive; but the parties who subscribed the deed made deposits of 1*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per share, by means whereof a sum of 28,000*l.* and upwards came to the hands of the managing committee; and Mr. Gay contends, that if this sum had been duly applied, it would have been more than sufficient to satisfy all those who have demands on the managing committee in respect of the expenditure which they were authorized to make in or towards the formation of the company; and so he contends that he ought not to be called on for any further payment, until the 28,000*l.* has been duly accounted for. His engagement, he says, did not make him responsible to any creditor of the managing committee: all he contracted to do was, as he contends, rateably with the other subscribers to put the committee in funds to enable them to fulfil their engagements; and this, he says, was more than done, by means of the deposits. Whether this is, or is not, the true effect of the deed, it is not necessary for us to decide; for the question here is, not a question with creditors, but a question as to how funds are to be procured for enabling the official manager to proceed in the discharge of his duties in winding up the affairs of this unformed company. Now, though this company never was completely formed, yet in considering who are the parties who ought to contribute to the costs of winding up its concerns, it cannot escape notice that the persons on whom the call was made, namely, those who have executed the deed, are precisely those who will be benefited by the winding up, and will be benefited in the exact proportion in which they are called on to contribute, subject to any equities hereafter to be enforced among themselves. So that for the purpose of this winding up, these contributories may be regarded as if they constituted a regularly formed company: and in such a case, the only reasonable course to be pursued is, that every partner or contributory should contribute rateably, according to the extent of his interest, to the cost of realizing outstanding assets, whether by suit or otherwise, and to the other costs of winding up the affairs: whether all or any part of these costs may eventually be thrown on any particular class or number of the contributories in exoneration of the rest is a question not at present ripe for decision. It is sufficient for us to say, that the Master being satisfied (and, as it would seem, very reasonably satisfied) that this sum must by some means be raised, in order to enable the official manager to do his duty, we think he had full power to make the call on the principle on which he has made it, namely, rateably on all those who have executed the deed. Though, however, he had this power, yet we agree to the argument addressed to us on behalf of Mr. Gay that, in the exercise of his discretion under the 103rd section of the Winding-up Act, the Master ought not to make any call for costs on the general body of the contributories, if it appears by the proceedings before him, that any of the contributories are indebted to the concern in sums which, if paid, would render the call unnecessary, and the parties so indebted are in circumstances making it reasonably probable that such sums could be recovered. Now there is, undoubtedly, a very strong prima facie case for supposing that the managing committee, all of whom are contributories, are responsible for sums, far exceeding the amount now to be raised, for costs; but it was stated on behalf of the official manager, that any attempt to realize these sums would be useless by reason of the insolvency of the parties liable to pay them: on this point we gave leave to the official manager to file a further affidavit. This was accordingly done, and Mr. Gay's counsel not desiring time to answer it, we have considered its effect, and have come to the conclusion that it would be very unsafe to rely on any funds to be derived from the managing committee as a substitute for this call. The circumstances of the parties to be charged seemed to be so nearly desperate, that we think it was a reasonable and proper course for the Master to make the call in question, and Mr. Gay's motion must, therefore, be refused.

It is proper to add, that our decision does not conflict with Hunter's case. Here all the parties made liable to the call are interested in the affairs which are to be wound up, and in respect of which the costs are incurred, in exact proportion to the amount of the call; whereas in Hunter's case it was impossible to say whether he had any interest in the matters in respect of which the call for costs was made, or what was the relative liability of himself and the other contributories.

Neither does our present decision conflict with that of my learned Brother in July last, Ex parte Gay, when he, as Vice Chancellor, discharged an order for a call made by the Master for the purpose inter alia of raising money for the payment of creditors. The liability of the contributories toward creditors depends on principles very different from those which apply to the present case, where the sole object of the call is to obtain the funds necessary for winding up the concern. As we have proceeded in part on evidence not before the Master or the Vice Chancellor, we shall not make Mr. Gay pay costs; this motion will simply be refused, and the official manager will have his costs out of the estate.

Mr. Bethell.—There was leave to file the affidavit. There was no regular motion.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—As some very little costs may have been incurred, he may have 40s. out of the estate.

March 10. } EDMONDS v. GOATER.

Promissory Note—Statute of Limitations, 9 Geo. 4. c. 14. s. 1.—Debt—Subsequent Acknowledgment.

Upon an application for payment of 450l. due upon two bills of exchange dated the 25th of March 1836, upon which interest had been paid up to the 25th of March, 1841, a letter was written by the creditor on the 13th of January 1846, stating, "I hope to be in H. very soon, when I trust everything will be arranged with Mrs. W. agreeable to her wishes :"—Held, a promise to pay, which would take the debt out of the Statute of Limitations, and exceptions to the Master's report allowing the debt were overruled.

This was a creditors' suit, instituted by William Edmonds against Henry Goater, since deceased, the executor of Charles Lipscomb, deceased, to administer his estate.

A decree was made in the cause, dated the 1st of April 1847, by which the Master was directed to take an account of what was due to the plaintiff and the other creditors of Charles Lipscomb, and he was to compute interest on the several debts at the rate the same respectively carried.

Under the advertisements issued by the Master for creditors to come in and prove their debts, Grace Wells, of Braindean, in the county of Southampton, spinster, came in and claimed to prove a debt upon the two following promissory notes :—

"London, March 25, 1836.

"£150. — Three years after date I promise to pay to Mrs. Grace Wells or bearer one hundred and fifty pounds, with interest at 5l. per cent., for value received by me, Charles Lipscomb."

"London, March 25, 1836.

"£300. — Four years after date I promise to pay to Mrs. Grace Wells or bearer three hundred pounds, with interest at 5l. per cent., for value received by me,

"Charles Lipscomb."

Interest was duly paid upon these notes up to the 25th of March 1841, in respect of which a balance of 2l. 10s. was then left due; and it did not appear that any subsequent payment of interest was made.

In January 1846 John Dunn, by the direction of Grace Wells, wrote to Charles Lipscomb, requiring payment or further security for the principal sum of 450l. and interest, due to Grace Wells upon the two several promissory notes; in answer to which he received the following letter :—

"Shenley, January 13, 1846.

"Dear Sir,—I hope to be in Hampshire very soon, when I trust everything will be arranged with Mrs. Wells agreeable to her wishes. I shall most likely want to consult you respecting my little property there, as I have an idea of parting with it, as I understand it has been very much neglected; being such a distance from me it is impossible to attend to it as I could wish. If anything happens to me, you may tell Mrs. Wells she is in good hands and will be protected.—I am, &c.

"Charles Lipscomb."

Upon these facts, the Master, by his report, dated the 6th of June 1851, certified that Grace Wells was a creditor for the sum of 450l. That there was a balance of 2l. 10s. for interest due the 25th of March 1841, from which time he had computed interest, which, to the 6th of June 1851, amounted to the sum of 229l. 10s., which, with 1l. 15s., the costs of establishing the debt, amounted to the sum of 683l. 15s.

To this report exceptions were taken by Elizabeth Goater, the administratrix of Henry Goater, deceased.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Welford, in support of the exceptions.—This was a claim which originated in the Master's office, where the practice is that the party claiming shall support that claim by his affidavit; but if the debt is contested no attention is to be given to the affidavit—Fladong v. Winter (1). If, therefore, the debt was barred by the Statute of Limitations, the creditor to take it out of the statute must, under the 9 Geo. 4. c. 14, shew an unqualified acknowledgment of the debt or a subsequent promise to pay. Now, the affidavit of Mr. Dunn was wholly ineffectual for that purpose, and the letter of the testator contained neither an acknowledgment nor promise to pay. This principle was clearly established in the case of Tasser v. Smart (2). A strict construction has been put upon promises of this kind, for where a letter was written saying, "I have been in daily expectation of being enabled to give a satisfactory reply respecting the demand. I propose being in Oxford to-morrow, when I will call upon you on the matter," it was held not to be an acknowledgment implying a promise to pay, but one reserving it for future consideration—Morrell v. Frith (3). So again, "I will not fail to meet Mr. Hart on fair terms, and have now a hope that before perhaps a week from this date I shall have it in my power to pay him, at all events, a portion of the debt, when we shall settle about the liquidation of the balance"—Hart v. Prendergast (4); this was held to be a mere expression of hope, and not any express promise or acknowledgment implying a promise to pay—Spong v. Wright (5), Cripps v. Davis (6), Roulledge v. Ramsay (7). A letter, also, saying, "I never shall be able to pay you in cash, but you may have any of the goods we have at the Pantechicon by paying the expenses incurred thereon, without which they cannot be taken out, as before agreed when Mr. F. was in town," was held not to be sufficient to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations—Cawley v. Furnell (8). In another case a party wrote, "I am ready to put it out of my power to take advantage of the Statute of Limitations, and will immediately give my note for what is due. To pay you now or within the year, I am unable." In the same letter he required that the amount due should be ascertained before giving his note. In this case the promise was held unconditional, not to depend on the ascertaining the sum due—Gardner v. M'Mahon (9). In the present state of the authorities it could not be said that any acknowledgment or promise had been made to pay the bills so as to take them out of the Statute of Limitations.

Mr. E. F. Smith, for Grace Wells, in support of the Master's report, was not heard.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—In this case the creditor caused a letter to be written to the debtor requiring payment of the debt or further security, and received an answer from the debtor, saying, in effect, "I shall soon be in Hampshire, when I trust everything will be arranged agreeable to the wishes" of his creditor. This was not like a contingent promise; the wish of the creditor was for payment; the answer, therefore, was consequent upon the application, and could only amount to a promise to do that which the creditor required, which was to pay, and that in the mean time the letter should operate as a further security. The exceptions, therefore, must be overruled.

facias was issued, but nothing was found upon which to execute it. Upon half a year's annuity falling due, F. C. obtained an order stopping the Accountant General from parting with the cheque; but upon a petition, the Court declined to make an order authorizing the sheriff to seize the cheque or to direct it to be dealt with as if it was standing in the name of a trustee, and the petition was dismissed.

This was the petition of Frederick Courtoy, one of the seven children of William Courtoy, praying that the Accountant General might be ordered not to pay to William Courtoy, or his solicitor, a cheque for 58*l.* 5*s.*, but that he might deliver it to the sheriff of Middlesex, or allow him to seize the same under a writ of facias, in part satisfaction of a judgment at law; or that the cheque might be cancelled, and the money, together with all other sums which should accrue due upon an annuity of 120*l.* payable to William Courtoy during his life, might be paid to the petitioner until the judgment obtained by him should be satisfied.

John Courtoy, by his will, dated the 28th of May 1814, after directing payment of his debts, gave all the remainder of his property to George Narbonne, Vincent Robert Lovelace, Rowland Edward Williams, and Charles Drummond, their executors and administrators, upon trust to receive the interest and dividends, and therewith and with his property so given to them in the first place to pay to his son George Courtoy an annuity of 200*l.* a year by even half-yearly payments to be continued during his life; and he directed that in case his son George should sell or dispose of such annuity, then that the same should cease and become null and void; and on the decease of his son the testator directed that his executors and trustees should, out of the monies so given to them, cause the sum of 4,000*l.*, being as near as might be the principal requisite for the payment of such annuity, to be divided in equal shares amongst all and every the children of his son George, should there be any living at his decease, but if any or either of them should die under the age of twenty-one years without having been married, then the share of him or her so dying should be equally divided among the survivors, but in case there should be no child of his son that should attain the age of twenty-one years or be married, then the testator directed that the 4,000*l.* should be paid to the children of his son William Courtoy upon and subject to the like contingencies, conditions and limitations as were before directed and described in respect of the children of his son George.

The testator also directed his executors and trustees to pay unto his son William Courtoy one annuity or clear yearly sum of 100*l.* (which upon the decease of M. A. Woolley he directed to be increased to 120*l.*) during his life, by two even and equal half-yearly payments, to begin on the first day of the month next after his decease; and upon the decease of his son (William), to cause the sum of 2,000*l.* to be divided in equal proportions among his children as they should arrive at the age of twenty-one years or be married, which should first happen, with benefit of survivorship among them. And the testator added, "In order the more effectually to prevent his (William's) defeating my intention in his favour, and to prevent his disposing of such annuity, or making it subject to his debts, I direct that the same shall become void and forfeited in case he shall sell or dispose of the same. And as my son William may depart this life leaving children or a child not of age to claim a part or the whole of such sum, then my will is that such annuity or yearly sum of 100*l.* shall be paid to his wife for the maintenance and support of such child or children until he, she or they should become of age to claim their proportions of such legacy; but in case there shall be no wife of my son William living at his decease, then it is my will that my executors and trustees shall apply such annual sum of 100*l.* in such way as they in their judgment shall think most for the benefit of such child or children until he, she or they shall attain the age of twenty-one years or become married, which shall first happen, and entitled to the whole or a proportion of the sum or sums."

The will was proved by all the executors on the 7th of January 1819.

A sum of 21,000*l.* consols was set apart in the name of the Accountant General to an account entitled "The Annuitants Account," to answer, among others, these annuities, with liberty for any person interested to apply upon the decease of any or either of the annuitants.

In August 1848 George Courtoy died, without ever having had any child or children. The petitioner was one of the seven children of William Courtoy then living, all of whom had attained the age of twenty-one years.

On the 7th of May 1849, so much of the stock then standing to "The Annuitants Account" as would be sufficient to raise 4,000*l.* was directed to be sold, and the proceeds, with so much of the cash as would be equal to the dividends, was directed to be carried to "The Account of the children of William Courtoy, and the persons claiming under them," and it was ordered, amongst other things, that one equal seventh part thereof should be paid to the petitioner, Frederick Courtoy.

Under this order the sum of 589*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* was received by William Courtoy, by virtue of a power of attorney executed by Frederick Courtoy, who was at that time with his regiment in India.

William Courtoy paid no more than 70*l.* of this sum to Frederick Courtoy, who brought an action against William Courtoy in the Court of Common Pleas for the balance, and on the 22nd of December 1851 obtained final judgment for 519*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*, together with 9*l.* 5*s.* 5*d.* for costs.

A writ of fi. fa. was then issued, and the sheriff of Middlesex was directed to levy the debt and costs, but he had not been able to discover that William Courtoy had any property. Upon the half-year's annuity falling due in January last, the petitioner obtained an order restraining the Accountant General from parting with the cheque, and presented this petition.

Mr. Baggallay, in support of the petition, contended that by the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 12. the sheriff was empowered to seize money, bank notes, cheques, bills of exchange, &c., and by the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82. s. 1. the superior Courts of Westminster were authorized to make orders as to any stocks, funds, annuities, or shares in the name of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, the same as if it had been standing in the name of a trustee of the judgment debtor. The act, therefore, gave the petitioner a security upon the fund, which this Court would enforce by making such an order as would enable the sheriff to make the cheque available for payment of the debt. This had been held in Watts v. Jefferyes (1), and the Court had decided that a party was entitled to a stop order to restrain a debtor from receiving dividends of stock, so as to prevent him from defeating or diminishing the security given by the act.

Mr. Fooks, contra, insisted that the sheriff might apply to the Accountant General for the cheque, who, however, had no power to part with it. The petitioner's father also was paralytic, and was quite incapable of giving any instructions to his solicitor respecting it. The cheque was drawn in favour of William Courtoy. Could the Court, therefore, proceed further with this application? It would be recollected that this was an annuity given to William Courtoy for life, with a provision declaring it void if he assigned or sold. If, therefore, the Court made any order, the annuity became void, as the gift was made upon a conditional limitation, which differed altogether in effect from a clause of forfeiture. It was, therefore, submitted that the Court would do no more than the annuitant was permitted to do by the will. In Miles v. Presland (2) it was held, that the Court had no jurisdiction under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 14, to order monies invested in the name of the Accountant General to stand charged with a debt upon a judgment recovered at law against the party entitled to the funds; and this Court had no jurisdiction to make any order which would divert the fund from the purpose to which it was applied by the testator—Hulkes v. Day (3).

Mr. Baggallay, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I have considered this case, and doubt whether I have power to make any order. I cannot authorize the sheriff to seize the cheque, neither do I think I can direct it to be dealt with as if it was standing in the name of a trustee. I consider, therefore, that I must dismiss the petition, that an opportunity may be given for an appeal.

Mr. Baggallay asked that the order restraining the Accountant General from parting with the cheque might be continued.

Trustee—Breach of Trust—Liability of Trustee—Pleading.

When a trustee, having good reason to doubt the validity of an appointment of the trust funds, thinks proper to act upon it, he will be affected by all the consequences which follow upon the act.

The Court will not undo part only of one entire transaction. Therefore, where cestuis que trust sought to impeach an appointment under one deed, without seeking to impeach a subsequent appointment which was directly connected with the former, and by which they were benefited, the Court dismissed the bill with costs, but without prejudice to a new bill being filed.

The bill in this case was filed for the purpose of setting aside an appointment, made by a deed poll-of the 3rd of October 1832, of the bonuses up to the year 1830 on two policies of insurance effected in the Equitable Life Insurance Office, on the life of Colonel Gwynne, and of having it declared that a surrender of the bonuses made to the office by the late Jonathan Brundrett was a breach of trust, and for the purpose of charging his (J. Brundrett's) estate with the amount of the bonuses.

Colonel Gwynne appeared, by the pleadings to have been tenant for life of a considerable estate in Wales, with remainder to his eldest son in tail. He had a son and eight daughters by his first wife, Mary Ann Gwynne, and the policies of insurance in the Equitable Insurance Office and other policies of insurance which he effected on his life in the Pelican and Albion Insurance Offices were the provisions which he made for his daughters. By an indenture, dated the 12th of May 1803, he assigned a policy of insurance for 4,000*l.* which he had effected on his life in the Pelican Life Insurance Office, to Thomas Lowten, upon trust to receive the amount which should be payable upon it on his death, and to pay the same as his wife Mary Ann Gwynne should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment, to her if she should survive him, but if she should die in his lifetime to his children who should be living at her death, and to the issue of any of them who should be then dead, excepting an eldest or only son; the shares of the sons to be vested at twenty-one, and of the daughters at twenty-one or marriage, with the usual provisions for survivorship; and by this deed he demised some parts of the estate of which he was tenant for life to T. Lowten for a term of ninety-nine years, if he should so long live, upon trust, for securing the payment of the premiums upon this policy. By another indenture, dated the 13th of December 1811, Colonel Gwynne assigned another policy of insurance for 1,000*l.* which he had also effected on his life in the Pelican Insurance Office to T. Lowten upon trusts which, so far as the children were concerned, were similar to those declared by the former deed; and by this deed he also demised to T. Lowten other parts of the estates of which he (Colonel Gwynne) was tenant for life, upon trust, for securing the payment of the premiums upon this policy. Mary Ann Gwynne, the first wife, died in the year 1818, having by her will, dated in 1810, appointed the 4,000*l.* assured by the first policy, as to 100*l.* to the son, and as to the remaining 3,900*l.* to the younger children, the eight daughters, equally; but she made no appointment of the 1,000*l.* assured by the second policy, and upon her death, therefore, the eight daughters became entitled to the 1,000*l.* Pelican policy as in default of appointment, and, subject only to any claim of the son for the 100*l.*, to the 4,000*l.* Pelican policy under the appointment of Mrs. Gwynne.

(4) 5 Beav. 388; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 93.

In the month of August 1821, Sackville Frederick Gwynne, the eldest son of Colonel Gwynne, had attained the age of twenty-one years; and at this time Colonel Gwynne had, in addition to the Pelican policies above mentioned, effected four other policies of insurance on his life, two in the Equitable Life Insurance Office, one for the sum of 4,000*l.* and the other for the sum of 1,000*l.*, and two in the Albion Life Insurance Office for the sums of 4,000*l.* and 1,000*l.*; and he had mortgaged the 1,000*l.* Equitable policy for securing the payment of certain bills of exchange, and he had also mortgaged the 1,000*l.* Albion policy. Upon S. F. Gwynne, the son, attaining twenty-one, arrangements were come to between him and his father for suffering recoveries and re-settling the estates, and for making provision for the father's eight daughters, and a deed was executed for carrying into effect these arrangements. This deed bore date the 28th of August 1821, and was expressed to be made between Colonel Gwynne of the first part, S. F. Gwynne of the second part, John Michael Goodeve of the third part, and J. Brundrett of the fourth part. By this deed, after reciting the will by which the entail was created, and that the father was seised in fee of other estates, and that it had been agreed that a recovery should be suffered, and that in consideration of Colonel Gwynne agreeing to convey and assign the hereditaments whereof he was seised in fee to the uses, and subject to the powers, provisoes, agreements and declarations thereafter mentioned and contained, and also effectually to vest in a trustee, for the benefit of the daughters of Colonel Gwynne by his late wife deceased, in manner thereafter referred to, the six policies of insurance above mentioned, and also to make parts of the hereditaments whereof the said Colonel Gwynne was tenant for life, with remainder to S. F. Gwynne in tail as aforesaid, as were thereafter appropriated for that purpose, liable to the payment to Colonel Gwynne and his trustees of an annuity or yearly rentcharge of 500*l.* during his life, with such powers and remedies, term of years, trusts and provisions for securing the payment thereof as were thereafter contained; and also to make such other parts of the hereditaments as were thereafter appropriated for the purpose liable and subject to trusts for keeping up the policies of insurance, and also of Colonel Gwynne agreeing to join with S. F. Gwynne in making a tenant to the precept for suffering such recoveries as aforesaid, and to enter into the covenants thereafter on his part contained, S. F. Gwynne on his part agreed that all the hereditaments therein referred to, secured as aforesaid, should be settled, limited, and assured to the uses, upon the trusts, and subject to the powers, provisoes, declarations and agreements thereafter limited, expressed, and declared. This deed then recited the recovery deeds, and that in pursuance of the agreement and by two several indentures, bearing even date therewith (one of them being a deed purporting to be indorsed on the deed of 1803, and the other being a deed purporting to be indorsed on the deed of 1811), the said six several policies of insurance, and all the monies thereby recoverable, had been assigned to J. Brundrett, his executors, administrators and assigns, upon divers trusts therein referred to, being trusts for the benefit of the daughters of Colonel Gwynne and Mary Ann his wife; but that inasmuch as two of the policies were subject to certain charges and incumbrances thereafter mentioned, it had been agreed that Colonel Gwynne should enter into the covenants thereafter on his part contained, for effectually exonerating the same and causing them to be effectually assigned to J. Brundrett upon the trusts aforesaid. Colonel Gwynne then conveyed his estates, and it was agreed that the recoveries should enure as to certain parts of the estates to uses for securing an annuity to the son during the life of the father, and as to the same parts of the estates subject to the annuity, and as to other parts of the estates to the use of J. Brundrett for the term of 1,000 years upon the trusts thereafter declared, and as to the parts of the estates comprised in the term subject to the annuity and to the term, and as to the remainder of the estates, to other uses not material to be stated. The trusts of the term of 1,000 years, as to the premises comprised therein, which were not charged with the annuity, were in this deed declared as follows:—That J. Brundrett, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should as therein mentioned raise and levy such sums of money as should be sufficient from time to time to satisfy and pay the several annual premiums payable or to become payable for or in respect of the said several policies of insurance, and all the costs, charges and expenses incident to or attending the execution of the trusts, and from time to time to reimburse himself and themselves the costs, charges and expenses of and attending the execution of the trusts; and in the next place, pay or cause to be paid the annual or other premiums upon the policies of insurance; or in the event of their being allowed to drop, then upon trust to raise and levy such sums as should be requisite for obtaining renewed policies for an equal amount; and in the mean time, and until it should appear to J. Brundrett, his executors, &c., necessary or expedient in his or their discretion, to raise or levy any sum or sums of money in respect of such policies of insurance, and also from time to time when and as often as all such premiums, costs, charges, and expenses, and the costs, charges, and expenses incident to the execution and performance of the said trusts lastly thereinbefore declared, should be fully raised, satisfied and paid, to permit and suffer the rents and profits to be received by the person who would be entitled to the hereditaments if that charge had not been made. By this deed there was also given power to Colonel Gwynne to charge the estates with 25,000*l.*, and Colonel Gwynne thereby covenanted with S. F. Gwynne to pay the premiums on the policies, and also to pay off the mortgages to which the 1,000*l.* policies in the Equitable and Albion Insurance Offices were subject.

This deed was not executed by J. Brundrett, nor were the deeds of even date, recited in it and by which the policies were purported to be assigned, executed by any of the parties thereto; but by another indenture, dated the 1st of October 1821, and expressed to be made between Thomas Lowten of the first part, Colonel Gwynne of the second part, S. F. Gwynne of the third part, and J. Brundrett of the fourth part, after reciting the deed of the 12th of May 1803, and that Thomas Lowten, the party to the deed of October 1821, was the executor of Thomas Lowten, the trustee under the deed of May 1803, and was desirous of being discharged from the trusts, Colonel Gwynne purported to appoint J. Brundrett to be the trustee under the deed of 1803; and the premises comprised therein and the 4,000*l.* Pelican policy were purported to be assigned by T. Lowten to J. Brundrett upon the trusts of the deed of 1803, and of Mary Ann Gwynne's will.

By the deed of the 1st of October 1821, it was witnessed, that in pursuance of and for carrying into execution the agreement or arrangement between Colonel Gwynne and S. F. Gwynne for granting to Colonel Gwynne powers of charging with considerable sums of money the settled estates whereof he was tenant for life, with remainder to S. F. Gwynne in tail, and in consideration of the provision intended by such arrangement to be made for the benefit of Colonel Gwynne, they, Colonel Gwynne and S. F. Gwynne assigned, both the policies in the Equitable Insurance Office, and both the policies in the Albion Insurance Office to J. Brundrett, upon the same trusts as to placing out the same monies as were by the first-mentioned indenture of the 1st of October 1821 declared concerning the monies thereby assigned; and subject thereto, the monies to be recovered under and by virtue of the said four policies, and all interest thereof, were to be upon trust for all or any one or more of the daughters then living of Colonel Gwynne by Mary Ann his late wife, or of any one or more of the children or other issue of the said daughters, or any of them (such children and issue respectively to be born before any such appointment as thereafter mentioned should be made to or for him, her, or them), in such manner and form, and (if more than one) in such parts, shares and proportions, and for such times, with such limitations over or substitutions in favour of any one or more of the others of the daughters or their children and issue respectively, and either by way of annuity, legacy, portion, remainder, present or remote interest or otherwise, and to vest and be payable and paid, transferred and assigned at such time or times, age or ages, and upon such contingencies and under and subject to such directions and regulations, &c. as Colonel Gwynne from time to time by deed or will should appoint. And in default of such appointment all the policies of insurance lastly thereby assigned, and the monies thereby recoverable, and all stocks, funds, and securities whatsoever upon which the same or any part thereof respectively should be invested, and all the interest, dividends, and income thereof were to be held upon and for the same intents and purposes, and with, under and subject to the same powers, provisos and declarations as were then or should for the time being be existing and capable of taking effect of and concerning the policy of 4,000*l.* under the deed of 1803, and the will of Mary Ann Gwynne.

By this deed, therefore, of the 1st of October 1821, the Equitable policies and the Albion policies, and all the bonuses upon them, became subject to Colonel Gwynne's appointment.

By another deed, also of the date of the 1st of October 1821, the Pelican policy for 1,000*l.* comprised in the deed of 1811 was purported to be assigned to J. Brundrett on the trusts of that deed. These deeds, however, of the 1st of October, were executed by Colonel Gwynne only, and were not executed either by T. Lowten, or by J. Brundrett.

J. Brundrett carried on the business of a solicitor in London, in partnership with other persons, and the firm appeared from the pleadings to have been in the habit of paying the premiums upon the policies of insurance belonging to their clients. They paid the premiums on the policies of insurance effected by Colonel Gwynne for many years, down to the time when J. Brundrett retired from the trusts, and it appeared that Colonel Gwynne was very irregular in making remittances to meet the payments of the premiums.

By a deed-poll, dated the 3rd of October 1832, (having reference to an immediate surrender of the bonuses on the Equitable policies) under the hand and seal of Colonel Gwynne, reciting the two Equitable policies and the first-mentioned deed of October 1821, and that the Equitable Insurance Company had at several times in and previous to the year 1830 resolved that bonuses should be declared upon and appropriated to the two policies of insurance, and that they had been duly declared and appropriated to be paid at the same time with the sums of 4,000*l.* and 1,000*l.* originally insured and secured by the two policies, Colonel Gwynne, in exercise of the power reserved by the said deed of the 1st of October 1821, appointed the bonuses to Catherine Maria Gwynne, Jane Mary Ann Gwynne, and Edmuntina Frances Gwynne (three of his daughters who were then of age) respectively in equal shares.

It was the appointment made by this deed which was impeached by the bill. After the execution of this deed and on the 24th of October 1832, Colonel Gwynne and C. M. Gwynne, J. M. A. Gwynne and E. F. Gwynne, the three appointees under the deed-poll of the 3rd of October 1832, signed an authority to Colonel Gwynne and J. Brundrett, empowering them to receive the bonuses, and to lay out and invest the same in the funds of Great Britain, to accumulate for the said appointees in the name of J. Brundrett, or any future trustee or trustees for them, to be named by them, with full liberty for him or any future trustee or trustees to be named by them to sell out of the funds any sum or sums of money necessary to pay the premiums on the policies, and any other premium or premiums of which J. Brundrett was trustee for them, until he could produce the same from the estates charged with the payment of the premiums; and Colonel Gwynne thereby agreed that any loss that might happen from selling out and repurchasing the funds should be made good out of the rents and profits of the estates charged with the payment of the premiums.

This authority, however, appeared never to have been acted upon, for on the 24th of November 1832 the same parties signed a further authority to Colonel Gwynne and J. Brundrett, which, after reciting the appointment of the bonuses, was in these terms:—"We do authorize and empower Colonel Gwynne and J. Brundrett, Esq., to receive for us the bonuses amounting to the sum of 3,683*l.* 19*s.*, and to lay out and invest the sum of 1,600*l.* in the 3*l.* per cent. consolidated bank annuities or Exchequer bills in the name of J. Brundrett, Esq., or any future trustee or trustees to be named and appointed by us, with full liberty for him or any future trustee or trustees to be appointed by us to sell out of the 3*l.* per cent. consols, or Exchequer bills, any sum or sums of money which shall be necessary from time to time to pay the premiums on the policies effected with the Equitable Insurance Company, or any other premium or premiums of the different policies of insurance of which J. Brundrett and the representatives of the late T. Lowten are trustees. And we, the undersigned, do further authorize J. Brundrett to pay Mr. King 50*l.*"

This authority varied very considerably from the authority of the 24th of October 1832. In the instrument of the 24th of October 1832 the whole fund which was to arise from the bonuses was to be invested in the name of J. Brundrett, with power for him to resort to it for payment of the premiums. By the authority of the 24th of November 1832 only the sum of 1,600*l.* was to be so invested. And again, in the authority of October 1832, power was reserved to resort to the estates in distinct terms, and in the authority of the 24th of November 1832 there was no power to resort to the estates, or for the vested funds being re-couped out of the rents.

The terms of this latter authority appeared to have alarmed Mr. Brundrett, for he soon afterwards consulted counsel upon it; and the questions that were submitted to counsel on that subject, so far as they are material to the present case, were these :— "5th. Can Mr. Brundrett safely consent to the arrangement now proposed to be adopted, and is the above authority of the three Miss Gwynne's" (the authority of the 24th of November 1832; the case took no notice of the authority of the 24th of October 1832,) "a sufficient document to authorize his surrendering the bonuses and appropriating a portion of them as a fund to answer the payment of the premiums? Or, 6th. What other course would you advise Mr. Brundrett to pursue for his own safety in relation to the trust concerns, keeping in view his desire of continuing to act in the trust in order to preserve the policies as a provision for the daughters, at the same time wishing to be relieved from the necessity of resorting to the estates for payment of the premiums?"

The answers were as follows :—"I am clearly of opinion that the proposed appointment is (in the language of a court of equity) a fraud upon the power, being in favour of ladies, the youngest, probably, just of age, and all under the parent's influence. It is not, in fact, an appointment to them, but of 1,600*l.* to the direct use of the father, and of the residue either for his own use, or if that go to the actual use of his appointees, it would be considered the price they received for selling the inchoate interests of their younger sisters. In moral justice, it is very singular that the extraordinary profits derived by the daughters from the bounty of their father should be applied to secure the direct subject of that bounty, particularly if the father has become less able to afford to effectuate his intentions, and as, in all probability, they indirectly participate in the income which would be relieved from that charge. But I cannot advise a trustee to incur so serious a liability to any of the younger children who may be disappointed by his concurrence. Indeed, I could not advise him to surrender the bonuses while any daughter is under age, for he has no right to anticipate any sum receivable in respect of the policies, which is not payable in ordinary course until Colonel Gwynne's death." "It is very difficult to find any mode of enabling Colonel Gwynne to relieve his income from this heavy charge with safety to Mr. Brundrett. The best which I can suggest are the following :—Either for Colonel Gwynne to make a general irrevocable appointment (if the deeds proposed to be indorsed upon the deeds of 1803 and 1811 warrant it) in favour of all his younger children, giving them all shares very nearly approaching equality, and in so much, at least, as to make it the manifest interest of the infants to elect to take under the father's appointment instead of that of the mother." "This appointment might fix the shares of the elder children upon the policies in the Equitable Assurance Company. This would give the daughters who are of age an immediate right to deal with these policies, and relieve the transaction from fraud upon the youngest children. If it is clear that the daughters who are of age have the command of their own intentions. After informing them that they may put the proceeds of any surrender into their own pockets, and absolutely claim the benefit of the insurance after their father's death, and compel him to keep up the premiums during his life, Mr. Brundrett may with less risk surrender the bonuses at their request, and dispose of the proceeds according to their directions; but he should receive their directions from year to year before he applies such proceeds towards the premiums, and I should rather advise his taking a mortgage for the sums from time to time necessary upon the eventual proceeds of the policies, as tending to reduce his risk." The opinion then suggested another mode of operating the same result, through the medium of a mortgage to be made by Mr. Gwynne the younger, and concluded by stating that these appeared to be the least dangerous expedients, but that Mr. Brundrett could not be advised to resort to the former, and that Mr. Gwynne, jun. would probably decline to concur in the latter.

After the date of this opinion a further appointment was made by Colonel Gwynne by deed, dated the 14th of December 1832, by which, after reciting the Equitable policies and the deeds of August 1821 and October 1832, Colonel Gwynne appointed the principal of both the Equitable policies to his other four daughters, Charlotte Elizabeth Gwynne, Julia Arabella Gwynne, Emma Sophia Gwynne, and Georgiana Caroline Gwynne, who did not take under the appointment of the bonuses; with a proviso that, if Emma Sophia Gwynne and Georgiana Caroline Gwynne, then infants, should die under the age of twenty-one years without having been married, the share of her so dying in the 4,000*l.* and the 1,000*l.* should go and remain to C. M. Gwynne, C. E. Gwynne, J. M. A. Gwynne, J. A. Gwynne, and E. F. Gwynne, and the survivor of E. S. Gwynne, and G. C. Gwynne, in equal shares as tenants in common. And if both the then infants should die under the age of twenty-one without being or having been married, then the whole of their shares, as well original as accrued, should remain to C. M., C. E., J. M. A., J. A., and E. F., in equal shares.

The bonuses which had been declared upon the Equitable policies up to 1830, and which were appointed by the deed-poll of the 3rd of October 1832, amounted to 6,570*l.*, and the office was at that time willing to give for these bonuses the sum of 3,683*l.* 19*s.*; and on comparing this amount with the amount of the principal on the Equitable policies, and allowing for the differences of the number of the appointees under the two deed-polls, it was (as the Vice Chancellor remarked in his judgment) perfectly clear that the deed-poll of the 14th of December 1832 proceeded upon the principle of putting the seven daughters, who were the appointees under the deed-polls, upon as nearly as possible the same footing, and there was a paper of calculations proved in the cause shewing this to have been the case. This paper of calculations first took the shares of the children who were appointees of the principal of the policies, who were four in number, and shewed that they would take 1,250*l.* each. It then took the shares of the children who were appointees of the bonuses in the sum of 3,683*l.* 19*s.*, and there being three of those children, it brought out their shares at 1,227*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.*, making a difference in that respect only of about 23*l.* between those two shares. It then took the supposition of one of the two infant children dying under twenty-one, and in that case, adopting the limitation over contained in the deed of appointment, it brought out the share of the four children who were the appointees of the principal at 1,458*l.*, and the share of the three children who were the appointees of the bonuses at 1,436*l.*, making a still less difference between the amounts. It then took the event also contemplated by the deed appointing the principal sum, and calculated what the shares of the appointees under that deed and of the appointees of the bonuses would be, taking into account the limitation over upon the death of both the infants, and it then brought out the shares of the appointees of the principal

There was proved in the cause an agreement between the appointees under the deed of the 3rd of October 1832 and Colonel Gwynne, which appeared to have been prepared under Mr. Brundrett's directions, and was intended to be signed by the appointees, but which did not appear to have been executed. It recited fully all the transactions, and provided for the application of the 1,600*l.* to the payment of the premiums on the policies, and for the residue of the monies to arise from the surrender being handed over to the three appointees. Amongst other recitals, it contained the following:—"And whereas the hereditaments by the recited indentures conveyed upon trust to secure the annual premiums payable in respect of the six policies consist principally of the mansion and house of Glanbrane, in which Colonel Gwynne and all his unmarried daughters now reside, and the deer park and certain other lands adjacent thereto, and now in the occupation of Colonel Gwynne; and the rents and profits of the remainder of such hereditaments are wholly insufficient to provide for the payment of the annual premiums; and whereas Colonel Gwynne hath lately upon several occasions failed to provide for the payment of certain of the annual premiums as they became due, and J. Brundrett hath advanced and disbursed the same out of his own money, amounting to the sum of 229*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.*, to prevent a forfeiture of the policies in respect whereof such premiums were payable, and J. Brundrett hath lately intimated his intention to enter upon the demised mansion-house, deer park, and other adjacent lands, and by leasing the same to raise as well the sum of 229*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* so advanced by him, as also such sums of money as may be necessary to secure the future payments of the premiums, unless Colonel Gwynne will provide for the same by some other means, which it is not convenient for him at present to do. And whereas Colonel Gwynne, C. M. Gwynne, J. M. A. Gwynne, and E. F. Gwynne (the appointees of the bonuses) are very desirous to continue to reside in the mansion-house of Glanbrane, and that Colonel Gwynne should continue also in the occupation of the deer park and lands adjacent, and for that purpose the three appointees have concurred in an application of Colonel Gwynne to lend and advance him out of the sum of 3,683*l.* 19*s.* (the money to be received for the surrender of the bonuses) so remaining to their joint credit in the hands of J. Brundrett, the sum of 279*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.*, to repay to him as well the sum of 229*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* already advanced by him, as also the further sum of 50*l.* (a sum paid for redeeming one of the policies which he had advanced and paid on account of Colonel Gwynne), and also from time to time to lend and advance to him out of the said sum of 3,683*l.* 19*s.* such further sums of money, not exceeding the sum of 1,600*l.*, as shall be necessary for the purpose of satisfying the premiums which shall have grown due in respect of the six policies, until such notice shall be given and have expired as hereinafter mentioned, upon the security of his covenant; and Colonel Gwynne and also the three appointees have applied to and requested J. Brundrett to abstain from entering upon the demised mansion-house and hereditaments, or the receipt of the rents and profits thereof, until after the expiration of such notice as hereinafter mentioned, with which application he hath consented to comply."

Immediately after the execution of the deed of the 14th of December 1832, and on the 15th of December 1832, the three appointees under the deed of the 3rd of October 1832, gave a power of attorney to J. Brundrett to receive the sum of 3,683*l.* 19*s.* from the Equitable Office, and thereupon to surrender the appointed bonuses; and soon afterwards, and on the 19th of December 1832, J. Brundrett surrendered the policies to the office, and received the sum of 3,683*l.* 19*s.*, for which he signed a receipt as for himself, and also as attorney for the appointees. Some short time afterwards, and in January 1833, Colonel Gwynne attorned tenant to J. Brundrett as trustee for the 1,000 years term.

Pending these proceedings, T. Lowten (the nephew) had instituted a suit to be discharged from the trusts of the deeds of 1803 and 1811, which were then vested in him as representative of his uncle T. Lowten, deceased. J. Brundrett had joined in this suit to be discharged from the trusts reposed in him; but on the arrangement being made for the surrender of the policies, and for the receipt and investment of the 3,683*l.* 19*s.*, he agreed to continue in the trusts. When, however, the appointees refused to allow more than the 1,600*l.* to be retained, he again determined to retire, and thereupon a supplemental bill was filed in the cause for the purpose of effecting his retirement. This supplemental bill stated the deeds of the 3rd of October and the 14th of December 1832, and the receipt by J. Brundrett of the 3,683*l.* 19*s.*, but it contained no statement of any of the circumstances under which the deeds were executed.

By a decree made in those causes, dated the 11th of February 1833, it was referred to the Master to appoint proper persons to be trustees of the six several policies of insurance, and the monies to be received in respect thereof, and of the messuages, tenements, and hereditaments comprised in the several terms of ninety-nine years, (the term formerly vested in T. Lowten the uncle) and 1,000 years, and of the residue of such terms respectively under the several indentures of 1803, 1811, and 1821, and the several other indentures, instead of T. Lowten the uncle, and his executor, and J. Brundrett. Directions were also given for the taxation of the costs as between solicitor and client, to be paid by J. Brundrett out of the said sum of 3,683*l.* 19*s.*, and the residue thereof to be paid by him to C. M. Gwynne, J. M. A. Gwynne, and E. F. Gwynne; all proper parties to join in conveying and assigning the trust premises to the new trustees. The decree, therefore, directed the payment over by J. Brundrett to the three appointees of the bonuses of the amount which had been received from the insurance office for the surrender of those bonuses.

In pursuance of this decree H. L. Harries and W. Rice were appointed to be trustees in the place of Lowten and Brundrett, and by deed of the 30th of May 1833, the policies and the several trust premises were assigned to them on the trusts to which they were subject. In May and June 1833, J. Brundrett paid the taxed costs under the decree, and paid over the balance of the 3,683*l.* 19*s.* to the appointees under the deed of the 3rd of October 1832, deducting, however, the sum of 423*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* which he had paid for premiums on the policies of insurance.

The transactions with J. Brundrett were thus closed. But afterwards by a deed-poll, dated the 6th of June 1833, after reciting that Colonel Gwynne had duly appointed the 4,000*l.* and 1,000*l.* assured by the policies and the bonuses declared thereon by the Equitable Insurance Company up to and prior to the year 1830, between the daughters named in the deeds of appointment, and reciting the Pelican policies and the Albion policies, Colonel Gwynne, by virtue and in pursuance of the power and authority given to him, appointed the future bonuses to be declared by the Equitable Insurance Company on the Equitable policies to all his eight daughters by his late wife, M. A. Gwynne, in equal shares; and appointed the policy in the Albion office for 4,000*l.* to his three daughters, C. M. Gwynne, J. M. A. Gwynne and E. F. Gwynne, in equal shares, and the policy in the Albion office for 1,000*l.* to his daughter Harriet Augusta, the wife of Edward Leopold Gibert.

Under this deed, therefore, the additional bonuses on the Equitable policies went equally among all the daughters; some of the other policies were appointed to the three appointees under the deed of October 1832; and a separate appointment was made in favour of another of the daughters (Mrs. Gibert).

The three appointees under the deed-poll of the 3rd of October 1832 subsequently lent and advanced to Colonel Gwynne the sum of 1,624*l.*, part of the monies which had been received from the surrender of the bonuses, upon a mortgage of his life estate, subject to some prior mortgages thereon. This mortgage was made by a deed, dated the 13th of June 1833. It was not till some time in that month that they had received those monies from J. Brundrett, and it was clear, therefore, (in the opinion of the Vice Chancellor) that the money which was the fruit of the appointment of the bonuses passed almost immediately into the hands of the father upon a security which (his Honour remarked) none could doubt was scarcely of any value.

Then came a deed of the 24th of August 1836, (described by the Vice Chancellor to be a very singular one) made between C. M. Gwynne, J. M. A. Gwynne, and E. F. Gwynne (the three appointees of the bonuses, and also of some of the policies under the deed of June 1833) of the one part, and Charlotte Elizabeth Gwynne, Harriet Augusta Gibert, Julia Arabella Gwynne, Emma Sophia Gwynne, and Georgiana Caroline Gwynne, the five other daughters, of the other part. It recited the appointment of the 6th of June 1833; that at the time of the execution of such appointment it was arranged and intended that the appointment of the Albion policy for 4,000*l.* should have been for the equal benefit of all the daughters of Colonel Gwynne by his first wife, share and share alike, but that by some mistake or error the same was appointed equally among three daughters only, as on reference to the deed of appointment would appear; that the five other daughters had severally applied to and requested the three other daughters to correct such mistake and error, to secure the same to be divided as originally intended, namely, among themselves and their sisters, in equal shares and proportions, and which the three sisters had consented and agreed to do by executing the covenant or declaration thereafter contained. It was then witnessed that in pursuance of the agreement and in consideration of natural love and affection, and for a nominal consideration, the three daughters covenanted, declared and agreed with the five daughters, that the five daughters should thenceforth stand and be possessed of and interested in the Albion policy of insurance for 4,000*l.* and the monies thereby insured equally with the three daughters share and share alike, so that each of the parties thereto of the first and second parts might receive one equal eighth part or share of the sum of 4,000*l.*, and all benefit and advantage arising therefrom when the same should become payable under or by virtue of the policy of insurance.

Colonel Gwynne died on the 6th of September 1836, insolvent. Walter Rice afterwards desired to retire from the trusts vested in him by the deed of the 30th of May 1833, and thereupon, by another deed, dated the 12th of April 1837, to which all the eight daughters were parties, and which fully recited every deed and every instrument which had been executed upon the subject of these several policies, except the appointment of the bonuses, and except the distribution of the sum which had been received for the surrender of the bonuses, and which it was not material to recite, Edmund Herbert was appointed to be a trustee.

The recitals in this deed are material to be attended to, as they stated the titles of the parties to the several funds. It recited that S. F. Gwynne (the son), at the time of the execution of the deed of 1821, agreed to relinquish the sum of 100*l.* appointed to him by the will of his mother; that the eight daughters were then, by reason of the renunciation of S. F. Gwynne's interest under the will of their mother, entitled to the sum of 4,000*l.* assured by the Pelican policy, and were then, under the recited indentures, entitled also to the sum of 1,000*l.*, secured by the other Pelican policy; that C. E. Gwynne, J. A. Gwynne, E. S. Gwynne and G. C. Gwynne were then entitled to the sums of 4,000*l.* and 1,000*l.* assured by policies granted by the Equitable Insurance Company; that the eight daughters were then entitled to the 4,000*l.* assured by the Albion policy; and that Harriet Augusta was alone entitled to the 1,000*l.* assured by the Albion policy. Then there was a distinct recital of the rights of all the parties, and then the funds were transferred to Mr. Herbert, the new trustee, to hold them upon the trust to which they were subject.

Edmund Herbert did not long continue in this trust, for on the 17th of that same month of April Mr. Thomas France, the solicitor of the plaintiffs in the present suit, was appointed a trustee in his place, about five days afterwards. Mr. Harries and Mr. France, having thus become trustees, received the monies due on the policies on the death of Colonel Gwynne, and distributed them according to the trusts of the deed. On the 8th of September 1837, Mr. France, as solicitor for the plaintiffs in the present suit, addressed the following letter to Mr. Brundrett:—"Sir,—I am instructed by Miss Emma and Miss Caroline Gwynne to make a respectful application to you on the subject of their proportions of certain bonuses declared by the Equitable Insurance Company, London, upon two policies of insurance in that office, one for 4,000*l.* and another for 1,000*l.* on the life of their father lately deceased, and which bonuses you, as their trustee, improperly, as they are advised, paid over to the father, to their prejudice and contrary to your duty as such, whereby they have sustained a considerable loss, and having no means of reimbursing themselves but by an application, if necessary, to a court of equity, I am, with the hope of avoiding such a proceeding, requested to open a communication with you upon the subject, to ascertain, if possible, whether you are disposed to meet their claim in an amicable manner, in which case I am instructed and personally desirous to do all I can to save you unnecessary trouble or expense. An early answer will oblige." Mr. Brundrett was not disposed to open any communication whatever on the subject, or to treat the claim in an amicable manner, and he returned a very angry and indignant answer in the month of September 1837. No further proceedings were taken on this claim during the life of Mr. Brundrett, who died in May 1841. This bill was filed on the 3rd of November 1842, five years after the claim had been made.

The plaintiffs were Emma Sophia, the wife of George Harrison, and her husband, and Georgiana Caroline Gwynne, afterwards the wife of Morgan Pryce Lloyd, the two youngest daughters of Colonel Gwynne. They were both infants at the time when the appointment impeached by the bill was made, but the plaintiff, Emma Sophia, attained twenty-one on the 9th of July 1833, and did not marry the plaintiff, G. Harrison, till November 1838, and the plaintiff Georgiana Caroline attained twenty-one on the 23rd of January 1837, and was then unmarried. The defendants to the bill were the representatives of J. Brundrett, Harries and France, the trustees, and the other daughters and the parties who represented them. The bill stated all the deeds and alleged the impeached appointment to be fraudulent; that Brundrett accepted and acted in the trusts of the deeds of August 1821 and October 1821; that the two Equitable policies were deposited and remained with him as trustee; that at the date of the deed of August 1821, he, as trustee, paid the premiums on the policies, and thereby kept up the policies, and Colonel Gwynne was permitted by him to remain in possession of the estates, but that he did not punctually pay the premiums on the policies; that in October 1832, a large sum was due to J. Brundrett from Colonel Gwynne on account of the premiums on the policies; that in the year 1832, Colonel Gwynne was in want of money, and was desirous of being relieved from the payment of the premiums payable on the policies, and of paying the sum due from time to time to J. Brundrett as aforesaid, and J. Brundrett was desirous of obtaining payment thereof, and it was proposed by Colonel Gwynne and J. Brundrett, or proposed by the one and assented to by the other of them, and was agreed and arranged between them, that Colonel Gwynne, by virtue and in exercise of the power given to him by the indenture of the 1st of October 1821, should execute an appointment of the bonuses in favour of such of his daughters as should be willing to concur in such arrangement, and that J. Brundrett, with the concurrence of such appointees, should then surrender such bonuses and appropriate part of the money to be received upon such surrender as a fund to answer the future payment of the premiums so as to relieve Colonel Gwynne therefrom, and to apply part thereof in payment of the sum due from Colonel Gwynne to J. Brundrett as aforesaid, and otherwise for the benefit of Colonel Gwynne; that of the daughters, those three to whom the appointments were made while of full age were residing with their father; that Mrs. Gibert, another of them, was married and residing abroad, and two of the others (the present plaintiffs) were then infants; that before October 1832, both Colonel Gwynne and J. Brundrett applied to the three daughters and requested them to concur in the arrangement, and that they agreed to do so, but that Charlotte Elizabeth, another of the daughters, refused to concur therein, and in consequence of this refusal the appointment was made to the three, and not to the four as was intended. The bill then alleged that J. Brundrett obtained 423*l*. out of the monies arising from the surrender of the bonuses for his own use; that the appointment made by the deed-poll was made in consideration of and for giving effect to the arrangement and bargain before mentioned between Colonel Gwynne and the appointees, and for the benefit and relief of Colonel Gwynne; that it was void in equity; that Brundrett was a party to and well acquainted with all the circumstances connected with such arrangement and bargain, and the appointment being void the authority given to him was invalid as against the plaintiffs, the infants, and the other daughters, except the appointees, and the surrender of the bonuses was, as regarded the other daughter and the plaintiffs, a breach of trust; that by the surrender they were respectively deprived of their shares in such bonuses, which they would otherwise have been entitled to receive upon the decease of Colonel Gwynne; and the bill charged that the validity of the appointment was not in any manner brought in question in the suit and proceedings above mentioned, and that the facts were not put in issue, and that the appointment throughout the proceedings was assumed to be a valid appointment; that these proceedings were irregular in respect of the infancy of the present plaintiffs; that the estates charged with the premiums of the policies were of ample value to answer the premiums, and that J. Brundrett, under the trusts of the term, might, from time to time, have raised the money necessary to provide for the payment of the same.

The defendants, the executors of J. Brundrett, by their answer stated that J. Brundrett and his partners, from the year 1812 to 1833, paid such of the premiums from time to time payable upon and kept up the policies so effected with the Equitable, Albion, and Pelican companies as were not paid by Thomas Lowten the uncle and Thomas Lowten the nephew, and Colonel Gwynne personally, out of monies belonging to himself and his partners; that Jonathan Brundrett did not execute the deeds of August and October 1821, and their belief that he was not aware of the existence of the deed of October 1821 until the 26th of October 1832, or of the assignment of the policies mentioned in the deed of August 1821 having been made, and that he being thus ignorant of the imperfectly executed deed of the 1st of October 1821, never accepted or acted in the trusts of the indentures or either of them, and that he was not aware of or had forgotten the existence of the powers vested in him under the deed of the 28th of August 1821 until the 17th of November 1831, when they said he was informed of them in the particular manner mentioned in the answer. [The answer then set forth a very long correspondence between J. Brundrett and Colonel Gwynne, and various other circumstances which, in the view the Court took of this case, it is not necessary to state]; that the appointment of the 14th of December 1832, of the money secured by the two Equitable policies in favour of the plaintiffs Emma Sophia Harrison and Georgiana Caroline Gwynne, and of Charlotte Elizabeth Gwynne, and Julia Arabella Gwynne, was made in consideration of the appointment of the 3rd of October 1832, and in compensation for the shares in the bonuses to which the plaintiffs E. S. Harrison and G. C. Gwynne and C. E. Gwynne and J. A. Gwynne, or any or either of them, were or might become entitled, and that they had had and taken the benefit of the appointment of the 14th of December 1832, and were therefore bound to give effect if necessary to, or to make compensation for the failure of, the appointment of the 3rd of October 1832; that the suit in this court having been adopted and acted upon by the plaintiffs and the trustees appointed under the decree, it was no longer competent for the plaintiffs to bring the same in question; or if competent to the plaintiffs to question such proceedings, that the present suit was not properly constituted for that purpose; that the plaintiffs E. S. Harrison and G. C. Gwynne had, with full knowledge or means of knowing the facts, adopted the benefit of and connected with the appointments of the 3rd of October and the 14th of December 1832.

The only material evidence in the cause consisted of the deeds, documents, and letters.

Mr. Swanston, Mr. J. Parker, (now Sir James Parker, V.C.) and Mr. Haddan appeared for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Willcock, and Mr. Prendergast, for the representatives of J. Brundrett.

Mr. Chandless and Mr. Peachy, for the other defendants.

Jan. 19, 1852. — TURNER, V.C., after stating as above the facts of the case, said — This case may, I think, conveniently be considered in three points of view: first, whether J. Brundrett ever became liable to the plaintiffs in respect of the matters in question in this suit; secondly, if he did become so liable, whether this suit is properly constituted for enforcing such liability; and, thirdly, if it be not properly constituted whether the bill should be dismissed without reservation; and if it be properly constituted whether there should be an absolute decree against the defendants, or what directions should be given for the purpose of working out the justice of the case.

Upon the first point, the original liability of Mr. Brundrett, I am of opinion that he was liable to the plaintiffs in respect of these matters. I think it clear that he accepted the trusts of these policies, and equally clear that the appointment of the 3rd of October 1832 was a fraud upon the power. And I think that Jonathan Brundrett must be taken to have known it to be so at the time when he surrendered the policies, and paid over the monies which he received upon the surrender. After the cases which have been decided upon the subject of fraudulent appointments, it is hardly necessary, I think, to say anything on the subject of this appointment being a fraud upon the power; but it may be observed that its immediate object was to relieve the father, and that its necessary consequence would be to relax the diligence of the trustee in enforcing the rights of the children against him. And it may be useful further to observe that, where a trustee, having good reason to doubt the validity of an appointment, thinks proper to act upon it, he must, in my opinion, be affected by the consequences which follow upon the act; and in the present case we have the monies which were paid over to the appointees immediately lent to the father upon a mortgage of his life interest only. That Jonathan Brundrett knew the appointment to be fraudulent I think sufficiently appears from the advice which he received. The transaction was attempted to be justified upon the ground of the necessity of the case, but I cannot hold it to be justified upon that ground. I take the rule of the Court upon that point to be perfectly clear. A trustee is not in all cases to be made liable upon the mere ground of his having deviated from the strict letter of his trust. The deviation may be necessary or may be beneficial, but when a trustee ventures to deviate from the letter of his trust, he does so under the obligation, and at the peril, of afterwards satisfying the Court that the deviation was necessary or beneficial. The defendants have given no evidence to satisfy me that it was either necessary or beneficial that this appointment should be made.

If such a transaction as the present has been excused in any case, I think it would not have been excused in this. There was a suit actually pending in this Court at the time when the transaction took place, and in that suit the very appointment in question was brought forward, and yet the facts connected with the appointment were not put upon the record, but a decree was taken for paying over the fund to the appointees, the Court being kept in ignorance of those facts. If, therefore, the case depended upon the first point, the original liability of Mr. Brundrett, I should have no hesitation in making a decree in favour of the plaintiffs.

But upon the second point, my opinion is that this suit is not properly constituted to enforce the liability. Looking at the deeds of October and December 1832, the calculation made with reference to the deed of December 1832, and the letters which passed about that period, I am of opinion that the deed of the 14th of December 1832 is directly and immediately connected with the deed of the 3rd of October 1832, and that the former deed is in truth no more than a cover for the latter deed, and never would have existed at all if the latter had not been executed; and yet this bill is strictly confined to the bonuses appointed by the deed of October, and does not bring the deed of December within the power of the Court. What the plaintiffs are in effect seeking by this bill is to undo part of one entire transaction, and I think it is neither consistent with the practice of the Court or the justice of the case so to deal with the transaction. The practice of the Court is not to undo transactions in part: and that it is not consistent with the justice of the present case to do so is obvious; for the effect, if not in some manner corrected, would be to leave each of the daughters who are plaintiffs in this suit in possession of 1,250*l.* received under the appointment of December, part of the fraudulent appointment, and at the same time to give them their shares of the bonuses for default of appointment by reason of the same fraud. It may be said that this might be set right by compelling the plaintiffs to account for the 1,250*l.* already received. But supposing it to be so, which I doubt, still justice could not be done; for the other daughters who took under the appointment of December, could not, I think, be compelled upon this bill to refund what they have received. I think that upon this objection being pointed out, as it was though not very clearly, by the answer, it was incumbent on the plaintiffs to have amended, and put the whole transaction under the power of the Court, and that they having neglected to do so, this suit is irregularly constituted, and the bill must therefore be dismissed.

The question then to be considered is, whether it should be dismissed without reservation, and I am of opinion that it should not, but that it should be dismissed without prejudice to a new bill, for I think that the plaintiffs have shewn that they had a right against Brundrett, and I think that something might possibly have been coming to them if their case had been properly framed. I desire, however, most distinctly not to be understood to give the least encouragement to the filing of a new bill, for I do not think that under any circumstances I could have made a decree in this case without directing very stringent inquiries as to the extent of the knowledge of the plaintiffs at the time when they received the monies which were actually appointed to them, and I have a strong suspicion what the result of those inquiries would have been; for although it may well be, as was put by the plaintiffs in argument, that on an appointment to A. and B. by one instrument, and à fortiori by different instruments, the appointment to A. may be good and the appointment to B. bad, it may equally well be that A. and B. may agree between themselves that the bad appointment shall not be disturbed, and I have not much doubt what the effect of such an agreement would be if it were afterwards sought to charge the trustee. It is not necessary, however, to decide anything on that point. I dismiss the bill upon the ground that under the circumstances of this case the appointments of October and December 1832 must stand or fall together, and that this bill does not enable them so to be dealt with.

As to the costs, I am of opinion that they must be paid by the plaintiffs. I see no ground for saddling the estate of Brundrett with costs which arise, as I think, from the mistake of the plaintiffs. I shall, therefore, dismiss the bill with costs, adding the clause without prejudice to filing a new bill.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } CLEMENTS v. BOWES.
Jan. 14.

Public Company—Bill for an Account—Demurrer—Parties—Financial Committee.

The plaintiff filed a bill on behalf of himself and the other shareholders in a company against the persons forming the financial committee, praying that an account might be taken of all monies received by the defendants in respect of deposits upon shares, and an account of the costs and expenses incurred by them, and that the amount due to the plaintiff and the other shareholders, after giving credit for the monies paid by them, might be distributed rateably amongst the shareholders:—Held, upon demurrer to the bill, that the fact of the defendants having already rendered an account did not preclude the plaintiff from having an account taken under the authority of the Court: and that the remedy provided for these cases by the Winding-up Acts did not take away the plaintiff's right to file a bill for a similar purpose.

Held, also, on the demurrer as to parties, that as all the shareholders had a common interest the plaintiff might without their consent file a bill on behalf of all, and that as the financial committee were the only persons alleged by the bill to have had power over the funds of the company, it was not necessary to make any other persons who might have acted as directors parties to the suit.

This bill was filed by Benjamin Clements, on behalf of himself and all other the shareholders in a projected company formed, in the year 1845, for making a railway from the town of Hull to the city of Lincoln, to be called the Hull and Lincoln Direct Railway Company, and the defendants were certain shareholders in the company who were appointed the finance committee.

The bill stated that the projected railway or scheme was provisionally registered; that the plaintiff made a formal application for an allotment of 500 shares in the said railway company, and paid 1,050*l.*, being the amount of deposit on such share at 2*l.* 2*s.* per share; that the plaintiff, instead of having an allotment of such shares in the company, received scrip certificates for the said 500 shares; that he subsequently purchased through his broker 115 additional shares; that an act of parliament was applied for, and the sum of 26,250*l.* was, on the 4th of February 1846, deposited with the Accountant General, in conformity with the standing orders of the House of Commons, and leave was given to bring in a bill for incorporating the said company, but that the bill was thrown out in the Committee, and the projected scheme thereupon fell to the ground; that the five defendants J. Bowes, H. S. Bright, J. Hall, J. Eggington, and W. G. Todd were appointed the finance committee of the said proposed company, and all the deposits which were made in respect of shares were placed under the exclusive controul and at the disposal of the defendants, who accepted, and acted in the controul and disposition thereof; and they, the said defendants, were authorized and empowered to make out and settle and adjust the accounts thereof, they being answerable and accountable to the shareholders of the said company, and the said defendants became and were liable and accountable to all the shareholders for all receipts and payments made to or by or in the name of the said company; that an advertisement was issued by the defendants offering to the plaintiff and the other shareholders a return of 17*s.* 6*d.* per share in respect of the balance of deposit; that the plaintiff declined to accept the proposed payment of 17*s.* 6*d.* per share; that at the request of the plaintiff an account of the receipts and expenditure of the finance committee was furnished to him by their secretary; that such account being very vague and unsatisfactory the plaintiff considered himself justified in demanding a return of the whole of the deposit paid upon his shares, but finding that he was unable to obtain such repayment he commenced an action at law in November 1846 against the defendant W. G. Todd, who had been one of the most active members of the finance committee; that the plaintiff was unsuccessful in such action, but he had reason to believe that the account rendered to him by the finance committee was erroneous and insufficient.

The bill also stated that some time after the plaintiff had become possessed of the said scrip certificates, being in want of a temporary loan he had pledged 340 of such certificates with two persons for the purpose of raising money thereon, and that the persons with whom they were pledged had accepted the 17*s.* 6*d.* per share upon their certificates, and that by this means the defendants became possessed of 340 of the plaintiff's certificates. The plaintiff charged that, under the circumstances, he was entitled to receive from the defendants the difference between the amount paid by them in respect of the said 340 shares, and the sum paid by the plaintiffs in respect of the deposit thereon. The bill prayed that an account might be taken by and under the direction of the Court of all monies which had been received by or come under the controul and disposition of the defendants, or any or either of them, in respect of deposits paid upon shares applied for or agreed to be taken in the said projected company, and an account of the capital of the said company, and also an account of the payments, costs and expenses properly made and incurred or sustained by the defendants in the management of the affairs of the said projected company, and of the residue or surplus remaining after allowing such payments, costs, charges and expenses; and that such balance or surplus might be apportioned to the shares in respect of which the deposits were so paid; and that the amount due to the plaintiff and all other the shareholders on behalf of whom the plaintiff sued respectively, after giving credit for the amounts already received by them respectively (including the sum of 398*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* for which the plaintiff thereby consented to give credit) might be paid to the plaintiff and such other shareholders as aforesaid by the defendants; and that for the purposes aforesaid all proper accounts might be taken, and all proper directions given; and that the other shareholders on whose behalf the plaintiff sued might be ascertained.

To this bill a demurrer was put in for want of equity and for want of parties.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Miller, in support of the demurrer, contended that a sufficient account had already been rendered to the plaintiff of the receipts and payments by the financial committee: that the plaintiff ought to have proceeded under the Winding-up Act; and that the legislature having provided an express remedy for obtaining an account of the affairs of a joint-stock company, the plaintiff could not be allowed to file a bill for the same object. The case of Parbury v. Chadwick (1) was cited in support of this argument. It was also contended that all the shareholders who had received back any portion of the money paid by them upon their shares ought to have been made parties, and that the directors of the company ought to have been made parties.

Mr. Willcock and Mr. White, for the bill, contended that the fact of an account having been given by the defendants did not preclude the plaintiff from coming to this Court, for the purpose of having the accounts taken by means of the machinery of a court of equity; that there was nothing contained in the Winding-up Acts to prevent a plaintiff from coming to this Court by a bill to obtain redress, if he considered that such a proceeding was the best calculated to secure his rights; and that the bill was properly framed as regarded parties. It was well established that a plaintiff might file a bill on behalf of himself and all the other shareholders when they were too numerous to be all made parties, and the persons here suggested as being necessary parties were interested as much as the plaintiff in having the accounts properly taken. It was also submitted that as no other body of persons than the financial committee were alleged by the bill to have had the disposal of the funds of the company, it was not necessary to make any other directors (in case there were any) parties to this bill.

Lovell v. Andrew, 15 Sim. 581.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I think this demurrer must be overruled. The demurrer is for want of equity generally, and also for want of parties. The bill is filed by Benjamin Clements on behalf of himself and all the shareholders other than and except the defendants, and the defendants are certain shareholders in the company who appear to have been appointed a finance committee. The bill states the projection of the company, and states the various circumstances antecedent to an application to parliament, and then it states that an act was applied for on behalf of the projected company, and a sum of 26,250*l.* was deposited with the Accountant

General, in conformity with the standing orders, and leave was given to bring in the bill. That the bill was afterwards thrown out in the House of Commons, and the scheme fell to the ground. Then it states that the defendants were appointed the finance committee of the proposed company, and all the deposits which were made in respect of shares were placed under the exclusive controul and at the disposal of the defendants, who accepted and acted in the controul and disposition thereof; and they were authorized and empowered to make out and settle and adjust the accounts thereof, they being answerable and accountable to the shareholders of the said company, and the said defendants became and are liable and accountable to all the shareholders for all receipts and payments made to or by or in the name of the said company. That is a distinct allegation that all the deposits of the shareholders were placed under the exclusive controul of the defendants. Then the bill states the plaintiff's demand for a return of his whole deposit, and a correspondence is set out in which the defendants offer to return the sum of 17*s.* 6*d.* per share; and it states that an account was rendered to him to shew in what way the finance committee had dealt with the money placed in their hands. It also states that an action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant W. G. Todd, and it contains various other charges and prays—not a dissolution and winding up of a partnership, and that the accounts might be taken—but it prays—[His Honour here read the prayer of the bill set forth above].

Now, the bill merely asks that the defendants, who are allowed to have received all the deposits in respect of the shares, may account for what they have received, and that, after applying such monies in satisfaction of all payments, costs, and expenses, the surplus may be divided not among any given class of the shareholders, but generally among them all, including not only those who have received their 17*s.* 6*d.*, but the rest also.

The plaintiff states that in respect of some of his shares the 17*s.* 6*d.* had been received by those in whose hands the shares were, but as to the other shares he had refused to receive the money.

The demurrer is argued on these grounds: first, that a sufficient account has been already rendered, and that the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to sue the defendants solely in respect of that matter. Now, whether the account was satisfactory or not, the rendering of the account could not prevent a person from filing a bill to have an account taken under the authority of the Court. It is not sufficient that an account should be rendered upon the representation of the defendants, but the plaintiff has a right to have an account taken under the machinery which this Court provides: therefore rendering an account is not sufficient.

The second ground of demurrer is, that the plaintiff ought to proceed under the Winding-up Act, and that the legislature having provided the method of winding up, and dealing with the affairs of an inchoate railway company of this kind, as well as others, this Court ought to refuse to a party the right of coming here to have the account taken. The case of Parbury v. Chadwick was cited, in which the late Master of the Rolls stayed proceedings in a suit on motion where a bill had been filed after an order made for winding up a company, and where, if I apprehend rightly the nature of the suit, it sought relief of the same nature as that provided by the Winding up Act; at all events, the bill in that case was filed after the order for winding-up had been obtained. Without stating whether, if there had been an existing order to wind up, and then this bill had been filed, I should have considered that a sufficient ground for allowing the demurrer, it appears to me that it cannot be a good ground of demurrer to say, "You shall not have your remedy by bill, because you may apply for a winding-up order, and it may be the Court will grant it." I am far from taking it for granted that the Court would, in this case, make such an order. I am not satisfied about that, though I do not say it would not grant it. I express no opinion upon that; but from my experience in these matters I have been led to this conclusion, that great as is the difficulty in proceeding under a suit for this sort of purpose, the mischief of applying the Winding-up Act to such a case is greater; but the real question is, whether the legislature, in providing a remedy under this act, has excluded the remedy under a bill for making certain individuals who have received money in respect of a number of shares, account for the money, after allowing for all costs, charges, and expenses, and for distributing such surplus amongst all the shareholders, pro rata, according to the number of their shares. To oust the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in such a case, the legislature should have so declared it. It is plain where the court of equity has jurisdiction in such a case, an act giving further relief does not by that oust the title of the court of equity, without express terms being used to put an end to the jurisdiction, which is inherent in the Court. It appears to me, therefore, that the second ground of demurrer is not sustainable.

As to the demurrer for want of parties, the demurrer itself represents two difficulties as existing on the bill with respect to parties, and is framed in this way: "and for further cause of demurrer, the defendants say that it appears by the plaintiff's own shewing that the scrip or share holders in the bill mentioned, who had not received the sum of 17s. 6d. per share on their respective shares on scrip in the said bill mentioned, and also the said several share or scrip holders of the said projected company, and the persons who entered into a subscription for the purpose of forming the said company, other than these defendants, are necessary parties to the said bill, and yet the plaintiff hath not made such several persons, or any or either of them, parties to the bill." Now, the persons here represented as necessary parties are, first, those shareholders who had not received back the 17s. 6d. per share (the plaintiff being one who has not received back that sum in respect of some of his shares, though he did with respect of others which he had pledged); and secondly, those who had received back that sum. The demurrer was, in fact, intended to include all the shareholders. As to those who did not receive that sum, the question comes to this, because the principle is clear. The question is, whether that class of shareholders who did not receive the money have a different interest from those who did receive back the amount; that is, the same interest in the relief asked by the bill. Now the relief is for the common interest of all (if for any); I am far from thinking this bill is for the interest of these parties; but if the plaintiff chooses to enter into such a speculation as the filing of this bill, he has a right to do so. The relief asked is, to make five individuals who are alleged to have received all the monies paid by way of deposit, account for what they have received, and that whatever balance is found to be in their possession after payment of the proper expenses may be divided not amongst any class, but amongst all pro rata, that is, the 17s. 6d. to those who have not received it, and then dividing the rest among them all. I cannot see that there is any difference of interest between the one class or the other as far as the relief sought by the bill, which is the real question. If a person files a bill for himself and others, there may be some who would not like the bill to be filed, but if, on the face of the transaction, it be for the common interest of all, it is no more for the interest of one than the other. It is clearly for the interest of all that the relief here asked should be granted. It appears to me there is no ground for saying any particular class should be represented by the members of that particular class. Then, the other class mentioned is the whole of the shareholders. The answer to that is, the bill states, and it is, therefore, admitted by the demurrer, that the whole of the shareholders being upwards of two hundred are so numerous, that it is impossible to make them all parties; and as to that point in the case, it is clear upon the authorities that the plaintiff is not obliged to make them all parties.

Now, these are the classes of shareholders who, on the face of the demurrer itself, are said to be necessary parties; but it is also argued at the bar, that there is another class of persons not suggested by the demurrer who ought to be made parties, namely, those who stood in the position of managers and carried on the affairs of the concern before the finance committee were appointed; but on the face of the bill there is nothing to shew when they were appointed or why they were appointed the finance committee, and with one single exception in the bill, there is no allusion to any other body of directors. No doubt it may be supposed there were other directors, but the bill being silent as to such other directors, and no mention being made of any other body of directors than the finance committee, how am I to say that there were other persons acting as directors? The exception I allude to is the expression contained in a letter which was addressed to the plaintiff, and in which mention is made that the directors would do so and so; but that is not an allegation of the fact that there were other directors. The bill does not allege that there were; but this gentleman in writing an answer says that the directors may do so and so. Can I then say, without any further evidence, and taking the bill as I must do to be true, that there was a body of directors different from the finance committee? Might not the writer of that letter have meant the finance committee when he used the term directors? No doubt advantage may be taken of this fact in another mode, but I cannot assume that there was a body of directors who ought to have been made parties to the suit. But suppose there was such a body of directors, what interest have they different from the other shareholders in respect of what is asked by this bill? If the bill sought to impeach the management of the directors in imputing to them any improper conduct, and to have the whole dealing and transactions of the concern wound up, then it might be necessary to have them parties; but that is not so, and I must assume all that is stated here to be true, whether the truth has been cut out of the bill by the amendments as suggested by counsel or not; and as regards the relief asked here, there is nothing to shew that there is any ground for supposing such directors must have a different interest from the shareholders generally.

I have now considered all the different grounds raised in support of the demurrer, and my opinion is that the demurrer must be overruled. It is unnecessary to say that I do not express any opinion about the amendments to the bill. That is not my concern.

Heir—Costs—Re-sale of Estate agreed to be sold.

A. contracted to sell an estate to B. Before the completion of the purchase B. died intestate. A bill was filed by A. against the heir and administrator of B, praying for a re-sale of the estate and for the application of the purchase-money to the payment of A.'s expenses and the sum agreed to be paid by B:—Held, that A. was bound to pay the costs of the heir, with liberty to add them to his own.

Mr. Henson contracted to buy an estate of Mr. Popple, and paid him a deposit of 100*l*. Before the sale was completed Mr. Henson died intestate, leaving an infant heir, and administration was taken out to his estate by his widow.

This was a claim filed by Mr. Popple against the heir and administratrix of Mr. Henson. The relief prayed was that the estate might be re-sold, and that the money produced by such re-sale, together with the deposit, might be applied in payment to the plaintiff of the purchase-money, and interest, and his expenses.

Mr. Cairns, for the plaintiff, referred to The Duke of Beaufort v. Phillips (1).

Mr. D. Chambers, for the administratrix.

Mr. Briggs, for the heir, asked for his costs.

Mr. Cairns, for the plaintiff, contended that the plaintiff was not bound to pay the heir his costs.

PARKER, V.C. said, that the infant heir was a necessary party to the suit, and had no means of getting his costs from the administratrix, and that the plaintiff must pay him his costs, with liberty to add them to his own. The decree would be for a re-sale, and that the money arising thereby and the deposit should be applied to the payment of the plaintiff's purchase-money, interest, costs, and the expenses of the sale, and that the surplus, if any, should go to the heir.

Claim—Parties—Executors in the Mauritius.

A testator dying in the Mauritius appointed executors in that country, and left the residue of his property to his mother in England. The executors in the Mauritius transmitted the residue to England, but the mother of the testator having died, the amount was paid to her executors, who paid all her debts exceeding the amount to which she became entitled from the testator's estate. The plaintiff was a creditor of the testator, and filed a claim to obtain payment of his debt, or to have the testator's estate administered:—Held, that the Mauritius executors were improperly made parties to this claim, and that the plaintiff could not have relief against the executors of the testator's mother without having a legal personal representative of the testator constituted in this country, a party to the suit.

This was a claim filed by Edwin and James Silver, and it stated that W. H. Lovewell, late of Whittey, in the county of Berks, but who died at Port Louis in the Mauritius, captain in the merchant service, was at the time of his death, and that his estate still was, indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of 81*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.* for goods. That the said W. H. Lovewell died in the year 1848, and the defendants Robert Stein and William Dick, who resided in the Mauritius, were his executors, and the said debt had not been paid to the plaintiffs. That the said W. H. Lovewell, by his will, gave all his personal estate and effects to his mother Catherine Lovewell, deceased, and the defendants got in and converted into money all such personal estate and effects, and paid some of the debts of the said W. H. Lovewell in full, and remitted the sum of 74*l.* 15*s.*, being the balance of that estate, to Messrs. Scott, Bell & Co., merchants of London, in order that the same might be paid by them to Catherine Lovewell, and that the defendants R. Stein and W. Dick did not retain in their hands any assets of W. H. Lovewell to answer the debt of the plaintiffs. That the said Catherine Lovewell died in January 1849, before the sum of 74*l.* 15*s.* arrived in England; and the defendant George Arnold was the duly constituted legal personal representative of Catherine Lovewell, and that Messrs. Scott, Bell & Co. handed over the said sum of 74*l.* 15*s.* to George Arnold as such personal representative. The plaintiffs, therefore, claimed to be paid the said debt of 81*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.* with their costs of this suit, and in default thereof they claimed to have the personal estate of W. H. Lovewell administered in this court on behalf of themselves and all other the unsatisfied creditors of W. H. Lovewell, and to have the said sum of 74*l.* 15*s.* refunded by the said George Arnold; and for these purposes that all proper directions might be given and accounts taken.

It appeared from the affidavits filed in support of the claim, that upon the death of W. H. Lovewell, his estate was wound up by the defendants, his executors in the Mauritius, under the superintendence of the Curator of intestates' effects, acting on behalf of absent interested parties. The debts of which Captain Lovewell gave notice were paid, and the balance of 74*l.* 15*s.* was sent to England for Mrs. Lovewell, Captain Lovewell's mother, as his sole legatee. It also appeared that the defendants, Messrs. Stein & Dick, were still residing in the Mauritius, and that Arnold upon receiving the 74*l.* 15*s.* had discharged all claims upon the estate of Mrs. Lovewell, and exceeding the said sum of 74*l.* 15*s.*

A motion was made in February 1851 on behalf of the plaintiffs, that they might be at liberty to serve a writ of summons for the defendants, Stein and Dick, to appear and shew cause against this claim. An order was accordingly made, and Messrs. Stein & Dick now appeared by counsel.

Mr. Nalder appeared in support of the claim.

Mr. Haig, for the defendants, Stein and Dick, submitted that the claim as against them ought to be dismissed with costs. These defendants were executors, constituted according to the law of the Mauritius, and had administered the estate in that country. They could not be sued in this country, nor could the plaintiffs proceed with their claim in England without having a legal personal representative of Captain Lovewell constituted in this country.

Tyler v. Bell, 1 Keen, 826; s. c. 2 Myl. & Cr. 89; 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 169.

Story's Conflict of Laws, s. 513.

Bond v. Graham, 1 Hare, 482; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 306.

Cleland v. Cleland, Prec. in Ch. 63.

Mr. Nevinnson appeared for another defendant.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—It is clear in my opinion that there must be a legal personal representative properly constituted in England in order to administer this estate. That appears from what was done in some of the cases cited. Then, independently of any authority, I should be of opinion that to administer the estate in England of a person dying in the Mauritius and to whose property administration was taken out in that country, there must be a legal personal representative in this country. It is true that an administrator de son tort may be made to account in some cases; but being of opinion that it is necessary to have a legal personal representative constituted in England, the plaintiffs ask for leave to amend the claim. To this request two parties object: the legal personal representatives of the testator constituted at the Mauritius, and Dr. Arnold, who is in this country, and received the money remitted by the Mauritius executors to the residuary legatee, but who died before the fund was paid. In support of the objection, the case of Tyler v. Bell was referred to. There it was a demurrer for want of equity and parties. The Court, without determining the question upon the demurrer for want of equity, allowed the demurrer for want of parties, and then decided that the plaintiff should not have leave to amend, because he could in no case have relief against the demurring parties.

The question, therefore, is if there was before the Court a legal personal representative constituted in this country, could the plaintiffs have any relief against those persons who are on the record? As to the relief against the parties you must look at the prayer of the claim. It asks payment of the debt alleged to be due to the plaintiffs with the costs, or, in the alternative, it claims to have the personal estate of the testator administered and to have the 74*l.* refunded by Dr. Arnold. So what is asked is administration of the estate for the benefit of all the creditors, and a refunding by Dr. Arnold of the 74*l.*, not asking that the Mauritius executors should refund, but that Dr. Arnold should refund. The question then is, whether the plaintiffs, creditors in this country of the testator, could either with or without a legal personal representative in England seeking to administer the estate against such a person make foreign executors parties to that suit. I think not. They are not the persons against whom the estate is to be administered, and I think the claim ought to be dismissed as against them. The case is, however, different with respect to Dr. Arnold. Part of the relief asked is, that he may refund the money he has received. If there were here a legal personal representative constituted in this country, Dr. Arnold might be a proper party, because part of the assets have come into his hands on the supposition that it was a clear residue belonging to the legatee. I think the order I should make should be to dismiss the claim as against the Mauritius executors, and the plaintiffs to have leave to amend their claim to bring before the Court a legal personal representative constituted in this country. In making this order, I am quite certain that I am doing what is most for the benefit of the plaintiffs themselves, and that it will save them considerable expense.

Payment of Money out of Court—Administration, whether Diocesan or Prerogative—Trustees Relief Act.

A. was entitled to a share of the produce of certain chattels and of no other property. She was domiciled in the diocese of L, and the chattels were in the same diocese. A. died intestate. The chattels were sold by the trustee, and A.'s share of the money was paid into court under the provisions of the statute 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96. After this, letters of administration to A.'s estate were taken out in the diocese of L, and on an application for the payment of this fund out of court to the administrator, the same was ordered, the Court holding that a prerogative administration was not necessary.

This was a petition for the payment of a sum of money out of court, which had been paid in under the provisions of the Trustees Relief Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96. It appeared that Robert Raine by his will, dated in 1828, bequeathed his tenant right in and to his farm and lands situate at Elmsthorpe, in Leicestershire, and all his personal estate of what kind soever, to trustees named Oldacres and Singleton, upon trust during the minority of his children, or so long as they should think fit, with the consent of his landlady, to occupy and manage the said farm for their benefit, and when his youngest child should attain the age of twenty-one years, or at the determination of his then present tenancy, convert his personal estate into money, and invest the money arising therefrom and apply the dividends and interest thereof for the maintenance, education and support of his children, and then upon trust to divide the capital among his six children therein named, giving to each of his sons 50*l.* more than his daughters. The testator appointed the same persons executors of his will. He died in 1829, and subsequently his daughter Elizabeth married W. Spencer. She died in March 1845, leaving her husband surviving. In 1845 W. Spencer died, having by his will appointed John S. Spencer and others his executors. J. S. Spencer alone proved the will in the Archdeaconry Court of Leicester. On the 21st of May 1848 the youngest child of the testator, R. Raine, attained the age of twenty-one, whereupon the proceeds of the personal property of the testator, which had been sold since the deaths of Mr. and Mrs. Spencer, were divided among his children by Mr. Singleton, who was the surviving trustee and executor, excepting the share of Mrs. Elizabeth Spencer, amounting to 396*l.*, which as there was then no personal representative of her who could receive and give a receipt for the same, he paid into court under the before-mentioned statute. After the money was so paid in, J. S. Spencer obtained letters of administration of the estate and effects of Mrs. Elizabeth Spencer from the Archdeaconry Court of Leicester. This petition was then presented, which, after stating the foregoing circumstances, prayed the payment out of court of the 396*l.* to him as her administrator and legal personal representative.

Mr. Bird, in support of the application, read affidavits shewing that Mrs. E. Spencer and her husband were at the respective times of their deaths domiciled within the limits of the Archdeaconry of Leicester, and that neither Mrs. Spencer nor her husband in her right were or was possessed of any property, except her interest in the chattels and stock existing at the time of their respective deaths in specie upon the testator's farm at Elmsthorpe. The learned counsel stated that upon the petition coming on to be heard before Vice Chancellor Turner he declined to make an order upon the Archdeaconry letters of administration, but required a prerogative representation to be produced. His Honour observed that the practice had prevailed of requiring the production of a prerogative representation before paying a fund out of court, and that to change such practice might give rise to an expensive contest in each case upon the question whether there were bona notabilia or not. His Honour requested that, as a similar question had lately been under the consideration of this Court, in the case of In re Knowles (1), the petition might be brought under their Lordships' consideration. It was submitted that the order asked should be made, as upon the facts appearing upon the petition there could be no doubt that the Archdeaconry letters would have formed a sufficient title to the fund at the death of Mrs. Spencer, when the property was existing in specie on the farm at Elmsthorpe within the Archdeaconry. That being so, the fact that the property had afterwards been realized and removed into another diocese could make no difference. Wherever a prerogative probate had been held to be necessary, there at the time of the death part of the assets had been situate in the diocese, and part invested in the bank—Scarth v. the Bishop of London (2).

[LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH (3).—That does not require the support of authority. You cannot act upon a diocesan probate where a prerogative representation is necessary. To determine the proper court of administration, you must look at the circumstances at the time of the death of the intestate. The title of the Ordinary is complete at the death of the party in the diocese. Suppose after the death of a party in the diocese, having no goods out of it, some stranger were to remove those goods into another diocese, could not an action be brought and maintained on a diocesan probate? I do not think it would be found that a prerogative probate would be rendered necessary because somebody had rightfully or wrongfully removed the goods out of the diocese after the death of the intestate. In ancient times the question as to the right of the Ordinary depended upon whether, at the death of the intestate, there were or not bona notabilia out of the diocese. Following up that principle, if part of his assets, 10,000*l.*, or any other sum, be carried out of the diocese and brought into the Bank of England, in an action for that money, I think a Court would be bound to say that the diocesan letters were correct. All principle seems to me to favour the present application, and I confess I never have been able to account for the rule requiring prerogative letters or prerogative probate. It is said this has been required for security; but if a diocesan probate be proper, why should a party be put to the expense of a prerogative probate, which, if not void, is always voidable? It seems to me inconsistent to put a party to the expense of a voidable instrument.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE. — My impression is, that in the case of In re Knowles, Lord Cranworth intimated that his opinion would have extended to a case like this. It is my inclination of opinion also. A change of place of the goods after the death can make no difference as to the power and right of the Ordinary. It seems to me, and I may say to my learned Brother, that, carrying the matter back to its first principles, the grant in this case ought to be held to be sufficient, unless, indeed, there has been an inveterate practice the other way.]

Mr. Bird.—The case of Druce v. Denison (4), first heard before the late Vice Chancellor of England, who declined to make an order, which subsequently the Lord Chancellor Lord Cottenham made, is importantly in point; for the reason assigned by Sir Lancelot Shadwell was, that it was the practice of the Court not to order stock to be transferred to a personal representa-

(1) Ante, p. 142.

(2) 1 Hagg. Ecc. Rep. 625, 636.

(3) The present case was mentioned to the Court rather for the purpose of eliciting the opinions of the learned Judges than for their determination: Their Lordships' observations were made in disconnected sentences during Mr. Bird's statement; but they have been thrown together in the above report for convenience and saving of space.

(4) 15 Sim. 356; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 149.

tive of a testator or intestate, unless he had been invested with that character by the Prerogative Court. The Lord Chancellor, however, directed the Accountant General to act upon the diocesan letters of administration, and the fund was accordingly transferred.

[LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—If I remember rightly, what Lord Cottenham decided there was, that as a consistorial probate is not necessarily bad, the Court presumes it to be proper until the contrary is shewn.]

Mr. Bird.—He so decided after consultation with Sir J. Nichol, the Judge of the Ecclesiastical Court.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE. — Does that attach to the particular case of 3*l.* per cents. or does it apply to all personalty? I take the question in Druce v. Denison to have been a question of the place of the property as between the diocese of London and the province of Canterbury. The Bank of England and the seat of Government are both within the diocese of London, and necessarily within the province of Canterbury; and if stock in the funds have a place (if, indeed, it can be said to have any place) within the diocese of London, and there be no other property of the party, probate would as properly belong to the diocese of London as to the province of Canterbury. That seems to have been the point in Druce v. Denison, but that does not touch the question of any other diocesan probate than a London probate. Nobody, for instance, could say the 3*l.* per cent. consols are within the diocese of Carlisle. The decision in Druce v. Denison appears to have been this:—If a testator domiciled in London die possessed of stock standing at the Bank in his name, and a London probate is taken out, that will do in the absence of proof that there are goods also of the deceased in another diocese, inasmuch as stock (so far as it can be said to have a locality) may be said to be situate in the diocese of London. That is what seems to have been decided in Druce v. Denison. It also decided what perhaps scarcely needed a decision, that it is not necessary to inquire, as a matter of course, whether a man dies possessed of goods in two dioceses.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—You have our authority, Mr. Bird, to state to the Vice Chancellor Turner that we have given the subject our attention upon your statement of the facts, and that having also had occasion to consider a similar question in the late case of In re Knowles, we have come to the conclusion that the Archdeaconry letters were proper at the time of the death of Mrs. Spencer, and that being so, they remain proper for all time, notwithstanding any subsequent change in the locality of the assets (5).

Trustee Act, 1850, Section 19.—Mortgage—"Re-conveyance."

A mortgagee in fee died intestate as to the mortgaged premises, but appointed an executor. His heir-at-law could not be found or was unknown. The mortgage money was still due, and was not intended to be paid off, but the executor, wishing to make a transfer of the mortgage, petitioned, under the 19th section of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, the Trustee Act, 1850, for an order vesting the mortgaged premises in him:—Held, that the Court has jurisdiction upon such a petition to make the order, and that the legislature did not mean to confine its authority to the case of a simple "re-conveyance."

This was a petition, presented under the Trustee Act 1850, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, by the executor of a mortgagee in fee, praying an order vesting the mortgaged estate. In the petition it was stated that the mortgage in fee was made, in 1842, of certain lands to Mr. Wm. Boden, deceased, the testator of the petitioner; that the mortgagee made his will, appointing the petitioner his executor, but made no devise or bequest of his mortgage or trust estates; that the mortgagee, who was since dead, had never been in possession of the mortgaged estate or in receipt of the rents and profits during his life, nor had the petitioner or any other person claiming under him since his death; that the mortgagee had no child, but had an only brother, Joseph Boden, who left England in 1832, and had never since been heard of; that Joseph Boden was heir-at-law of William Boden, the mortgagee, and if alive the legal estate in the mortgaged premises was vested in him, but if he were dead it was not known who was the heir-at-law of the mortgagee; that it was desired that a transfer of the mortgage should be made, but the same could not be effected without the aid of the Court. It was therefore prayed that an order might be made, vesting the mortgaged premises, subject to the equity of redemption, in the petitioner and his heirs and assigns, as the person entitled to receive the mortgage money.

(5) This opinion was communicated to the Vice Chancellor, and the order was made for payment of the money out of court, without prerogative letters of administration being taken out.

By the Trustee Act, 1850, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60. s. 19. it is enacted: "That when any person to whom any lands have been conveyed by way of mortgage shall have died without having entered into the possession or into the receipt of the rents and profits thereof, and the money due in respect of such mortgage shall have been paid to a person entitled to receive the same, or such last-mentioned person shall consent to an order for the reconveyance of such lands, then in any of the following cases it shall be lawful for the Court of Chancery to make an order vesting such lands in such person or persons in such manner and for such estate as the said Court shall direct: that is to say, When an heir or devisee of such mortgagee shall be out of the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, or cannot be found: When an heir or devisee of such mortgagee shall, upon a demand by a person entitled to require a conveyance of such lands or a duly authorized agent of such last-mentioned person, have stated in writing that he will not convey the same, or shall not convey the same for the space of twenty-eight days next after a proper deed for conveying such lands shall have been tendered to him by a person entitled as aforesaid, or a duly authorized agent of such last-mentioned person: When it shall be uncertain which of several devisees of such mortgagee was the survivor: When it shall be uncertain, as to the survivor of several devisees of such mortgagee, or as to the heir of such mortgagee, whether he be living or dead: When such mortgagee shall have died intestate as to such lands, and without an heir, or shall have died and it shall not be known who is his heir or devisee: And the order of the said Court of Chancery made in any one of the foregoing cases shall have the same effect as if the heir or devisee or surviving devisee, as the case may be, had duly executed a conveyance or assignment of the lands in the same manner and for the same estate."

Mr. E. Webster, in support of the petition.—This application is made by way of appeal from a decision of Sir George Turner, who has declined to make the order prayed by the petition, on the ground that as the mortgage money has not been paid and a re-conveyance is not sought, the case does not come within the 19th section of the Trustee Act, 1850. His Honour, in declining to act, recognized the view he took in Re Meyrick (1), where he considered the Court had no jurisdiction to make an order vesting the mortgaged estate in the representative of the mortgagee. It is true that in words this case is not one of those enumerated in the 19th section; yet the only reasonable doubt seems to be, whether the words "last-mentioned person" are sufficient to authorize that person himself to apply to the Court, he being spoken of as a party upon whose consent the order may be made. If the construction put upon the clause by the Vice Chancellor be that which is to prevail, the present case will be one in which the petitioner is without a remedy. If the money were paid off, the order could be made for vesting the estate as on a re-conveyance. What possible difference can it make that as the money is not to be paid off, but only a transfer to be effected, an order should be made having the effect of a conveyance of the estate?

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The word used in this section is "re-conveyance;" to meet such a case it should have been "conveyance." The question before us is, whether the former has so strict and inflexible a meaning as to prevent us from acting upon the spirit. Can we not, acting on the spirit of the statute in question, hold that a conveyance from the heir of the mortgagee to the executor or administrator of the mortgagee of the mortgaged premises, may fall within the meaning of the term "re-conveyance"? I think we can. I think to hold the contrary would be to act on the words and contrary to the spirit of this statute. I cannot attribute to the legislature an intention to leave a person in such a situation as the petitioner would be left in, by a literal construction of the clause. I think that there ought to be, and is, a jurisdiction, not exceeding a proper judicial jurisdiction, of putting a liberal construction upon a statute involving such a question as this.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I can see upon the face of this clause a ground for holding that the legislature did not mean to confine our jurisdiction to a mere case of a simple "re-conveyance." The section in question provides that in the cases enumerated the Court may make an order "vesting the lands in such person or persons, in such manner and for such estate as the Court shall direct." But this is not all, for it further goes on to enact "that such order shall have the same effect as if the heir or devisee or surviving devisee, as the case may be, had duly executed a conveyance or assignment of the lands, in the same manner and for the same estate;" thus providing for the case of a conveyance generally, and not confining it to the simple case of a re-conveyance. I think we may properly direct a reference to the Master, but all the words of the section should be inserted in the reference, so that the title may not hereafter be endangered.

Refer it to the Master to inquire and state to the Court whether William Boden, deceased, in the petition named, was under any and what deed mortgagee in fee of the hereditaments in the petition mentioned; and whether he was ever and when in possession or in receipt of the rents and profits of the said mortgaged estate; and whether he died seised in fee of the said estate, and whether he died intestate as to the said estate, and whether he left any and what person his heir-at-law; and whether the legal estate in the said mortgaged premises is now vested in any and what person as the heir-at-law of the said William Boden, or in whom such legal estate is now vested; and whether the heir-at-law or the person in whom such legal estate is now vested is out of the jurisdiction of the Court; and whether the heir-at-law or such person as aforesaid was ever in possession or in receipt of the rents and profits of the said estate; and whether such heir-at-law or such person as aforesaid is living or dead, or whether it is uncertain whether he is living or dead, or whether he can be found.

OSBORN v. MORGAN.

Baron and Feme—Feme Covert—Equity to Settlement—Reversionary Chose in Action.

A wife's equity to a settlement does not depend upon her right of property, but only attaches to and arises upon her husband's legal right to the present possession of the property. Therefore a settlement cannot be claimed in respect of a reversionary interest in property so long as such interest continues reversionary.

This was a suit on behalf of the wife and children of a bankrupt, for a settlement out of certain property bequeathed to the wife, partly in possession and partly in reversion. The bill was filed against the trustees of the testator's will, under which the property was derived, and the bankrupt, and his assignees in bankruptcy; and stated to the effect that Julian Dibben, by his will, gave an annuity of 50*l.* a-year to George Partington for life, and also a life interest in certain other property, which, after his death, the testator directed to be sold and one-fourth of the proceeds paid absolutely to the plaintiff, Mrs. Osborn, then Miss Ann Dibben; and the testator gave all the residue of his property equally to Mrs. Osborn and three other persons. George Partington was still living, and a sum of 1616*l.* had been invested and set apart by the executors and trustees to secure his annuity. There was not any settlement on the marriage of Mrs. Osborn. The bill prayed a settlement out of all the property bequeathed to Mrs. Osborn.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Rodwell appeared for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Faber, for the bankruptcy assignees of Mr. Osborn.

Mr. Prior, for the executors and trustees of Mr. Dibben's will; and Mr. Nalder for Mr. Osborn.

Jan. 13.—TURNER, V.C.—The question which stood over for judgment in this case was, whether a married woman could compel assignees or trustees to make a settlement upon her out of her reversionary chose in action to which she is entitled in equity. It was admitted in argument that no reported case could be found in which such settlement has been decreed; and I am of opinion that such settlement cannot be compelled. The absence of authority would alone have been sufficient to determine the question; but in my opinion it is clear, on principle as well as on authority, that such settlement cannot be compelled. Marriage is a gift by the wife to the husband of all her personal property to which she is entitled in possession, and of all to which she may become entitled at any time during the coverture, subject only to the condition of his reducing it into possession during the coverture.

I am not aware of any difference in this respect, whether the property be of a legal or an equitable nature. In principle there cannot be any such distinction; the rule resting upon this, that the husband and wife are considered as one person in law,—a rule which prevails as much in equity as at law. The wife's equity to a settlement does not depend upon any right of property in the wife. This is more clear when we consider to what limitations it is subject. In the first place, the amount and proportion which shall be included in the settlement is always in the discretion of the Court; and in the next place, the wife cannot claim this equity for herself alone, but must claim it for herself and her children; two circumstances which are quite incompatible with the notion that this equity is based on any right or supposed right of property in the wife.

The right, therefore, being independent of the property, there seems to be no question that there is not any other ground on which it can rest but the controul which Courts of equity exercise over property falling within their dominion. It is, in truth, the mere creation of Courts of equity, one of the rules of which is, that he who comes into equity must do equity, a rule which was subsequently extended to suits to which husbands and their wives were parties, in matters of trust, and matters in which there was a necessity to administer the trusts.

We must also consider when this obligation of doing equity is enforced by the Court. It is not upon the bill being filed; for it may afterwards be dismissed. It is not upon the decree being made when the plaintiff's interest is in reversion; for then the Court is only dealing with interests in possession. But it is when the property comes to be distributed, and it is then, and not until then, that the right to a settlement attaches. This right is an obligation which the Court fastens, not on the property, but on the right to receive it.

Again, it is clear from this consideration of the subject that if the right attaches, it must attach with all its incidents. One of the incidents is, that the wife may waive it by consent in court; but her consent, it is now settled, cannot be taken to part with her reversionary interest. Upon the whole, therefore, my opinion is, that this plaintiff's claim to a settlement out of a reversionary interest, whilst it continues reversionary, cannot be supported.

But, if authority were required to confirm the view I have taken, I may mention that in Woollands v. Croucher (1) Sir William Grant (speaking of the common case for taking the consent of a married woman) says, "The ordinary occasion for that is, where the husband applies to have paid to him money that belongs presently and immediately to his wife; her equity is, not to prevent his receipt of it (for it belongs to him), but to have a settlement; and the Court requires her consent to the payment to him without a settlement." And in Pickard v. Roberts (2), Sir John Leach says, "My opinion is, that a wife by her consent in a court of equity can only depart with that interest which is the creature of a court of equity, the right which she has in a court of equity to claim a provision by way of settlement on herself and children out of that property which the husband at law would take in possession in her right. Her equity arises upon his legal right to present possession. This principle has no application to a remainder or reversion; when the remainder or reversion falls into possession, then the equity arises." I think, therefore, that I cannot accede to so much of the prayer of the bill as prays a declaration of the wife's right to have a settlement of the reversionary interests. As to the rest, there will be a reference in the usual way.

Decree accordingly.

Jan. 15. } HAMBROOK v. SMITH.

Discovery—Form of Exceptions—Interrogatory—Forfeiture.

The bill alleged that an estate was devised under a power to the defendant for life or until he should alienate by forfeiture or otherwise; that the execution of the power was invalid, and that the plaintiff was entitled to the estate in default of appointment. One of the interrogatories to the bill was, whether the defendant had not in his possession the title deeds of the estate, and if not in whose possession were they? The bill also asked that the defendant might set forth a schedule to the deeds in his possession, and that he might state in whose possession those deeds were which he had parted with. The defendant admitted that some of the deeds were in his possession, and set forth a schedule of them, and he stated that he had had other deeds, but refused to answer in whose possession they now were, as it might subject him to a forfeiture of the estate. Held, that an exception which comprised the answer to the whole of the interrogatory was good, although part of it had been answered.

Held, also, that as in one event the documents might assist the plaintiff at the hearing he was entitled to production.

Held, further, that the estate having been given to the defendant until alienation, he could not protect himself from discovery on the ground of forfeiture.

This case came on upon exceptions to an answer relating to the possession of documents.

The bill alleged that the defendant, Samuel Smith, by a voluntary settlement, dated in November 1832, conveyed certain real estates to trustees upon trust for the benefit of his wife Elizabeth Smith, for her separate use for life, and after her decease to such uses as she should by will appoint, and, in default of appointment, in trust for Mary Hambrook, who was the mother of the plaintiff, her heirs and assigns for ever; that Elizabeth Smith, by her will, dated in 1848, and purporting to be made in execution of the power contained in the settlement of 1832, appointed the said real estate comprised in the settlement to the use of her husband for life, or until he should be found or declared a bankrupt, or should take the benefit of the Insolvent Act, or until he should convey, assign, or encumber his said life estate by way of anticipation, and after the decease of the said Samuel Smith, or other sooner determination of his estate, then to other persons named in the will; that Elizabeth Smith died in the year 1848. The defendant Samuel Smith had obtained a re-conveyance of the legal estate from the trustees to himself in fee; and that upon the death of his wife the said Samuel Smith obtained possession of the settlement of 1832 and the other title deeds to the said premises which he still retained in his possession. The bill stated that Mary Hambrook died in the year 1846, leaving the plaintiff Samuel Smith Hambrook her heir, and it alleged that the will of Elizabeth Smith was invalid by reason of her having been in an unsound state of mind at the period of its execution, and because it was not duly executed and attested as by law required, and that the plaintiff as the heir of Mary Hambrook was therefore entitled to the said estate under the voluntary settlement of 1832.

The bill prayed that the estate might be conveyed to the plaintiff and that the deeds and muniments of title relating thereto might be delivered up into his possession.

One of the interrogatories to the bill was in the following terms:—"Whether the said Samuel Smith did not at the time of the death of his said wife, or at some other time, and when, obtain possession of the said indenture of settlement of November 1832, and the other title deeds hereinbefore in that behalf mentioned, or of some, and which of the same respectively, and whether he does not now retain such possession either by himself or by his solicitors or agents, or some or one of them, or otherwise, or in whose possession are the same now and in what right."

Another interrogatory was to the following effect:—"That the said Samuel Smith may set forth a list and schedule of the title deeds and muniments of title relating to the hereditaments the subject of the said settlement of 1832, and if he shall allege himself to have parted with the possession of the same or any of them, then that he may state what hath become of such of the same, the possession of which he shall have parted with, and in whose possession, custody, or power the same now are and under what title respectively."

The defendant, by his answer, admitted that he had obtained possession of the indenture of November 1832, shortly after the death of his wife, and he set forth a schedule of the deeds in his possession, and stated, that at one time he had in his possession other title deeds and muniments of title relating to the said hereditaments, but that he had parted with them before the institution of this suit. The defendant submitted that he ought not to be compelled to state what had become of the same or in whose possession they now were, inasmuch as he had been advised that having regard to the trusts in his favour contained in the will of Elizabeth Smith, such discovery would or might subject him to forfeiture and loss of his interest in the said hereditaments.

Two exceptions were taken by the plaintiff to the answer of the defendant; the first exception was, that the defendant Samuel Smith had not answered the following interrogatory—"whether the said Samuel Smith did not at the time of the death of his wife, or at some other time and when, obtain possession of the said indenture of settlement of November 1832 and the other title deeds hereinbefore in that behalf mentioned, or of some and which of the same respectively, and whether he does not now retain such possession either by himself or by his solicitors or agents, or some or one of them or otherwise, or in whose possession are the same now and in what right." The second exception was, "that the said Samuel Smith had not set forth a list and schedule of the title deeds and muniments of title relating to the hereditaments the subject of the said settlement of November 1832, and though the defendant alleges himself to have parted with the possession of the same or some of them, he hath not stated what hath become of such of the same, the possession of which he shall have parted with, and in whose possession, custody or power the same now are, and under what title respectively."

Mr. Goodeve, in support of the exceptions, contended that the defendant ought to have stated in whose possession the documents were, and that the interrogatories were not fully answered. The defendant admitted that he had obtained possession of the deeds, and he could not protect himself by setting up a forfeiture under the will, since the plaintiff claimed independently of the will.

Mr. Chandless and Mr. Surrage contended that the exceptions were bad in form, on the ground that they embraced more than one interrogatory, and that as each of the exceptions extended to two interrogatories, one of which had been fully answered, they could not be sustained; that if the plaintiff obtained the discovery sought, it would not assist him in obtaining a decree at the hearing, and if the defendant were to give the discovery it might render him liable to a forfeiture of his estate, because the deeds might tend to shew that he had done an act upon the doing of which his estate was to terminate.

Mr. Goodeve, in reply.

The following cases were cited as to the form of the exceptions:—

Stainton v. Chadwick, 15 Jur. 1139.

Monnins v. Monnins, 2 Chanc. Rep. 68.

Chauncey v. Tahourden, 2 Atk. 392.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The first question raised upon these exceptions, whether they are good in form. It is contended, on the part of the defendant, that they are bad in form in this respect:—that such exceptions embrace more than one interrogatory, and inasmuch as one of the interrogatories embraced in the exception has been sufficiently answered, even if the other has not been sufficiently answered, the exceptions ought to be altogether overruled. Now, as to the effect of such exception embracing more than one interrogatory. The first exception is—[His Honour here read the exception as given above]. Now, it is said, that embraces two interrogatories: one is, whether he did not at the time of the death of his wife obtain possession of the deeds; and the other is, in whose possession are they? In one sense these are two questions, but they are properly embraced in one interrogatory, because it is all one interrogatory, whether the documents did not come into his possession at the death of his wife, and if they are not in his possession, in whose possession are they? It appears to me that there is no impropriety in embracing the whole of that in one interrogatory, and no impropriety in embracing it in one exception, though a portion has been answered. The same observation applies to the second exception, and therefore there is no valid objection in form.

The next question is this: the defendant insists that having the discovery sought here would not in any way assist the plaintiff in obtaining a decree when the cause comes on for hearing, and for that reason besides the other, the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to compel the defendant to answer. Now, the question has been argued as if the discovery sought was what the deeds were. But the discovery is not what the deeds were, nor the setting out a schedule, because the defendant has set out a schedule; but the discovery sought is, in whose possession are these documents now, and in what title? It is said, and said very truly, that inasmuch as the defendant is entitled to this property if the will of his wife is a valid will, therefore if the question be decided against the plaintiff he will have no relief whatever at the hearing. But I need not say whether that question will be determined at the hearing in favour of the plaintiff or not. But suppose it should be determined in favour of the plaintiff, that the will is invalid, then is there not relief asked, to which the discovery here sought is, or may be, material? The plaintiff asks that the estate may be given up to him, and that the deeds may be delivered to him. In order to found a claim to that relief the facts stated are these: that the defendant made a voluntary settlement of certain real estate, by which he conveyed that real estate to a trustee named Davies in trust for the separate use of the settlor's wife for life, with a power of appointment by will, and in default of appointment to the mother of the plaintiff in fee. The plaintiff is her son and heir, and therefore entitled to such estate as she, if living, would have been entitled to. It appears that the wife of the defendant, purporting to exercise the power of appointing the property by will under the settlement, made a will by which she appointed the estate to the defendant Smith during his life, or until he should alien the estate by bankruptcy, or otherwise, and on the determination of that estate, to the other defendants, the brothers and sisters of the plaintiff. And it appears that on the death of the defendant's wife he, by virtue of that testamentary appointment, entered into possession, and he procured Davies, the trustee, to deliver up the deeds to him. Now, when the cause comes on to be heard, the Court will first have to determine the question as to the validity of the appointment. If it determines that it is valid the plaintiff's bill must be dismissed, but if the will is held to be invalid what will the Court have to determine? Why the Court must then decree a conveyance of the estate and delivery of the deeds of the estate to the plaintiff. Now, upon the exceptions, it is no protection against answering to say, that in one event of the decision of the Court you will be entitled to no discovery at all. If a discovery may be useful for obtaining any relief which the plaintiff may obtain, I apprehend in that case the plaintiff is entitled to a discovery, and here it may be most material to the plaintiff to have a discovery of the hands in which the deeds now are. It may be material even before the cause comes to a hearing, because it may be necessary to make the person in whose hands are the deeds a party, in order to get a decree for that party to give up the deeds; and if it were not for the question that arises as to forfeiture, I should have considered it a clear case, and that the defendant was bound to answer in whose custody the deeds now are. These deeds are, in fact, the foundation of the title of both parties, and I apprehend there would be no doubt, subject to the question of forfeiture, but that the defendant would be bound to set out all the deeds remaining in his possession, and that the plaintiff would be entitled to production. The defendant, indeed, has set out a schedule of the deeds now in his possession, and if he, having got the deeds, has parted with them to a third party, then is he not compelled to state to whom he has parted with such deeds? All the cases cited by the defendant are cases on motion for production, except the case of Stainton v. Chadwick. Now, the principle on which the Court proceeds as to production is this. If the plaintiff's title is positively disputed by the defendant, and the documents in question could not in any way assist the plaintiff in any relief he is to ask for at the hearing, the Court may not only not compel production, but may not compel a schedule of them. But if the documents may assist the plaintiff in obtaining any portion of the relief which in any one event he may become entitled to, then the party is entitled to discovery by having the deeds set out, and also to production, subject only to this, that if the Court sees upon motion for production that there is a point to be determined upon which the title of the plaintiff depends, and which the documents will not help, then the Court may say, in this stage of the cause the Court will not compel production. Now, as to that case cited from the Jurist, I conceive that the dictum of the Lord Chancellor must have reference to documents which would be necessary in case the plaintiff obtains a decree, in order that upon some consequential proceeding he may work out the relief he asks. I am of opinion that really if there were not this question arising as to forfeiture or loss which the defendant may sustain in giving the discovery, there would not be a reasonable doubt as to the right of the plaintiff to have production, and that brings me to the question as to the forfeiture.

Now, that stands thus. The defendant says, this will of the wife, which he has a right to assume for this purpose will be, or at least may be, a valid testamentary appointment, has made the defendant's life estate dependent upon his not alienating, that is to say, has made his estate cease upon alienation, and go over to other persons; and he says, "if I disclose to the plaintiff the hands in which I have placed these deeds I shall forfeit this estate, because it may shew or tend to shew that I have done an act, on the doing of which my estate was to determine." Now the case of Monnins v. Monnins, no doubt, seems to have decided this, that where an estate is given to a woman durante viduitate, and where it was only to endure so long as she remained a widow, she might protect herself from answering as to the fact of whether she had contracted a new marriage. On the other hand, there are other cases referred to, the case before Lord Talbot, cited in Chauncey v. Tahourden, and other cases, which go to shew distinctly this:—that the Court draws a distinction between the two classes of cases: the one where a certain estate is given to an individual, but with a condition annexed, that upon the happening of a certain event there shall be a forfeiture of the estate so given; the other, where an estate is so limited as only to endure till a certain event occurs, and then to go over. No doubt, in many cases that is so, and the distinction is fine, but well established, not only as to discovery, but as to many other questions. The latter is called a conditional limitation. I doubt the correctness of that term; but I understand it to mean that the estate is limited to endure till a certain event happens, and then to go over: that appears to me to be the meaning of the term. Now, in this case, according to the terms of the will of Mrs. Smith, the estate is given to him not absolutely for life, but to endure only until the happening of the event of alienation, and then given over to other persons. Now, it would be very difficult in a court of equity to maintain the proposition that a man has a right to say, "Although I am in possession of an estate which was only to endure till the happening of a certain event, and then to go over, I can in equity and moral justice refuse to disclose whether that event has happened, upon the happening of which my estate is to determine." If there had been no decision upon the point I should not have been satisfied that he could have protected himself from giving such discovery when the refusal in effect is saying this, "Although my estate has determined in consequence of the act, I have a right to refuse the disclosure whether my estate has determined." I should find it extremely difficult to hold this; but I think the decisions clearly establish that this is not a case of forfeiture to which the rule applies. Now the cases which have been cited, except that of Monnins v. Monnins, which appears to be overruled by subsequent cases, seem to have determined that there is a distinction between cases of estates to endure for life, but to go over in case of a particular act being done, and cases of estates to endure until the happening of a certain event. I am clearly of opinion, therefore, that the objection to the discovery on the ground that it might subject the defendant to what he calls forfeiture, but which is only the discovery of the happening of the event on which the estate, would determine, is not tenable. I must consequently allow the exceptions.

Will—Construction—Vested Interest—Divesting.

A testator at his decease left a widow and three children, all of whom attained twenty-one and survived the wife. By his will he gave real and personal estate to trustees "to transfer to each of his children their share after the death of his wife, or as soon as they arrived to twenty-one years, but if one of the three children should die leaving no children, his or her share should be equally divided between the other two, and their heirs for ever." One of the testator's children married, and died, leaving no children, but leaving his wife surviving:—Held, that he took a vested interest in his share of the testator's property not liable to be defeated upon his afterwards dying without leaving a child surviving.

This was a special case under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35.

William Edwards, by his will, dated the 10th of November 1840, gave, devised, and bequeathed all his freehold and leasehold messuages, tenements, lands and hereditaments, unto Henry Griffith and John Powell, their executors, administrators and assigns, upon trust to pay unto the testator's wife (since deceased) the rents, issues and profits to become due from his freehold and leasehold estate (subject as to part thereof to an annuity charged thereon) to be paid to his wife during her natural life so long as she should remain his widow, but if she should marry again the testator directed that an annuity should be paid to her in manner therein mentioned. The testator then proceeded:—"I give and bequeath to my eldest son John all that my leasehold messuage or public-house called Penllergace Arms and the malt-house, and all other buildings and premises belonging to or situated in the village of Llangefelach. And also all that my freehold property called Tyrpenyrhwyl. And also that messuage or public-house called Welcome Inn, and all buildings and land belonging to it situate near Mynyddbach, in the parish of Llangefelach, for him and his heirs for ever, to possess immediately after his mother's death, or after his mother's marriage." And the testator then made similar devises and bequests of freehold and leasehold property, which he particularly described, to his daughter Mary and his son William. And the testator further continued his will:—"If my dear wife shall remain my widow, then my said trustees or the survivor of them shall assign and transfer to each of my children their shares immediately after her death, and as soon as they arrive to twenty-one years of age, and they, my three children, shall pay to their mother as above mentioned. Further, my will and meaning is, that if one of my three children shall die leaving no children born in wedlock, his or her share shall be equally divided between the other two, and for their heirs for ever, and if two of my children shall die, and leaving no children born in wedlock, their shares shall go to the surviving one, and his or her heirs for ever." And, lastly, the testator appointed Henry Griffith and Powell (since deceased), and the testator's wife Mary executors of his will.

The testator died on the 15th of July 1841, and his will was proved by H. Griffith and Mary Edwards on the 27th of April 1842. The testator also left his wife and three children surviving.

On the 3rd of October 1845 the testator's wife died, without having married again.

On the 7th of June 1848 John Edwards attained twenty-one, and married Rebecca Edwards on the 3rd of October 1848.

On the 26th of April 1850 John Edwards made his will, and gave and devised all and every his freehold and leasehold estate whatsoever and wheresoever, whether in possession or reversion, remainder or expectancy, over which he had a disposing power unto his wife Rebecca for the term of her natural life, and from and after her decease for the benefit of her children as therein specified. But in the event (as it happened) of there being no child of the testator by his said wife living at the time of his decease, or in case his said wife should marry again, then he gave and devised all and every his freehold and leasehold estates unto and between his sister Mary Edwards, and his brother William Edwards absolutely in equal shares as tenants in common, upon condition of paying his wife an annuity as therein mentioned, and the testator appointed Henry Griffith, the defendant, his executor.

On the 5th of May 1850 John Edwards died leaving his wife surviving, but without having had any child or children.

On the 7th of June 1850 the will was proved.

Mary and William Edwards had both attained twenty-one years of age, and the legal estate in the freeholds and leaseholds was vested in H. Griffith, who was the executor under both the wills.

The questions now raised were: first, whether John Edwards took a fee in the freeholds and an absolute estate in the leaseholds, so as to be capable himself of devising and bequeathing the same; secondly, if he did not take such fee and absolute interest, whether his widow was entitled to dower out of the freeholds; thirdly, whether, in the events which had happened, the plaintiffs were entitled to an absolute conveyance and assignment to them, their heirs, executors and administrators, of the freehold and leasehold estates and premises.

Mr. Giffard, for Mary and William Edwards.—The question is, whether John Edwards had, under the will of his father, an equitable estate in fee in the freeholds, and whether it was vested or determinable by his dying without leaving any child, and whether he had an absolute estate in the leaseholds; and assuming he had a fee, it being only an equitable interest, whether his widow was entitled to dower of the freeholds under the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 105. ss. 2, 3. The plaintiffs contended that there was a good executory devise, and that they were entitled to the estate upon the decease of John without children. It must be considered whether the gift over took effect on death simpliciter, which must happen at all events, and also whether it was connected with an event which might or might not happen, and which might happen as well before as after the death of the testator, or other event on which the gift was to vest absolutely. The language used by the testator referred not merely to death; it expressed a contingency, which death was not. The event referred to was death leaving no children. There was nothing which could affect the words or prevent them from having operation, and though the trustees were directed to transfer the shares of the children, they must be read in connexion with the ulterior parts of the gift, and were qualified by their subsequent limitation of dying, leaving no children—Farthing v. Allen (1), Child v. Giblett (2). Where, however, there were two concurrent or alternative gifts preceded by some other partial interest, whether for life or otherwise, under which the enjoyment might be postponed, the words in question had been applied to the event of the death occurring before the interest vested in possession, and the Court had considered the original legatee surviving that period as absolutely entitled—Da Costa v. Keir (3), Galland v. Leonard (4), Home v. Pillans (5), 2 Jar. on Wills, 659, 670, 687. This case, however, varied from those. The testator has expressed his meaning, and the testator's son John took no more than a life estate in the property. But, assuming that he took an equitable fee which was liable to be determined whether by express limitation or condition, then the husband could not be entitled by the curtesy; neither, as they must be considered as regulated by the same rules, could the wife be entitled to dower—Barker v. Barker (6), Moody v. King (7), 2 Rep. Husband and Wife, 2nd ed. Addenda, 2, 502.

Mr. Shebbeare, for Rebecca Edwards, the widow of John Edwards.—The words of contingency must be read as exclusively happening previous to the event upon which the gift was to take effect, since, if alternative limitations were not so restricted it would give rise to a repugnancy which would in effect reduce a prior devise in fee to a life interest—Clayton v. Lowe (8), Barker v. Cocks (9).

Feb. 5.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The testator gave all his real estates to trustees, in trust for his widow for life, or during her widowhood, subject as to part to a certain annuity. His will then proceeds:—"If my dear wife shall remain my widow, then my said trustees or the survivor of them shall assign and transfer to each of my children their shares immediately after her death, and as soon as they arrive to twenty-one years of age, and they, my three children, shall pay to their mother as above mentioned. Further, my will and meaning is, that if one of my said three children shall die leaving no children born in wedlock, his or her share shall be equally divided between the other two, and for their heirs for ever, and if two of my children shall die, and leaving no children born in wedlock, their shares shall go to the surviving one and his or her heirs for ever." The testator, at his decease, left his widow and three children, two sons and a daughter, surviving him. The children all attained the age of twenty-one years, and survived the wife, after which one son died without issue; and the question is under these words, whether, on attaining his age of twenty-one years he took an absolute interest in the lands devised, or whether, on his afterwards dying without leaving a child, his share went to his sister and brother. The principles which apply to cases of this description are well established. I have not before me a full copy of the will, and the passage which is set out in the special case appears to relate to real estate only. I am of opinion, however, that in the present case, and upon the words here occurring, the construction must be the same in the case of real estate as if the subject-matter were the bequest of a legacy.

There are four classes of cases in which questions of this description have arisen, to each of which it will be necessary to refer to make my decision clear and intelligible. The first case may be described as that of a single gift to A, and if he shall die, then to B. The second, as that of a gift to A, and if he shall die without leaving a child then to B. The third and fourth classes of cases are where gifts of this description to A. and B. are preceded by a life estate, or some other interest of partial duration, and may be described as a gift to one for life, and after his decease to A, and if A. shall die then to B. And fourthly, a gift to one for life, and after his decease to A, and if A. shall die without leaving a child, then to B. It is obvious that in the first class, the gift to A. takes effect, if at all, immediately on the death of the testator. The applying to the gift over must either be confined to the death of the testator or must extend to any period of time. In the first of these supposed cases, as the testator speaks of death—the most certain of all things—as a contingency, it can only be made contingent by reference to its taking place before a particular period, and as no period of time is mentioned in the will, it is necessarily presumed that the period of time, to which the testator refers, is the period of possession or payment; that is, his own death, when the legacy to A. will take effect; and the subsequent limitation is introduced to prevent a lapse of the legacy in case A. did not survive the testator. In such cases, therefore, the rule may be considered to be settled, that the bequest must be read somewhat to this effect, that is to say, a bequest to A, but if A. shall die before the bequest becomes vested in him, then to B; and the consequence is, if A. survives the testator, he takes an absolute vested interest in the legacy, and not a life interest to A. with remainder to B. This is clearly settled by the authorities referred to in Home v. Pillans. It can scarcely be necessary to observe, that the rule of law, which does not enable a legatee to compel payment of his legacy for a year, does not affect the question which I am now considering, although, for the convenience of administration, the executor is not compelled to assent to the legacy before he has ascertained what the assets are, and convenience has fixed that period at twelve months, and the legatee is entitled to it immediately upon the death of the testator.

In the second of the supposed cases there is a manifest distinction. There the event spoken of on which the legacy is to go over is not a certain, but a contingent event. It is not in case of the death of A, but in case of his death without issue, or without leaving a child; and here it would be importing a meaning and adding words to the will, if it were to be construed as a condition to entitle B. to take upon the death of A. without issue, if it was to happen at some particular period. In these cases it has always been held, if at any time, whether before or after the death of the testator, A. died without leaving a child, the gift over takes effect, and the legacy vests in B; this is best established by the case of Farthing v. Allen. All those cases are of course liable to be varied by the force of the particular expressions which the testator may have made use of in his will, importing a different intention; but they do not affect the rule—on the contrary, they must be held tacitly to admit the application of it, inasmuch as they are treated as exceptions to an existing rule.

In the third class of cases, where a life estate is given, the rule applicable to the first class applies equally to this, but the application fixes a different period of time. In the first case the rule is, if A. dies before the period of possession or payment, that is, before the death of the testator, the legacy goes to B. In the class of cases I am now considering, the rule is, I think, the same, namely, that if A. dies before the period of possession or payment, that is, before the death of the tenant for life of the legacy, the legacy goes to B. There is the case of Hervey v. M'Laughlin (12), which is referred to in Salisbury v. Petty (13), and it may further be observed, that the propriety of giving effect to the testator's will, making a contingent event by referring that event to the period when the legacy is vested in possession rather than to the death of the testator where those periods are not identical, (which they often or usually are), was the ground on which the House of Lords reversed the decision of Lord Cowper, in Lord Bindon v. the Earl of Suffolk (14), although the principle of that decision was to be recognized, and has always since been maintained. In the case of Lord Bindon v. the Earl of Suffolk, the testator gave an interest in a debt, which was to be got in, and gave no legacy in fact until the legacy was got in; and the House of Lords, though approving the principle of Lord Cowper's decision, yet held that the death before the debt was got in made the gift over take effect.

The case before me comes within the last class of cases, where a life estate is given to one of the subjects of the gift, and on the determination of that estate, the subject of it is given to A, with a direction that if he shall die leaving no child, his share shall go to the survivor. In this class of cases it is obvious that the event of death without leaving a child may be applied either to the period of distribution, or to any period of time, either before or after that period whenever it may occur; nor if it were res integra would it be easy, in the absence of any indication of intention to be collected from the rest of the will, to determine which of those constructions ought to prevail. I consider it, however, settled, both by principle and authority, that in the absence of any words indicating a contrary intention the rule is, that the words indicating death without leaving a child, unless the gift over is to take effect, must be considered to refer to that event occurring before the period of distribution. The principle which regulates such cases is to be found in the often expressed desire of the Court to avoid a case so inconvenient, as one which must suspend the absolute vesting of the subject of the gift during the whole life of the legatee or devisee,—a principle which seems materially to have influenced the decision in Home v. Pillans.

Decided authorities, however, concur with the principle in this case, and the very point in question has arisen. It was determined in the cases of Da Costa v. Keir and Galland v. Leonard. In both these cases a previous life estate had been given, after which the legacy was given to one with a gift over, in case that person should die leaving a child, to that child, and if none, then to a third person. In both cases the Court determined that the legatee, having survived the tenant for life, was entitled to the fund absolutely. Neither does the case of Home v. Pillans present to my mind the difficulties which appear to have suggested themselves to Mr. Jarman in his comment upon that case. That was a case where a legacy was given to two persons, "when and if they should attain their ages of twenty-one years," and in case of the death of either of them leaving a child, then the share of the legatee so dying was to go to that child. There was no gift, therefore, unless the legatee attained twenty-one, and this period was not identical with that of the death of the testator; consequently, if the dying without leaving a child could, upon principle and authority, as I believe it to be, fairly and properly be considered to have reference to the period of distribution, where that period is not the death of the testator, then it is in accordance with the principle laid down in Home v. Pillans, that the dying without leaving a child had reference to that event occurring upon that period of distribution, in like manner as if that period had been appointed to take effect after a life estate or after any other partial interest. What is there observed is, that "it may be stated as a general proposition, that where the bequest over is in case of the legatee's death, and no other reference can be made, the period taken is the life of the testator; but where another can be found, that will be preferred, to avoid the supposition of the testator's having contemplated and provided against a lapse. A preceding gift for life, or other interest less than the absolute property, will furnish this reference."

For all these reasons I am of opinion that the son, who survived his mother, as tenant for life, took an absolute vested interest in the share of the testator's property not liable to be defeated upon his afterwards dying without leaving a child surviving him.

If I am right in the view which I take of the principle of these cases, the effect, as it appears to me, is that the rule of the Court is, that the contingency, or the event which the testator speaks of as a contingency, is always referable to the period of payment or distribution, except in the single case where there is a single gift to A, and if he shall die without leaving issue, then to B, in which case it cannot be referred to any period of distribution, but must be a general contingency to go over.

FLOWDEN v. HYDE.

Will—Revocation—Election—Heir-at-Law.

A testator mortgaged an estate in fee; he afterwards paid off the mortgage-money, and the estate was re-conveyed to him to uses to bar dower. Shortly afterwards, in April 1811, the testator again mortgaged this estate, and the proviso upon redemption was, that the estate should be re-conveyed to the testator, his heirs, appointees or assigns, or to such other person or persons, to such uses and in such manner as he or they should direct. In the May following the testator made his will, and devised all his messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments, and all other his real estate whatsoever, or which he had contracted to purchase, or to which he or any person in trust for him was seised or entitled for any estate of freehold and inheritance, or of freehold only, in possession, reversion, remainder or expectancy, or which he had power to dispose of by his will to a trustee to certain uses and upon certain trusts therein mentioned. In December 1813, the testator paid off the mortgage, and took a re-conveyance of the estate to the common uses to bar dower. Previously to the date of the will, the testator had contracted to purchase another estate, which was subsequently conveyed to him to uses to bar dower:—Held, that the will was revoked as to the mortgaged estate, and the estate contracted to be purchased before the date of the will, by the re-conveyance of the mortgaged estate and the conveyance of the purchased estate to uses to bar dower.

Held, also, that the testator's heir, who claimed these estates by descent, was not put to his election.

This case came on upon a petition, in which it was stated that Henry Chicheley Plowden, having in 1809 mortgaged an estate in fee, afterwards paid off the mortgage, and by indentures of lease and release, dated the 22nd and 23rd of April 1811, the estate was re-conveyed to him to the common uses to bar dower, that is to say, to the use of such persons and for such estates as he should, by deed or will, appoint, and, in default of appointment, to the use of the testator and his assigns for his life, and, after the determination of that estate by any means in his lifetime, to the use of John Dyneley, his executors, administrators and assigns, during the testator's life, upon trust for the only benefit of the testator, to the intent that any wife of the testator might be excluded from dower; and after the determination of the estate so limited to Dyneley, to the use of the testator, his heirs and assigns. That shortly afterwards the testator borrowed 3,000*l.* of William Newton on mortgage of this estate, and, by indentures of lease and release, dated respectively the 30th of April and the 1st of May 1811, after reciting the indentures of lease and release of the 22nd and 23rd of April 1811, the testator, in consideration of the 3,000*l.* advanced by Newton, appointed and conveyed the estate to Newton in fee, subject to a proviso for redemption, by which it was declared and agreed that if the said H. C. Plowden, his heirs, appointees, executors, administrators or assigns, should pay, or cause to be paid, to the said W. Newton, his executors, administrators or assigns the sum of 3,000*l.*, with interest at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, on the 1st of November then next ensuing, then the said W. Newton, his heirs and assigns, and all persons claiming under him or them, should and would, upon the request and at the costs and charges of the said H. C. Plowden, his heirs, appointees or assigns, re-convey and re-assure the premises unto the said H. C. Plowden, his heirs, appointees or assigns, or to such other person or persons, to such uses and in such manner as he or they should direct, free from incumbrances.

On the 15th of May 1811 the testator made his will of that date, whereby he devised to J. Dyneley, his heirs and assigns "all and every my messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments, and all other my real estate whatsoever, or which I have contracted to purchase, situate in or near the parishes of Boldre and South Baddesley, in the county of Southampton, or elsewhere in England, of or to which I, or any person or persons in trust for me, am, is, or are seised or entitled for any estate of freehold and inheritance, or of freehold only, in possession, reversion, remainder or expectancy, or which I have power to dispose of or appoint by this my will, with their rights, members and appurtenances," upon certain trusts. His heir-at-law took certain benefits under the will.

In December 1813 the testator paid off the mortgage, and took a re-conveyance of the estate by indentures of lease and release, dated respectively the 6th and 7th of December 1813, whereby, after reciting the mortgage to Newton, with the proviso for redemption, Newton, in consideration of the 3,000*l.* then re-paid to him by the testator, conveyed the estate to the testator, his heirs and assigns, to the use of such persons and for such estates as the testator should, by deed or will, appoint; and, in default of appointment, to the use of the testator and his assigns for his life, and, after the determination of that estate by any means in his lifetime, to the use of Dyneley, his executors, administrators and assigns, during the testator's life, upon trust, for the benefit of the testator, to the intent that any wife of the testator might be excluded from dower, and, after the determination of the estate so limited to Dyneley, to the use of the testator, his heirs and assigns.

The testator died on the 12th of January 1821, without republishing his will.

With respect to the second portion of the testator's real estate now in question, the following were the facts stated: That in 1809, certain lands at South Baddesley having been put up for sale by auction by the then owners, the testator bid for and became the purchaser of lot 1, at the price of 1,800*l.* This lot 1. comprised the freehold land now under consideration, and also certain leaseholds. No written contract for the purchase was forthcoming, nor was there any evidence of the terms of the contract, except so far as anything could be collected from the language of the conveyance.

Before any conveyance was executed to the testator, he made his will, dated the 15th of May 1811, to the effect before stated. After the date of the will, the freehold part of the lands comprised in lot 1. was conveyed to the testator by indentures of lease and release, dated respectively the 8th and 9th of November 1811, whereby, after reciting the sale by auction in 1809, and that the testator had bid 1,800*l.* for lot 1, comprising those freehold lands and certain leaseholds, and that he was allowed and declared to be the highest bidder for and purchaser of all the lands comprised in that lot, at the said price of 1,800*l.*, and reciting that it had been agreed that 400*l.* should be the apportioned part of the 1,800*l.* to be paid as the purchase and consideration money for the lands thereafter expressed to be thereby conveyed (being the freehold part of the lands); it was witnessed that, in pursuance of the said agreement, and in consideration of 400*l.* paid to the vendors by the testator, the lands in question were conveyed to the testator, to the common uses to bar dower, Dyneley being the trustee, as he was in the conveyance of the mortgaged property before mentioned.

The petition prayed that it might be declared that the deed of re-conveyance, dated the 7th of December 1813, did not as to the hereditaments comprised therein, operate as a revocation of the will of Henry C. Plowden, and that the legal estate therein descended upon the death of the testator to his heir-at-law as a trustee for the devisees of the equity of redemption, and that the hereditaments comprised in the deed of conveyance, dated the 9th of November 1811, and which the testator had contracted to purchase before the date of his will, might be declared to have been devised by the will; and that if the Court should decide that the devise of the estates so contracted to be purchased was revoked by the conveyance, then, that it might be declared that the defendant J. C. Plowden, the son of the testator's heir, was bound to elect between the last-mentioned hereditaments, and the monies to which he would be entitled under the will by virtue of the bequest therein contained, and that if he should elect to confirm the will, then that he might be declared a trustee for the devisees under the will.

Mr. Willcock and Mr. Jessel appeared in support of the petition, and said there were two propositions in this case. As to the first portion of the property in respect of which the petition was presented, the testator mortgaged it, reserving the equity of redemption to himself, his appointees or assigns, or as he or they should appoint. Then, by his will, he devised all his estates to trustees on certain trusts therein specified. After this he took a re-conveyance to uses to bar dower. In 1809, the testator had contracted for the purchase of an estate, and after the execution of his will that estate was conveyed to the testator to uses to bar dower. The question as to these two estates was whether the uses to bar dower were a modification of the equitable interest under the contract so as to revoke the will. As to this latter property, it was also a question, in case it should be held that the will was revoked, whether it did not operate to put the heir to his election. It was contended that the testator at the time of making his will had, in fact, the same interest in the two estates as that which was subsequently conveyed to him. In the mortgage, the proviso for redemption was that on payment of the mortgage money, the estate should be re-conveyed to the testator, his heirs, appointees or assigns, or to such other person or persons, and to such uses, and in such manner as he or they should direct. These words were the common terms used when it was intended that an estate should be conveyed to uses to bar dower. The uses to which the testator directed the estate to be conveyed were the uses to bar dower, and consequently there was no change in the nature of the estate which the testator had, and there could be no revocation of the will by the subsequent re-conveyance of the estate to him in this form. This view was confirmed by the fact that in the mortgage deed, there was a recital of a previous mortgage of the same estate by the testator when it was re-conveyed to him to uses to bar dower. It was, therefore, evidently the intention that the mortgagee on the second mortgage should upon payment of the money re-convey to uses to bar dower, as had been the case with respect to the first mortgage. As to the property contracted to be purchased by the testator before the date of his will, and subsequently conveyed to him, there was no evidence to shew that the testator had not contracted that the estate should be conveyed to him to uses to bar dower. But suppose the Court should consider that the will was revoked, then it was contended that the heir must be put to his election. The testator clearly intended to devise this property by his will, even if the rules of law should prevent it from passing. The heir of the testator by asserting his right to the estate was defeating the intention of the testator, and could not be allowed to take that as well as what was actually given to him by the will.

In support of the argument as to revocation, the following cases were cited—

Tickner v. Tickner, cited in Parsons v. Freeman, 3 Atk. 742.

Watts v. Fullarton, cited in Doe v. Pott, 2 Dougl. 718.

On the question as to election, the following cases were cited—

The Hussin v. Woodford, 13 Ves. 209.

Jarman on Wills, vol. 1, p. 135.

Goodtitle v. Otway, 2 H. Black. 516.

Churchman v. Ireland, 1 Russ. & M. 250.

Mr. J. Russell and Mr. Lewin opposed the petition, and cited Innes v. Jackson (1) and Anson v. Lee (2).—It was contended that the interest which the testator had in both these estates at the time of making his will was different from that which he subsequently acquired, and, therefore, according to the acknowledged rule of law the devise in the will was revoked. As to the mortgaged property, the testator had a fee simple when he made his will, but by the re-conveyance after the date of his will he had a life estate and a remainder in fee, with an intermediate estate limited to a trustee. As regarded the purchased property the estate was purchased at an auction, and there never could have been any contract that it should be specially conveyed to him to uses to bar dower. There could be no doubt that the testator by having the estate conveyed in this manner did acquire a different species of interest from that which he had at the date of the will. It was contended that the heir ought to be put to his election if the devise was held to be revoked, but there could be no reason why that principle should be adopted. The testator had not devised the purchased estate; he had included only an estate which he had contracted to purchase at a particular place, but there was nothing to shew that he meant to include this property; at any rate he did not devise an estate which had been conveyed to him to uses to bar dower.

Mr. Malins, Mr. Erskine, and Mr. Hetherington appeared for parties in the same interest as the petitioner.

Feb. 10. — KINDERSLEY, V. C. — Two questions are raised in this case: first, whether certain acts done by the testator in the cause, after making his will, with respect to certain real estates of which he was the owner in equity at the date of his will, and which, but for those acts, would have passed by his will, have had the effect of revoking the devise of those estates? And, secondly, if such revocation has resulted from those acts, whether the testator's heir, claiming those estates by descent, ought to be put to his election? These questions arise with respect to two different portions of the real estates of the testator, under somewhat different circumstances.

With respect to the first portion, which, for convenience, I will call the mortgaged property, the following are the facts.—[His Honour here stated the facts above set forth as to the mortgaged property, and then the facts relating to the purchased property.]

—The question as to the purchased property is, whether, by reason of the conveyance of November 1811 the will was revoked so far as it operated to devise that property. With respect to this question of revocation, as applicable both to the mortgaged and purchased property, several cases have been cited in the argument, and many others are to be found in the books. In some of those cases the testator, at the date of his will, had the legal estate in the lands, and in others he had only an equitable estate or interest. In the case now before me, the estate or interest which the testator, at the date of his will, had in each of the two portions of property in question, was an equitable estate or interest; and therefore it is to the cases comprised in the latter class that more especial reference must be had, in order to deduce the established doctrine on the subject, as applicable to the case now under consideration.

The general rule of law to be deduced from this latter class of cases may be thus stated: that if, after the date of the will, the land is so conveyed to the testator that the legal estate therein, which becomes vested in him by the conveyance, is the same, in quality, as the equitable estate which he had at the date of the will, the conveyance does not revoke the devise. And so, in the case where the testator's interest in the land at the date of the will consists in a contract which he had entered into for the purchase of the land, if the land is afterwards conveyed to him by the vendor, in accordance with the terms of the contract between them, the conveyance does not revoke the devise. But, on the other hand, if the legal estate which the testator acquires by the conveyance differs, in quality, from the equitable estate which he had at the date of the will, the conveyance revokes the devise. And so, in the case of a contract for purchase, if the legal estate which the testator acquires by the conveyance differs from that which, by the terms of the contract, the vendor agreed to convey to him, the conveyance revokes the devise. And this revocation equally takes place, even though the testator, after the conveyance, has as absolute a power of disposing of the property as he had before. And the revocation takes place without regard to the testator's intention, and even in direct contravention of his intention. Eminent Judges have heretofore expressed, in strong terms, their disapprobation of the principle of this rule of revocation, and their regret that it should have been established, or, at least, that it should have been carried so far as it has been carried; but they have felt themselves constrained to follow it. While I fully participate in that disapprobation and that regret, I am equally obliged to recognize it as the long-established rule of the Courts, and, if the occasion requires, to act upon it.

Now, with respect to the mortgaged property, if we are to inquire what estate the testator had in the equity of redemption at the date of his will, I think it would be very difficult to say that he had any other than an estate in fee simple. And, if I were compelled to confine myself to this view of the matter, it would follow that a subsequent conveyance of the legal estate to the testator, in any other form than in fee, would be a revocation of the devise. But the devisee has a right to refer to the particular terms of the proviso for redemption in the mortgage deed, as shewing an agreement between the mortgagor and the mortgagee that, upon re-payment of the mortgage money, the premises should be re-conveyed, not simply to the mortgagor in fee, but in some other special form; and if the legal estate was, in fact, re-conveyed in the form in which, by the terms of the proviso, it was agreed to be re-conveyed, the re-conveyance does not operate as a revocation of the devise. What, then, are the terms of the proviso for redemption as to the re-conveyance of the premises on payment of the mortgage money? They are to be re-conveyed unto the said H. C. Plowden, his heirs, appointees or assigns, or to such other person or persons, to such uses and in such manner as he or they shall direct. A question here arises, whether the words "unto the said H. C. Plowden, his heirs, appointees, or assigns," are to be construed as designating the person or persons to whom the premises were to be re-conveyed, or the form in which the re-conveyance was to be made. The language of the proviso throughout seems to favour two constructions, for it imports that the appointees of Plowden (as well as Plowden himself, or his heirs or assigns) may pay off the mortgage debt, that the re-conveyance is to be made upon the request and at the costs and charges of Plowden, or of his heirs or of his appointees or assigns, and that not only Plowden himself, or his heirs or assigns, but his appointees also, should have the right to direct to what persons, and to what uses, and in what manner the estate should be re-conveyed. The word "appointees," which is used several times in the proviso, seems in every instance to be used to designate some person or persons to whom Plowden might appoint the estate previously to its being re-conveyed. If this is the construction which ought to be put upon the words "unto the said H. C. Plowden, his heirs, appointees or assigns," that is, if the parties agreed by this proviso that the premises were to be re-conveyed to Plowden or to his heirs, or to his assigns, or to his appointees in the alternative, that could only mean to one or other of those persons in fee, and then it is clear upon the authorities that the re-conveyance which was made to Plowden, not in fee, but to the common uses to bar dower, would be a revocation of the devise. And the addition of the words "or to such person or persons, &c. as he or they may direct," would not have any effect to prevent the revocation. But let us now take the other supposition, and assume that the words "unto the said H. C. Plowden, his heirs, appointees or assigns," are to be construed as designating the form in which the premises were to be re-conveyed to Plowden, which is the view most favourable to the devise; upon that assumption I think that the word "appointees" would be sufficient to justify the introduction into the re-conveyance of a power of appointment, and that if the re-conveyance had been made to the use of such persons and for such estates as Plowden should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of Plowden, his heirs and assigns, such re-conveyance would have been in conformity with the proviso, and would not have worked a revocation. If so, the question is reduced to this: do the other words "unto the said H. C. Plowden, his heirs or assigns" justify the re-conveyance to the use of Plowden for life, and after the determination of that estate by any means in his lifetime to the use of a trustee during his life, with remainder to the use of Plowden in fee; or (to put the same question in another form) if by the proviso for redemption it had merely been agreed that on repayment of the money the estate should be re-conveyed to Plowden, his heirs or assigns, and the re-conveyance had been made to the use of Plowden for his life, and then to the use of a trustee during his life, and then to Plowden, his heirs and assigns; would this have been a re-conveyance in conformity to the terms of the proviso, so that the devise would have remained unrevoked? It appears to me that if I were so to decide, I should be acting in direct opposition to the principle of all the decided cases. An estate to a man for his life with an estate in fee simple by way of remainder, the union of the two estates being prevented by an intermediate limitation to a trustee during his life, is a very different estate from an estate in fee simple in possession. If the testator's estate previous to the conveyance had been an equitable estate in fee, his taking a re-conveyance of the legal estate for his life with a legal fee by way of remainder, the two estates being kept from uniting by the interposition of a limitation to a trustee, is not (in the language used in some of the cases) simply taking the estate home, but it is creating a new and different limitation of it. And, according to all authority, if the effect of the re-conveyance is to create a new limitation of the estate different from the equitable estate which the testator had at the date of his will, or different from that which would be created by pursuing strictly the terms of the contract for the re-conveyance, the effect is a revocation of the devise.

It has indeed been argued before me that the words "unto A. B. his heirs, appointees or assigns," constitute an apt and appropriate formula for expressing briefly all the limitations ordinarily contained in a conveyance to the common uses to bar dower, including not only the general power of appointment, but also the limitation for life to the party in whose favour the conveyance is made, and the remainder to him in fee, with the intermediate limitation to the trustee to prevent the union of the life estate and the remainder in fee. And it was contended that the formula in question is often used for that purpose, and that in the present case, because the indenture of mortgage to Newton recites the indenture of April 1811 by which the estate had been conveyed to the testator to the common uses to bar dower, that therefore in effect the proviso for redemption ought to be read as if it had stipulated that on payment of the mortgage money the premises should be re-conveyed to the same uses to which they had been limited by the indenture of April 1811.

I should have been well pleased if I could have acceded to this argument, but I look in vain to the language of the proviso for redemption for finding any reference to the indenture of April 1811; in fact, it does not contain the slightest trace of any such reference. If it had been intended that upon the repayment of the mortgage money the premises should be re-conveyed to the same uses to which they had stood limited by the indenture of April 1811, it would have been easy to have so worded the proviso for redemption as to have expressed that intention. The recital of that indenture in the mortgage deed cannot in my opinion be considered as introduced for the purpose of shewing that the parties intended the re-conveyance to be made to the same uses as were expressed in that indenture; in fact, such recital was introduced for another purpose, viz. that as the conveyance to the mortgagee must be by an exercise of the power of appointment as well as by lease and release, it was necessary to recite the indenture creating the power, and that recital would have been equally introduced whatever might have been the intention of the parties as to the form of reconveyance when the mortgage debt should be paid off. And with regard to the suggestion that the words "unto A. B. his heirs, appointees or assigns" are often used as a formula for expressing all the limitations ordinarily contained in a conveyance to the common uses to bar dower, I answer that they are so used only in loose parlance, and not in the formal and appropriate language of a deed, and that such use of them is inapt and inaccurate. For granting that those words sufficiently indicate a power of appointment, and that they would constitute an apt and appropriate formula for expressing a limitation to the use of such persons, and for such estates as A. shall appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of A. in fee, how do they indicate the dividing and parcelling out of the fee into a life estate, and a remainder in fee, with an intermediate limitation to the use of a trustee during the life of the tenant for life? I cannot decide that a contract to convey to A, his heirs, appointees and assigns, does import that the conveyance is to be made in the special form of limitations to the use of such persons, and for such estates as A. shall appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of A. for life, and after the determination of that estate in his lifetime, to the use of a trustee during his life, and after the determination of the estate so limited to the trustee, to the use of A, his heirs and assigns. I may refer to the judgment of Lord Langdale in Bullin v. Fletcher (3) as a clear and (as I think) unimpeachable authority on this part of the case. I am, therefore, constrained to conclude with respect to the mortgage property, that by the re-conveyance from Newton to the testator of the 7th of December 1813, the devise of that property was revoked.

With respect to the purchased property, the case is even still more clear. Indeed, the only argument that could be offered as a ground for holding the conveyance from the vendors by the indenture of the 9th of November 1811 did not revoke the devise was this:—that as that indenture expressed that the conveyance was made in pursuance of the agreement for the purchase, it is to be inferred that there was a special contract between the testator and the vendors, that the purchased lands should be conveyed to the testator, not in fee, but to the common uses to bar dower. Even if the fact were, as assumed by this argument, that the conveyance was expressed to be made in pursuance, I could not have concurred in the conclusion. The purchaser of a fee simple estate has a right to have the estate conveyed to any uses or in any manner he may please to direct: and to whatever uses or in whatever manner the estate may be conveyed by the purchaser's direction, the conveyance might with equal propriety be expressed to be made in pursuance of the agreement for the purchase, although there was no special proviso in the contract as to the particular uses to which the estate was to be conveyed by the vendors. But further, the very foundation of the argument fails, for upon examination of the language of the indenture of the 9th of November 1811, it will be found that the conveyance is not expressed to be made in pursuance of the agreement for the purchase. It will be remembered that lot 1, for which the testator had bid 1,800*l.* at the sale, comprised the freehold in question, and certain leaseholds. The indenture of the 9th of November 1811, which only conveys the freeholds, recites that Plowden was allowed and declared to be the highest bidder for, and purchaser of, the premises comprised in lot 1, at the price of 1,800*l.*, and that it had been ascertained that the hereditaments intended to be thereby conveyed which formed the freehold part of the said lot 1. were of the value of 400*l.*, and that it had been agreed that the said 400*l.* should be the apportioned part of the said sum of 1,800*l.* to be paid in respect of, and as the purchase and consideration money for, the hereditaments thereafter expressed to be thereby conveyed; and the indenture witnesseth that in pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of 400*l.* paid to the vendors by Plowden, the vendors convey the freehold hereditaments in question to Plowden to uses to bar dower. So that the words "in pursuance of the said agreement" refer not to an agreement for the purchase of the land, for no such agreement is specified, but to the agreement which is specially mentioned as to the 400*l.* being the apportioned part of the whole purchase-money which was to be paid in respect of the freeholds. With respect, then, to the purchased property, I am of opinion that by the conveyance of the 9th of November 1811 the devise of the property was revoked.

The only question which remains for consideration is this, whether the testator's heir claiming these lands by descent, and claiming also certain benefits under the will, ought to be put to his election as regards either the mortgaged or the purchased property. It is to be observed that the mortgaged property is not specially mentioned in the will, but the will does specially mention, amongst the real estates devised, the lands which the testator had contracted to purchase, situate in or near the parishes of Boldre or South Baddesley. I will assume in favour of the devise (although the fact is not clearly ascertained), that the purchased property now in controversy is part of the hereditaments thus specially mentioned and devised by the will. And in considering the proposition that the heir ought to be put to his election, I will have regard more particularly to the lands specially mentioned and devised, because if the proposition cannot be maintained as to those lands (as in my opinion it cannot) à fortiori, it cannot be maintained as to those lands which are not specially mentioned and devised.

The argument on the behalf of the devisee is this:—that the effect of the testator acquiring by the subsequent conveyance a different estate from that which he had at the date of his will, is not (properly speaking) a revocation but ademption, that the estate or interest which he had when he made his will, is indeed gone from him, and therefore the devise cannot operate upon it; but the words of the devise are not expunged from the will; that they are still capable of expressing and do express the testator's intention to devise the lands there specially mentioned, so that at the testator's death, when the will comes into operation, the devise of the particular lands still stands part of the will, and the testator died seised of those very lands; and although by the rule of law the devise cannot actually pass the estate which the testator acquired by the subsequent conveyance, yet as the heir, by asserting his right to take the estate by descent, would defeat or disturb the express disposition of that estate by the will, he ought, according to the plain principle of election, to give up his right to take the estate by descent or abandon the benefit intended for him by the will. Now, it may be admitted that if his heir, by asserting his right to take the estate by descent, would defeat or disturb an express disposition made by the will of that estate, which he thus claims by descent, he ought to be put to his election according to the decisions in Theilsson v. Woodford and Churchman v. Ireland; and therefore the only question is, whether the testator, by his will, made an express disposition of that estate, which the heir claims by descent. What is the estate which the heir claims by descent? It is that estate in fee simple in remainder (expectant on the determination of the estate limited to the trustee during the testator's life) which became vested in the testator by the conveyance made to him after the date of his will. Has, then, the testator, by his will, made an express disposition of the estate which became vested in him by that subsequent conveyance? The devise in the will is, of "all and every my messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and all other my real estate whatsoever, or which I have contracted to purchase, situate in or near the parishes of Boldre or South Baddesley, in the said county of Southampton, or elsewhere in England, of or to which I, or any person or persons in trust for me, am, is or are seised or entitled for any estate of freehold and inheritance, or of freehold only, in possession, reversion, remainder or expectancy, or which I have power to dispose of or appoint by this my will." In this language there is nothing which points to any estate or interest which the testator might have at a future time; on the contrary, the terms of the devise refer exclusively to such estate or interest as he then had at the time when he framed the devise. He had an estate or interest to which the language was properly applicable, and which, but for the subsequent conveyance, would have passed by the devise. What is there which indicates the slightest intention to devise another estate and interest which was not then vested in him, but which he might thereafter acquire? It is a rule which ought to be strictly adhered to that puts the heir to his election. The testator's intention to devise or dispose of such estate or interest as he might thereafter acquire, must be expressly and unequivocally manifested by the will; and in this will there is not the slightest trace of any such intention. To shew that the language here used by the testator must be held to refer exclusively to the estate or interest which he had at the date of his will—I may refer to the cases of Rudstone v. Anderson (4) and Hone v. Medcraft (5), and the judgment of Lord Eldon in James v. Dean (6). It is true these were cases of leaseholds, but that is immaterial with respect to the question whether the words of the devise are to be construed as pointing only to the testator's present estate or interest, or to such estate or interest as he might thereafter acquire. Being then of opinion that the testator has expressed his intention to devise only the estate or interest which he had in the lands at the date of his will, and not such other estate or interest as he might thereafter acquire, I am brought to the conclusion that the heir does not, by claiming these lands by descent, defeat or disturb any disposition made, or intended to be made by the will, of that estate which has descended upon him, and that, therefore, he ought not to be put to his election. In truth, the disposition which the testator had made by his will with regard to these lands, has been defeated in his lifetime by his own act in taking such a conveyance as put an end to the estate or interest which he then had, and which was alone intended to be disposed of by his will, and vested in him a new and different estate which the will does not manifest any intention to dispose of. Upon the whole of the case, I am of opinion that the devise in the testator's will, so far as relates to the lands comprised in the indentures of the 7th of December 1813 and the 9th of November 1811 respectively, was revoked by those respective conveyances, and that those lands did not pass by the will, but descended on the testator's heir-at-law, and that the heir ought not to be put to his election. I must, therefore, dismiss the petition.

LORDS JUSTICES. } WEBB v. THE DIRECT LON-1852. } DON AND PORTSMOUTH
Mar. 5, 6, 25. } RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway—Landowner—Abandonment—Specific Performance.

An agreement was entered into on behalf of, and was confirmed by a railway company, in consideration of a landowner's opposition to the bill being withdrawn, to pay him 4,500l. as the purchase-money of land not exceeding eight acres to be taken by the company for the formation of their railway, and for consequential damages to the landowner's property. The railway was abandoned, and the landowner filed a claim for specific performance, and the same was decreed by the Court below; but on appeal,—Held, that the plaintiff had means of complete redress at law, and that the claim must be dismissed.

By an agreement, dated the 23rd of July 1845, signed by and made between Mr. Crowley, Mr. Baines and Mr. Laurie, three of the promoters of an act of parliament for making a railway from the Croydon and Epsom Railway, at Epsom, to the town of Portsmouth, to be called "The Direct London and Portsmouth Railway," on behalf of themselves and all other the promoters of the said act of the one part, and Mr. Philip Barker Webb of the other part, it was agreed as follows:—"First, that the company to be incorporated under the said act of parliament, when passed, shall, &c. (build a bridge and make a road, and keep the bridge in repair as specified) between points A. and B. mentioned in the plan annexed thereto. Secondly, to deviate from their proposed line as delineated in the said plan so far to the eastward thereof as to avoid a particular meadow of Mr. Webb.

(5) 1 Bro. C.C. 261.

Thirdly, that if the company shall be empowered to buy a piece of land mentioned from the Dean and Chapter of Salisbury, lying between the deviated line and the meadow aforesaid, they shall convey it for a nominal consideration to Mr. Webb. Fourthly, the company shall build an archway (described), and keep the same in repair. Fifthly, that they shall allow Mr. Webb a crossing over the line on a level at a stated point, and keep gates there. Sixthly, that they shall plant evergreens at a particular spot. Seventhly, that they shall only erect invisible fences at particular places. Eighthly, that they shall not erect any station visible from the mansion house. Ninthly, they shall not deposit waste or spare earth, &c. on any of the lands of Mr. Webb, except those taken by them, without his consent in writing. Tenthly and lastly, that the said company shall pay to the said Philip Barker Webb the sum of 4,500*l.*, together with his costs, charges and expenses incurred up to the day of the date of this agreement, by reason of the intended formation of the said railway, not exceeding the sum of 150*l.*, before the company shall enter on any of the lands of the said P. B. Webb for the purpose of making the said railway; and that all timber and other trees on the lands to be taken by the said company shall be the property of the said P. B. Webb. And it is hereby declared that the said sum of 4,500*l.* is to be the purchase-money for the said lands so to be taken by the said company as aforesaid for the formation of their railway, not exceeding 8 acres, according to such deviated line as aforesaid across the property of the said P. B. Webb, described in the said plan, and for the consequential damage to such property." At the foot of the agreement, and bearing even date with it, the following memorandum was written, and it was signed by the agent of Mr. Webb :—"It is understood and agreed by and between the parties above named, that in the event of the act of parliament referred to in the foregoing agreement not being obtained, the agreement for the purchase hereinbefore contained shall be null and void.—C. J. Woods."

The act of parliament (9 & 10 Vict. c. lxxxiii.) was passed on the 26th of June 1846, and on the 5th of April 1847 a deed under the common seal of the company was executed, whereby, after reciting various matters relating to the proposed line, the opposition of Mr. Webb and his subsequent withdrawal therefrom, and the agreement of 1845, it was witnessed that in consideration of the withdrawal of the opposition of the said P. B. Webb to the said bill, the said company did ratify and confirm the agreement made on their behalf by Mr. Crowley, Mr. Baines and Mr. Laurie, and covenanted with Mr. Webb to perform, fulfil and keep all the covenants and agreements entered into by them in that instrument. And in consideration of that covenant Mr. Webb released those three gentlemen from all the covenants entered into by them in the agreement and from all liability in respect of the same, and also covenanted that he had full power to execute such release.

The company entered on the lands of Mr. Webb for the purpose of survey and taking levels, &c., and in so doing, or otherwise, felled at least one timber tree, but, as on the part of Mr. Webb was alleged, many trees. The line was ultimately abandoned, and after a negotiation which led to no practical result, the company having declined to pay the 4,500*l.*, Mr. Webb filed a claim, in which he alleged the ground of the agreement to have been his withdrawing his opposition to the bill in parliament, and which is recited in the deed of 1847, and that he had before the agreement of 1845 incurred costs by reason of the intended railway amounting to more than 150*l.*, and after offering specifically to perform the agreement of 1845 on his part, prayed the specific performance of it by the company. On the hearing, before Vice Chancellor Turner, His Honour made a decree for the plaintiff, 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 566, and from that decree the company now appealed.

Sir W. P. Wood and Mr. Moxon, for the plaintiff.—This agreement is a binding unconditional agreement for the taking of the land, not exceeding 8 acres, at a stated price, and the consideration for its being entered into by the company was the withdrawal of opposition, which by the legislature itself is considered a proper subject of bargain—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 Vict. c. 18. But the company by their acts have shewn the agreement to be binding, for they have entered on the lands, which by the instrument it was stipulated they should not do until the price was paid. But there is authority to shew that they are bound to complete notwithstanding the railway has been abandoned. In Bland v. Crowley (1) this was expressly decided, and there the landowner obtained 8,000*l.* That case related to the same line of railway as the present. In Shirley v. Davis (2) a purchaser was compelled to take land by the possession of which he became a churchwarden of Greenwich when he wanted to be a freeholder of Essex, and the reason was because he should have inquired. In this case the company made their bargain, and they are bound to complete their contract. Even Mr. Webb himself cannot say the actual amount of loss, setting out of view all question of inconvenience, he has sustained by reason of his property being tied up, and for which he believed and still believes he has a right to receive the 4,500*l.* In the case of Preston v. the Liverpool, Manchester and Newcastle-upon-Tyne Junction Railway Company (3) the Court was of opinion that as the plaintiff had withdrawn his opposition to the bill in parliament, the company, according to the true construction of the agreement, were bound to pay the sum agreed to be paid to him, although they had not taken possession of any part of his estate. The case, it is true, as to the right of action was sent for the opinion of a court of law, but of the construction of the agreement one of your Lordships seemed to entertain no doubt. In the judgment are contained the following remarkably apposite remarks, "There was, therefore, nothing anomalous in stipulating for a fixed sum to be paid for the benefit of that assent, including also what was matter of lesser moment, namely, the price of the land through which the railway would pass, whether for that purpose more or less might be required."

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Malins and Mr. W. J. Bovill, for the company.—This agreement is wholly conditional, and was entered into on the supposition that the railway would be made through the lands of Mr. Webb, and consequently that the 8 acres would be required. The price of 4,500*l.* was not intended as the value of the land, but, as is most expressly stated in the agreement itself, is the price for the consequential damage for severance,—a severance which has never taken place. Then the parliamentary powers conferred by the act have expired, and if the company were to buy this property they are not permitted to hold it. To compel a specific performance, even if the Court can see its way to specific performance at all, would be the greatest injustice to the company, as the question is one simply of damages, and one which, as is shewn by the case cited for the plaintiff of Bland v. Crowley, is most fitly and most conveniently tried at law. A decree for specific performance is in such a case contrary to the principles recognized by this Court—Harnett v. Yeilding (4) and Kimberley v. Jennings (5). Mr. Moxon was heard in reply (6).

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH. — Since this matter was first brought before us in the former argument both my learned Brother and myself have had ample opportunity of considering it, and having formed a strong opinion upon the case, we think it is not useful to detain the parties, but to give our opinion at once. This is a claim, the object of which is to get the specific performance of a contract, or alleged contract, contained in a deed of covenant entered into by the defendants. That deed of covenant is a deed binding on the parties who entered into it, namely, the railway company, to carry into execution certain articles of agreement, or alleged articles of agreement, entered into by three gentlemen, Crowley, Baines, and Laurie, with the plaintiff on the intended formation of the company. What the plaintiff says is, that according to the true construction of that instrument, these three gentlemen bound themselves, among other things, to pay to him the sum of 4,500*l.* by way of purchase-money for any eight acres of land of his, within certain limits, which the company should think fit to take for the purpose of making their railway; that the 4,500*l.* was to be accepted by him from the company as the purchase-money of the land, and as the consideration for the consequential damage to his property; and he contends that that instrument amounted to such a contract; that the defendants, the company, after that company came into existence pursuant to the act of parliament, entered into a deed, whereby they bound themselves to adopt that as their contract, upon the consideration that he released the contracting parties; and now he asks as against these defendants specific performance of that which he alleges to be the contract to purchase this property.

(6) The case for the plaintiff was heard on the 5th and 6th of March, and on the latter day Mr. Bethell addressed the Court for the company. Mr. Malins then offered that the company should pay Mr. Webb's parliamentary costs not exceeding 150*l.*, and all the costs of the suit, and also the sum of 500*l.* for compensation. This offer was refused, and on the 25th Mr. Malins and Mr. W. J. Bovill were heard for the company, and Mr. Moxon then replied.

The first question,—and a very important one it is,—is whether there is any contract at all? Upon the view we take of this case, it does not become necessary for us to give any positive opinion upon that subject. In the case before me, when I was Vice Chancellor, of Preston v. the Liverpool and Manchester Railway Company, it appears by the note at the end of the report that I gave the parties the opportunity of trying the question, a mere legal question, at law. I do not apprehend that I had myself any sort of doubt there about the contract, and that case can afford no authority for the present; I mean that part of the present case which consists of the doubt whether the contract was entered into at all. No doubt if the Portsmouth Railway had been formed, and the land taken, there was a contract that would have bound the parties; but the railway not having been formed, the question is, whether, under the circumstances, the contract to purchase ever arose. On the part of the plaintiff, it is said the construction must be that there was a contract. On the part of the defendants, it is said such is not the reasonable construction, for if there was no railway, there was no contract to sell or purchase at all; and although the nine clauses preceding the tenth of the agreement appear to be absolute in form, namely, that the company shall make a bridge over the railway, and do such and such other acts connected with the railway, yet that it is necessarily implied that such works were to be done if the railway was formed, and the whole was conditional on the existence and formation of the railway. I say that what is the true construction of the contract is matter at all events of a very doubtful nature. Assume, for the purpose of the argument, and for that only, that the contract is such as that contended for by the plaintiff. I will call it the agreement of the defendants, under their seal, that they would select a portion of the plaintiff's land, lying within certain limits, not to exceed eight acres, and to take it for the purpose of the railway, and to pay him 4,500*l.* as the purchase-money for what they should so take. The plaintiff seeks the specific performance of that contract. It is the plain doctrine of the Court, that it is not upon every contract that the Court will interfere to decree specific performance. It does so, to give more complete justice to a party who seeks the aid of this Court, where a contract has been entered into to purchase an estate. It may often happen that the mere legal remedy of recovering damages for the non-performance of the contract would afford very inadequate relief, and from the earliest time it has been the doctrine of this Court to interfere to make the party do that which he has engaged to do, namely, convey the land he has agreed to sell. Whether, in order to give a corresponding remedy on the other side,—or for what other reason we need not stop to inquire,—but undoubtedly the same relief is also given, unless there be some reason against it, to the vendor who seeks to have the purchase-money. But even in the case of a suit by a purchaser, if there be circumstances rendering it unjust that the Court should interfere, the Court will not interfere in his favour; and I should say much more readily will the Court listen to an objection that is made against a vendor seeking a specific performance, because, of necessity, the vendor can get complete relief at law. Looking at that principle, let us see whether this is a case in which we ought to interfere.

I assume the instrument to amount to a contract, such as the plaintiff alleges it to have been. I think this is not only a case in which we ought not to interfere, but it is a case in which we should be exactly reversing the order of things, and making the machinery of this Court instrumental in doing injustice if we did interfere, because the only relief we could give would be to decree the payment of 4,500*l.* But here it is admitted, that what the contract amounts to is really this:—A contract to pay 4,500*l.* : to select eight acres of the plaintiff's land, and take it from him; and for such land and consequential damage to pay the 4,500*l.* Now, what the plaintiff would have to do at law, as I believe, would be to state this contract, and state the default, the breach of that contract on the part of the defendants—which will be their not having taken the eight acres of land; and not having so done, of course, consequential damage—and not having paid the 4,500*l.* The amount of damage to be calculated will, then, as I conceive, be, a calculation made on the aggregate what, taking all these circumstances into consideration, will do justice? Whereas the relief that would be afforded in this Court would be positive injustice. It would be giving to this gentleman 4,500*l.* as the purchase-money for that which they have not taken, and which, I believe (for there is reason to think that their parliamentary powers are gone) they never can now take. I do not, however, wish to commit myself on that subject. It may be that they could still take it and re-sell it. At all events, it is one of those cases in which, assuming the instrument to amount to what the plaintiff says it amounts to,—a contract to pay 4,500*l.* by way of purchase-money and compensation for damage to be done to other land,—he has the ready means of obtaining complete redress at law; and, we think, to that redress he ought to be left. Our opinion is, that this claim ought to be dismissed; but, we think, under the circumstances, not with costs, and without prejudice to the rights of the parties in an action. I own I very much regret, and my learned Brother concurs in that, that the offer that has been made has not been acceded to.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Lord Cranworth has spoken for himself as well as for me. I should have thought that the very obscurity of this instrument would have been alone a bar against decreeing a specific performance; but I am far from intimating that obscurity is the only reason.

Company—Winding-up Acts, 1848 and 1849—Contributory—Provisionally-registered Association—Provisional and Managing Committee-men having accepted Shares—Order for Call for Expenses of Winding up—Objection to Master's Report.

*An association was provisionally registered, but no deed of settlement was executed, and it was ordered to be wound up. The Master, by his report, found that the only contributories were provisional and managing committee-men, who had agreed to take shares, and thereby became liable equally among them to the expenses of forming the concern and to the expenses of its being wound up; that the greater part of the expenses had been paid by means of calls and other payments: but for paying all the remaining expenses, costs of winding up, &c., which he estimated at a certain sum, money must be raised by a call of 60*l.* on each of the contributories. He accordingly made an order for a call, dated the same day as his report:—Held, that each contributory was liable to pay the call; that the principle on which the Master had proceeded was correct; that it was no objection to the call that if all the contributories paid, more than sufficient would be raised; and that it was unimportant whether the liabilities were liquidated or unliquidated.*

Held, also, that the call, being founded on a report, which the contributories had an opportunity of questioning, but which they did not question, could not be impeached on the ground of any invalidity of the report.

The company or association under the above title was provisionally registered in 1845, but no deed of settlement was ever executed, and on the 3rd of November 1849 its affairs were ordered to be wound up. On the 30th of July 1851 Master Brougham made a report, in which he stated, "I have proceeded with the said reference, and have settled on the list of contributories the following persons as contributories, being members of the provisional and managing committees with their own consent, and having agreed to take one or more shares, upon such share or shares being allotted to them according to the provisions of the said company, and to each of whom twenty-five shares were allotted, that is to say,"—[here followed a list of forty persons, among them Mr. Dale.]—The Master then stated that on the 12th of July 1850 he made a call on these persons of 150*l.* each, which produced 858*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.*, which was expended in paying 79*l.* 16*s.*, a claim on the company; 188*l.* 14*s.* in paying Cottle's costs, as directed by the House of Lords; and 556*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.* in part payment of the expenses of winding up; leaving 34*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.* in the hands of the official manager. That from the books of the company it appeared that 11,243*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.* was incurred in debts and expenses, all of which had been discharged by contributories in unequal proportions, with the exception of 216*l.* 0*s.* 8*d.*, which still remained due. All this was founded on the books of the company and the report of the official manager. The report then proceeded, "And I find that there have been costs ordered by the Court to be paid by the official manager, and which are already taxed, amounting to the sum of 237*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.*, of which the sum of 188*l.* 14*s.* has been paid by the official manager as aforesaid, leaving 48*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* still remaining unpaid; and that in the winding up of the affairs of the company, the official manager has, by himself and his solicitor, expended large sums of money and properly incurred costs, which, together with the costs so ordered to be paid, I estimate will amount to 1,248*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.*, and upwards; and the said official manager has proposed to me, that for the purpose of paying outstanding liabilities, and adjusting the claims of the contributories, and for raising the sum of 1,248*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* for the costs of the winding up, a call should be made of 60*l.* on each of the said contributories so settled on the list as aforesaid. And I am of opinion and find that the sum of 5,227*l.* 3*s.*, being that part of the expenses incurred between the 1st of November 1845, being the date of the consents to act as provisional committeemen and take one or more shares, signed by each of the said committee-men as aforesaid, and the 1st of December 1845, being the day on which the said managing committee decided on suspending all proceedings, were expenses necessarily incurred in preparing to launch the common concern in which the said several contributories had engaged; and I find that each of the said several contributories so settled on the list as aforesaid is legally liable to bear and pay his rateable proportion of the said necessary expenses of the committee in preparing to launch the common concern, and also to bear and pay his rateable proportion of the costs incurred in winding up this company, and I am of opinion it is necessary and proper to raise the said sum of 5,227*l.* 3*s.*, being the amount of the expenses incurred as aforesaid between the 1st of November and the 1st of December 1845, and also the said sum of 1,248*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* for the said costs, by means of a call of 60*l.* upon each of the several before-mentioned contributories, each of the several contributories who has already made any payment by way of contribution to the said expenses, or otherwise, having credit given him for the amount so paid by him against such call; and I direct an order for the call of 60*l.* to issue against each of such several contributories upon whom notice of the intended call has been served, as appears by the affidavit of William Lowther, clerk to the official manager, sworn before me on the 30th of July instant."

The Master, on the same 30th of July, made a peremptory order for the call of 60*l.* on each of the contributories mentioned in the report, and peremptorily ordered each contributory to pay to the official manager, on the 28th of August then next, "the balance, if any, which will be due to him, after debiting his account in the company's books with such call."

From this order for the call Mr. Dale appealed, asking that it might be discharged or varied, and the same was heard before Vice Chancellor Kindersley, who considered that as the report on which the call was founded was not questioned, the order for the call could not be interfered with, and therefore dismissed the appeal. This appeal was heard on the 16th of December 1851.

On the 31st of January 1852 the decision of the Vice Chancellor was appealed from, when, after some discussion in which it was said that as the report and call were made on the same day, Mr. Dale had had no opportunity to shew that the report was wrong, it was agreed that he ought to have the opportunity then of doing so by the production of further evidence to shew his non-liability, or to shew that the evidence on which the Master had acted was wrong, and thereupon their Lordships directed the motion to stand over, "with liberty for the appellant to make such application to the Master as he might be advised, with liberty to any party to apply." Mr. Dale, therefore, made an application to the Master to alter his report; but as no new evidence was produced to shew that the facts stated in the report were wrong, nor any evidence which would shew his non-liability, the Master refused to vary his report; he also refused to make any modification of the order of the call.

March 8.—Mr. Glasse and Mr. Greene, for the appellant.—The whole foundation of this matter is erroneous. The Master has no jurisdiction to make that which he has designated a report. He has stated his finding of certain alleged facts, and embodying them in a paper which seems to be placed with the file of proceedings, he has denominated that paper "a report." A report to whom it does not state, nor does the Master shew. If it be a report, it is a report to no one but himself. Even supposing, for the sake of argument, that this document can be termed a report, and as such acted on by the Court, still it was made on the very day the Master made and signed his peremptory order for a call. The appellant had no means of questioning its validity, and ought not to be held bound by the order for the call, founded as it is upon such an irregular and obscure document. No evidence is adduced to shew that the amount for which the call is made is justified by the amount of the debts and costs of the company to which the contributories are liable; all that the Master has done has been to make a guess at the amount, and without giving the contributories the opportunity of shewing that his surmise is incorrect, he has made the peremptory order for the call. This is contrary to the principle of Upfill's case (1) and Hunter's case (2), both before one of your Lordships. The order for the call ought never to have been made, and therefore ought now to be discharged.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Roxburgh, for the official manager.—As this order for the call is based upon the report of the Master, and as that report remains unquestioned, the order for the call is valid and binding on all parties. If an attachment be issued, the party against whom it is issued cannot be permitted to dispute its validity so long as he does not question the correctness of the judgment, decree, or order under which it has issued. If Mr. Dale could have shewn that there were no costs, no expenses to be provided for, whereas the report states there are, he should have done so, and in proving the report to be erroneous, the order must have actually fallen. So far from doing so, Mr. Dale never applied to the Court, as he might have done, under the 99th section of the Winding-up Act of 1848, for leave to impeach the report; nor did he even, as he might have done under the liberty afforded by this Court, on the 31st of January, make any attempt to shew that the report was erroneous. He must, therefore, be held bound by that report, and all its natural consequences will follow, if, as is the case without doubt or question, on the face of that report there is sufficient to shew that he is liable. This is shewn by the statement of Mr. Dale's consent to act as a managing committee-man, and at the same time consenting to take shares. By all this so shewn he rendered himself, equally with the other contributories named in the report, liable for the debts incurred in the attempt to form this company. The amount of this liability the Master has ascertained, whether consisting of costs, or debts, or otherwise. Then, the Master having ascertained the data on which to found his report, goes on to apportion the debt among the parties liable, and he has made the call accordingly. It must be admitted that the present call of 60*l.*, added to the former call of 120*l.*, would, if all the contributories should pay up the full amount, produce a sum more than enough to meet the sums stated in the report; but the Master, acting on the authority given by the 83rd section of the act of 1848, and the 28th section of the act of 1849, has made the best calculation he could of the probabilities of payment. These sections, in effect, enabled the Master, after having ascertained the liabilities, to make such a call as should appear to him to be probably sufficient to raise the amount of them, having regard, among other things, to the circumstance, if it appeared to him probable, that some of the contributories might not be in a condition to pay. For all these reasons, the course the Master has taken appears to be correct, and the appeal ought to be refused, with costs.

Mr. Glasse, in reply.—No legal liability is shewn in the report to exist, and the legislature never meant to say that parties should be liable under an order for winding up, where there was no liability before. All that appears on the report is, that the official manager thought fit to state to the Master something as to the appellant being bound by the call. Because he did not question a report which he had never the means of seeing, or even of knowing of its existence, before the call was made, the Court will not permit it to stand in his way. At any rate, the only order which the Court will now make will be similar to that in Ex parte Hall, in re the North of England Joint-Stock Banking Company (3), namely, that the motion should stand over, with liberty to the official manager to take such proceedings at law as he may be advised, and no step to be taken against Mr. Dale as a contributory in the mean time.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—We are both of opinion that the decision of the Master is perfectly right. The Master's order proceeds upon a preceding report of even date, and no doubt some anomaly and difficulty might exist in dealing with that in point of form, because what Mr. Roxburgh says is perfectly true, that if the parties object to the order, because the foundation of the order proceeded upon an error in point of fact, that is, on the supposition that the parties were liable to something for which they were not liable, that which ought to be objected to would be the foundation, and not the order; in other words the report, and not the order. The report being in this case concurrent with the order of the same date, and being, therefore, in all probability a document to which the parties affected by the order never had access, there is in point of form, or there might have been, some difficulty. But that is a difficulty which this Court would not listen to for one moment. If the party were damaged by an order, proceeding upon a report, which he had no practical opportunity of questioning, the circumstance that he made his complaint to the form of the order itself, and complained against the order instead of against the report, would be a matter which this Court certainly would not have listened to. We should have given him an opportunity of questioning the report, in some way or other, and thus of permitting the substantial merits to be decided. We did, at least we thought we had done so, by giving the party an opportunity of going before the Master to make any application he might be advised to make, and if he had any means of questioning the accuracy of that which the Master calls, and probably ac-cursately calls, his report, by shewing that it was inaccurate, no doubt he would have done so. Not having done so, I think we are bound to assume that that report is substantially correct as to the demands that are existing against this association or company, or by whatever name it is to be designated.

Taking that to be so, what the Master finds in substance is this: that the contributories of this company consist now only of forty persons; that every one of these forty persons is liable to the same amount, each having been liable, because they all on the 1st of November 1845 agreed, being members of the provisional committee, to take shares, and they so rendered themselves liable to the expenses thereafter to be incurred of forming the company. Mr. Dale was one of these parties, and has been said—but I do not go much on that—to have been a leading member of it. Expenses were incurred between that day and the 1st of December following, to the extent of 5,000*l.* and more. The Master finds all that, and, therefore, carrying into execution the principle laid down in the House of Lords, in Upfill's case, (followed by me, at least in this sense followed by me in Upfill's case, that I did not at all question what the House of Lords had done—but shewed only or attempted to shew to what extent it did apply,) the Master follows out these views, by saying, "What the House of Lords has directed, followed by what the judgment of the Vice Chancellor has directed, is this—that I am to ascertain to what extent each and every of the contributories are liable. Having done that, I am to make a call to meet that liability. I do ascertain what is the extent to which the contributories are all liable, namely, five thousand and odd pounds, in respect of liabilities incurred at a given period. They are liable to that; they are liable also to the costs of winding up the concern, which is their concern, and their concern exclusively. There is no other contributory, no other liability to be at all wound up." The Master, therefore, further says, "As a call must be made to meet this 5,000*l.*, together with the costs, I now will do with regard to the costs the best that the nature of the thing enables me to do. I cannot tell to a shilling what it will be, but I estimate and make the best account I can, and having made out that account, which is made out with practical accuracy, I find that the whole amount is, the sum of 5,000*l.*, together with another sum of 1,200*l.* Therefore to that 5,000*l.* plus the 1,200*l.*, the parties are to contribute. Almost all of it has been paid, that is by means of another call, and I suppose payments before any call was made; large sums have been paid on account; but in order to equalize all this, and to do justice, I now, having made a call of 120*l.* before this time, make a call which, in my judgment and the judgment of the official manager, will meet the case with practical accuracy,—a further call of 60*l.*" I think that is all the Master can do, or ought to do. He has no possibility of arriving at a conclusion as to what absolutely to the fraction of a farthing these persons will have to pay. This section clearly shews that the act did not mean to impose a practical impossibility in point of figures. That is not what he is to do. Having ascertained all the data on which he is to proceed—having ascertained that the parties before him are all equally liable to these outstanding liabilities, so far as there are any outstanding, they are to equalize them among themselves so far as they are to be liquidated, and are to contribute to the costs. "I make that which, on the best estimate I can come to, will raise the sum which will be necessary." That I think is all the Master can do. He seems to me not only not to have come in conflict with my decision in Upfill's case, as was argued by Mr. Glasse, but to have carried into effect the principle I laid down there, and which until I am set right I believe was the correct principle: neither does he come in conflict with Hunter's case, which simply was this, that the Master has no right because a man is a contributory, which may mean nothing but that he is liable to 5*l.*, to say, "I now rate you with all the rest of the contributories of 5,000*l.* costs." That was the principle I laid down in Hunter's case, but which does not touch the present case, for here the Master proceeds upon the data, on which he has come to the conclusion, in respect of the liabilities to third persons—whether liquidated or unliquidated is unimportant,— because, if liquidated, they have been liquidated in unequal proportions. He says further, "the parties liable to this are the forty;—the parties liable to the winding-up are the forty; the gross sum necessary for liquidating the two sums will be met by the call, and this call I make." I think the Master was quite right in making that call; and, therefore, the motion must be refused, with costs.

LORDS JUSTICES. }
1852. } PATERSON v. SCOTT.
Mar. 6, 9, 15, 16. }

Will—Construction—Payment of Debts—Primary Fund—Marshalling applicable to Legatees and Annuitants.

A testator directed his debts to be paid out of a fund after provided; he directed his real estate to be sold, and out of the produce his debts and funeral expenses to be paid, the residue to be held by the trustees upon certain trusts; he afterwards gave certain legacies and annuities; and he then bequeathed his personal estate, "after and subject to the payment of his debts, funeral expenses, legacies and annuities," to the party chiefly interested under those trusts, absolutely:—Held, that the personal estate was the primary fund for the payment of the debts.

Held, also, that the doctrine of marshalling was applicable in favour of legatees and annuitants, who were, therefore, decreed to stand in the place of the specialty and simple contract creditors as against the real estate devised in trust for sale, and payment of debts.

This was an administration suit. George Watkins, by his will, dated the 26th of December 1840, directed that all his just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses should be fully paid and satisfied by his executors, with all convenient speed, out of the fund thereafter provided for payment thereof. And he gave and devised all his freehold and leasehold messuages or tenements, lands and hereditaments at Pimlico (excepting one particular house), to certain trustees, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns upon trust for sale; and he directed, that out of the monies to arise by the sale, and the rents and profits until such sale, his said trustees should pay and satisfy all his just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and the costs, charges and expenses of such sale, and after payment thereof to lay out and invest the residue in their names upon certain trusts therein particularly mentioned, for the benefit of H. E. C. Scott and her three sisters; and the testator gave and bequeathed several annuities or yearly sums, free from taxes and clear of all other deductions whatsoever, by equal half-yearly payments, the first half-yearly payment thereof to begin and be made at the end of six calendar months after his decease unto the persons thereafter named, and amongst them, to John Jennings, his servant, one annuity of 30*l.*; which said several annuities he directed to be paid to the said several annuitants during their respective natural lives in manner aforesaid. And as to all and every his goods, chattels, credits, monies and securities for money, and all his personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, not thereinbefore by him otherwise disposed of, after and subject to the payment of his just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and the annuities thereinbefore bequeathed, he gave and bequeathed the same and every part thereof unto Hannah E. C. Scott absolutely. The testator appointed H. E. C. Scott and several other persons executors. Two of them only, namely, W. S. Paterson and G. W. S. Jago, proved the will. Those persons filed the bill against H. E. C. Scott and other persons interested under the will, for the administration of the estate of the testator. At the hearing upon further directions, before Vice Chancellor Shadwell, a question was argued whether the testator had not by the expressions in his will shewn an intention to charge his real estates primarily with the payment of the debts. His Honour was, however, of opinion that he had not, and therefore that, according to the ordinary rule, the personal estate would be the primary fund for the debts, and that the testator's specifically bequeathed freehold and leasehold estates were not nor was the produce thereof subject to the payment of the pecuniary legacies and annuities: and so decreed.

An appeal was presented against this decree by the annuitant of 30*l.*, John Jennings.

Mr. Moxon and Mr. W. Marshall.—The effect of the decision of the Court below will be to exclude the appellant, amongst others, from any benefit under the will, as the debts, which chiefly consisted of mortgage debts to a considerable amount created by the testator himself, will exhaust the personal estate. The testator has indicated an intention sufficiently plain to make his real estate a primary fund for the payment of his debts. The fact that he directs the application of the rents and profits until a sale, in payment of debts, and then that it is only the residue after payment of debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, which is to be held upon the special trusts, indicates sufficiently clearly the object the testator had in view. The fact subsequently appearing of a gift of the personal estate subject to the payment of the debts, makes no difference, for the same thing occurred in the case of Hancox v. Abbey (1), where a testator devised his real estate upon trusts for sale, and a direction that a particular mortgage debt should be paid off, and another sum raised and paid to his two daughters. He then bequeathed his personal estate, subject to the payment of his debts, in a particular way. There, upon the plain intention apparent on the will, it was held that the mortgage debt was not to be paid out of the personal estate, nor the particular sum directed to be raised, but that the real estate was liable to both. Sir William Grant there observed, after admitting the general rule, that a devise to sell for payment of all debts would not exonerate the personal estate, because that shewed only an intention that all the debts should be paid, that clearly the testator died under the persuasion that he had disposed of the whole of his real estate, and the decree was to exonerate the personal estate. In the case now before the Court, the testator as evidently intended all his real estate to be sold, and only the surplus produce after payment of the debts to be held upon the trusts.

(1) 11 Ves. 179.

Mr. Rolfe, Mr. Cole and Mr. Beavan, in support of the decree, were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—Independently of many well-known older authorities, there is the case of Collis v. Robins (2), before my learned Brother, and in which he had occasion to consider all the authorities (though Hancox v. Abbey does not appear to have been cited), in which the testator had devised his real estate to trustees in trust for sale, and out of the proceeds and out of the rents until a sale (the same as in the case before the Court) to pay his debts and certain legacies, and he then gave his personal estate to his god-son, Thomas Robins. There it was held that, as between the heir-at-law and Thomas Robins the personal estate was the primary fund for payment of the debts. I quite agree in that decision. We are both of opinion that the decree of the late Vice Chancellor of England was right, and that there is nothing in this will to take the case out of the ordinary rule, by which in the absence of intention, either express or implied on the part of a testator, to exonerate his personalty, that personalty is the primary fund for the payment of the debts.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Has it occurred to counsel to consider that although the personalty is primarily liable to the debts, still a case of marshalling may arise as between the legatees and annuitants on the one hand, and the parties entitled to the produce of the freehold and leasehold estates on the other, to the extent of the mortgage debts upon the devised estates?

Mr. Moxon said the question had not been considered, and asked that the case might stand over in order that the authorities might be looked into.

March 15 and 16.—Mr. Moxon.—The general rule as to marshalling applies to this case, and the annuitants and legatees are entitled not only to stand in the place of mortgagees, but also in the place of all the other specialty and simple contract creditors of the testator as against the real estates devised for sale and payment of the debts; and if it be so, a great injustice will be averted, for there will be sufficient for the annuitants and legatees to be paid in full, and none of the objects of the testator's bounty will be wholly disappointed. Here the creditors can resort to two funds for the payment of their debts, namely, to the money to arise from the sale of the real estate devised expressly for the payment of debts, and the general personal estate of the testator, while, on the other hand, the annuitants can only claim payment out of the latter. In Foster v. Cook (3) it was held that there was a charge on the land of the debts, and that the legatees must come upon the real estate so far as the personalty had been applied in payment of debts. The same was held in Bradford v. Foley, in a note to the same report, and in Webster v. Alsop, also in the same note, a testator directed all his debts to be paid out of his personal estate, and if that was deficient he charged his real estate with so much as was deficient, and then he devised his real estate to trustees, subject to annuities and other payments upon certain trusts, and gave several legacies: and it was held, that as the personal estate was deficient, the legatees were entitled to stand in the place of the creditors for so much of the personal estate as had been exhausted by them in payment of their debts. Counsel also cited:—

Arnold v. Chapman, 1 Ves. sen. 111.

Norman v. Morrell, 4 Ves. 769.

Aldrich v. Cooper, 8 Ibid. 396.

The following treatises were also referred to—Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers, Ram on Assets, Williams on Executors and Jarman on Wills.

Mr. Cole.—There is no marshalling in favour of legatees and annuitants as against real estate devised, although for the payment of debts, and the legatees cannot stand in the place of the creditors against the devisees.

s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 22.

But even if this be not so, and the Court should think that there should be a marshalling as to the ordinary debts of the testator, there can be no marshalling as to the funeral and testamentary expenses.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Will there be enough to pay the annuities? If so, there will be no need to go into the second branch of the argument.

Mr. Cole said there would be enough.

Mr. Beavan was not heard.

Mr. Moson was not called upon to reply.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—We are both clearly of opinion that the doctrine of marshalling is applicable to this case, and that the cases of Foster v. Cook, and of Webster v. Alsop and Bradford v. Foley in the note to it, are directly in point. There are, indeed, some few dicta to be met with which may be thought to lean the other way; and, indeed, in Mirehouse v. Scaife Lord Cottenham, under similar circumstances, held the doctrine of marshalling not to be applicable; but in that case the authorities do not appear to have been cited, nor the point to have been drawn to His Lordship's attention. That decision appears to have been made per incuriam. In the important case of Aldrich v. Cooper Lord Eldon expressly recognized the doctrine of marshalling in such a case as distinguished from a case where the land was devised, but not charged with debts. "The case," observed his Lordship, "is exactly the same with reference to the distinction taken, that where lands are specifically devised the legatees shall not stand in the place of the creditors against the devisees; for that is upon the supposition that there is in the will as strong an inclination of the testator in favour of a specific devise as a pecuniary legatee; and, therefore, there shall be no marshalling. But if, though specifically devised, the land is made subject to all debts, that distinguishes the case, for there is a double fund; and as by that denotation of intention the creditor has a double fund—the land devised and the personal estate—he shall not dis-appoint the legatee." It is true this was only a dictum of Lord Eldon, but it is fully borne out by the authorities, which shew that the doctrine of marshalling is applicable to this case. There must be a declaration in favour of the right of this annuitant.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—It is true, as my Lord Cranworth has stated, that the passage he has read from Aldrich v. Cooper is only a dictum of Lord Eldon; but it is to be observed, that a dictum of that most distinguished Judge is almost as valuable as a decision. The authorities seem clear, and the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 104, although passed to render real estate liable for simple contract debts, seems rather to favour the doctrine of marshalling in such a case than otherwise. The order will be to declare that the pecuniary legatees and annuitants are entitled to stand in the place of the mortgagees, and specialty and simple contract creditors in respect of the produce of the freehold and leasehold estates devised in trust for sale and for payment of debts, to the extent that such creditors have exhausted or shall exhaust the general personal estate.

Mr. Cole applied for the costs, as the appellant had failed on the principal ground on which he disputed the decision of the Court below; but

Their LORDSHIPS considered that as he had succeeded on the question of marshalling, the costs ought to come out of the estate, and the deposit be returned.

Nov. 12.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—

(1) 5 Ves. 737.

This is an appeal by Sarah Ann Spashett, the wife of John Spashett, against an order of the late Vice Chancellor of England, dismissing a petition presented by her, for a reference to the Master, to approve of a proper settlement. Under the will of Thomas Upton, the appellant was entitled to a share in a part of his residuary estate, and by an order of the 15th of November 1829, in a suit for administering the estate of Thomas Upton, it was ordered, on the consent of the appellant, given in court, that that share amounting to 306*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* Bank 3*l.* per cent. annuities, and 303*l.* 14*s.* 5*d.* reduced annuities, should be paid to her husband. Under the same will the appellant and her husband were each entitled to a share in a fund set apart for securing an annuity, and payable upon the termination of the annuity. By an indenture of the 25th of October 1831, which was in the lifetime of the annuitant, the appellant and her husband, in consideration of 140*l.*, assigned to William Harding their respective shares in the annuity fund. In 1833 the appellant's husband took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act, and his estate became vested in Thomas Allen, as the assignee under the insolvency. The interest of William Harding and Thomas Allen afterwards became vested in the respondents, the trustees of a Reversionary Interest Society, who, in 1837, procured a stop-order on the shares of the appellant and her husband in the fund reserved for the annuity. The appellant, Mrs. Spashett, has four infant children; no settlement was ever made on her and her children. Her husband has also received in her right, under the same will, a sum equal to double the amount of that which is the subject of this petition. In Hilary term, 1850, the appellant presented a petition praying for a reference to the Master to approve of a proper settlement on herself and her children of 346*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, being her share of the annuity fund, and which was then distributable in consequence of the death of the annuitant. The reversionary society, the respondents, appeared and opposed the petition, and the late Vice Chancellor of England by an order, dated the 23rd of February 1850, dismissed the petition, and as I understand, on the ground that as the respondents claimed to be entitled to the fund, the wife's right to a settlement of that fund, or any part of it, could only be set up by a bill bringing the respondents before the Court. I am of opinion that the petition ought not to have been dismissed upon this ground, but that, upon principle and authority, the petitioner was entitled to the relief she prayed by the petition. I see no reason or advantage in putting the parties to the more expensive litigation by bill. There can be no question between the parties which cannot be discussed upon the petition equally as well as in the new suit; the only effect of which would be additional delay and expense, exhausting a very small fund. The reasons for driving the parties to that, ought to be very clear and decisive to induce the Court to adopt them. In my opinion, nothing short of clear proof that justice cannot be properly administered upon the present petition, ought to induce the Court to abstain from deciding upon the right claimed by the petitioner, and no such case has been made out by the respondent. No authority which has been cited is inconsistent with the opinion which I have formed.

In Greedy v. Lavender, a married woman and her husband had assigned her reversionary interest in a trust fund, and the assignee deposited the deed of assignment as a security with Richard Kirkman Lane; the interest ceased to be reversionary in the lifetime of the husband and wife; the wife then presented a petition for a settlement, and Lord Langdale directed that a settlement should be made. The suit had not been instituted at all in connexion with any question relating to the wife's right as claimed by the petition, and it also appears from the report of this case on another point, in 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 62, that the married woman and R. K. Lane were co-defendants; and yet no objection was made by counsel for the latter, that the petitioner ought to have proceeded by bill. I have inquired of the Registrar, and I am told that it is the constant practice of the Court in such cases to proceed by petition. If the respondents had been parties to the present suit as plaintiffs, I see no reason why the question of the equity to the settlement should not have been decided on petition, and neither do I perceive any reason why it should not now be decided on petition. In my opinion the respondents, although neither plaintiffs nor defendants, have by the obtaining a stop-order brought themselves before the Court sufficiently to enable it to deal with the case. The effect of the stop-order is, that the fund cannot be paid out without notice to them; it has not the effect of varying the mode of proceeding by the party entitled to the fund; it only entitles them to notice, so as to give them the power of opposing the payment of the money out of court; they have availed themselves of that notice, and have opposed such payment, and by so doing have brought themselves before the Court so as to enable it to decide, if there should be any just cause why the Court should not deal with the fund according to the rights of the parties; and unless they can shew that the question cannot be decided without the machinery of a distinct suit, I think it is the duty of the Court to adjudicate on the question between them and the appellant.

Upon the general question of the wife's right to a settlement out of her absolute equitable chose in action—whether against her husband or against his assignees in bankruptcy or insolvency, or against a particular assignee for valuable consideration,—I think no doubt can be entertained in the present day, and it would be a waste of time to refer to the authorities. As respects the husband himself, the wife's claim to settlement is considered as a clear equity, and as respects those claiming under him the rule applies, that the assignee must take subject to the equities of his assignor. Doubts were formerly entertained as to the equity to a settlement as against a particular assignee for valuable consideration; but it was decided by Lord Northington in the case of The Earl of Salisbury v. Newton (2), that a wife has an equity for a settlement even against a particular assignee for valuable consideration. In Macaulay v. Phillips (3) Sir R. P. Arden said, "I am clearly of opinion an assignment for valuable consideration will not bar the equity of the wife." In Wright v. Morley (4) Sir W. Grant, who was quite familiar with the question, explains the reason why the wife's equity should prevail even as against a purchaser. "If the husband has but the right of reducing the wife's interest into possession, how can he for valuable consideration or otherwise convey more than he has?" "If the assignee acquires a right different from that which the husband had, the husband parts with something different from what he has." In Elliott v. Cordell (5) Sir John Leach said, where an absolute equitable interest is given to the wife, the Court will not part with the fund in favour of the husband without making provision for the wife, or without her express consent; and all who claim under the husband must take his interest subject to the same equity. The amount which is to be settled is discretionary, and depends on the particular circumstances of each case. In Brett v. Greenwell Alderson, B. said, "It appears to me the insolvent's wife and her children are entitled to the whole fund, and, if I am bound by the practice of the Court to take away from her any portion of it, I will take away a shilling." In Gardner v. Marshall (6), the whole was settled on the wife for her separate use, in consequence of the large sums the husband had received from the wife's family, the fact that she was not provided for, and her former circumstances and condition in life. In the present case I think that the whole should be settled upon the wife, as the husband received double the amount of this fund under the order of the 15th of November 1829, and no settlement has ever been made on the wife or her children. I have the less hesitation in directing the whole to be settled, as the assignees only paid 140*l.* for the two shares of the husband and wife. The appeal must be allowed, and it must be referred to the Master to approve of a proper settlement of the funds mentioned in the petition.

Mr. Lee submitted that a reference was unnecessary, and that the fund ought to be paid to trustees for the wife.

Mr. Giffard agreed to this, for the purpose of saving expense.

And it was ordered accordingly.

TURNER, V.C. }
Feb. 20, 21. } ADAMS v. JONES.

Will—Construction—Misnomer of Legatee.

The Court will not hold a testamentary disposition to be void for uncertainty if there is a reasonable degree of certainty as to the testator's intention. Therefore, where a testatrix bequeathed a legacy to the wife of a person by the name of one of their daughters, an infant of tender years,—Held, on claim by the husband and wife, that they and not the daughter were entitled to the legacy, and that the gift was not void for uncertainty.

This was a claim by Thomas Adams and Hannah his wife against the sole executor and residuary legatee of Mary Ann Garrett, for payment of a legacy of nineteen guineas bequeathed by her will to Clare Hannah Adams, the wife of Thomas Adams. The name of the plaintiff's wife was Hannah only, but the name of one of his daughters (who at the date of the will was only two years old) was Clare Hannah Adams.

Mr. Chapman Barber, in support of the claim, argued that the misnomer of the legatee was remedied by the description of her as the wife of the plaintiff: that the description of wife rendered it unnecessary to mention the name of the legatee—Co. Litt. 3 a; and that it was impossible to surmise that the testatrix intended the legacy for the infant child of the plaintiff. He cited Pitcairne v. Brase (1).

Mr. Begbie, for the defendant, argued first, that the daughter of the plaintiffs might have a better claim than her parents to the legacy in dispute, as, amongst other reasons, it was possible that the words "daughter of Hannah" might have been omitted by mistake from the will; and secondly, that the legacy was void for uncertainty. On the second point he cited—

Thomas v. Thomas, 6 Term Rep. 671.
Doe d. Le Chevalier v. Huthwaite,
3 B. & Ald. 632.

He also referred to—

Newbolt v. Pryce, 14 Sim. 354.

Blundell v. Gladstone, 11 Sim. 467;
a. c. 1 Ph. 279; 12 Law J. Rep.
(N.S.) Chanc. 225.

Mr. C. Barber replied.

Feb. 21.—TURNER, V.C. after stating the clause in the will bequeathing the legacy, said—The case is peculiar, for the name of the wife of the plaintiff is Hannah Adams only, and he has a daughter whose name is Clare Hannah Adams. The questions are, therefore, whether the plaintiff's wife or his daughter is entitled to the legacy; and whether the bequest is void for uncertainty. Now, I think that no disposition by will is to be held void for uncertainty if the Court can arrive at a reasonable degree of certainty as to the testator's intention. On the will in this case, I think the Court can arrive at a reasonable degree of certainty. The testatrix could not have been mistaken in the description of the legatee as the wife of Thomas Adams; and it could not have been an infant of two years old whom she thus designated. If, therefore, there has been any mistake, it must have occurred in drawing up the will, and either in taking the instructions or putting them into form. Now, can the Court presume that such a mistake occurred here? I think not, and that the Court is not justified in the case of this particular will in making such a presumption; but, on the contrary, I think that this will must be taken to have been drawn up correctly. The gift differs from that in Doe v. Huthwaite, where the testator gave to Stokeham Huthwaite, the second son of John Huthwaite (Stokeham being in fact the third son of John), in which it is probable that the testator knew the name, and only added the words "second son" merely as a description. But in the present case, the testatrix must have known who was the wife of Thomas Adams, and probably made a mistake in her name. The cases of Blundell v. Gladstone and Newbolt v. Pryce lay down the same principle; and I shall therefore make a decree for payment of the legacy and interest as asked by the claim.

Costs, Security for—Feme Covert—Husband out of the Jurisdiction.

Bill by a feme covert by her next friend:—Held, that an objection, stated in the answer, that the next friend was in needy circumstances, and that security for costs ought to be given, could not be taken at the hearing of the cause.

Suit by a feme covert in respect of her separate estate, in which her husband was named as a defendant. The plaintiff proved at the hearing that her husband was out of the jurisdiction:—Held, that the suit was properly constituted.

The bill in this case was filed by Mrs. Monday, a married woman, on behalf of herself and all other the creditors of Mr. Waghorn, against the personal representatives of Mr. Waghorn, in respect of a debt due to her from the estate of Mr. Waghorn, to which debt she was entitled for her separate use.

The defendants, by their answer, stated that the next friend of the plaintiff was in needy circumstances and unable to pay the costs of the suit, and claimed the same benefit by their answer as if they had demurred to the bill, or moved that all proceedings should be stayed until a new next friend was appointed or security given for costs.

The husband of the plaintiff was named as a defendant, but he was out of the jurisdiction.

The cause now came on to be heard.

Mr. Torriano, for the plaintiff.

Mr. Karlake, for the defendant, objected to the hearing of the cause on the grounds, first, that the next friend was in needy circumstances—Smyth v. Myers (1), Drinan v. Mannix (2); and, secondly, because the husband was out of the jurisdiction.

Mr. Pownall, for the other parties.

(1) 3 Madd. 474.

(2) 3 Dr. & War. 154.

PARKER, V.C. said that the first objection raised was that the circumstances of the next friend were such as to render security for costs necessary. This, however, was not an objection which could be taken at the hearing. The other objection was, that the plaintiff was a married lady, suing by her next friend, her husband being out of the jurisdiction. The general rule was, that, where a married woman sued in this court by her next friend, she must make her husband a party to the suit. In the present case the plaintiff had done this by naming him as a defendant on the record. She had done all that she could. It would be a denial of justice if she could not institute a suit because her husband was out of the jurisdiction. The case then came to this, there was a creditors' suit, and there must be the common administration decree.

Insurance—Specific Legacies—Illegitimate Son.

A testator bequeathed certain chattels to A, and afterwards insured them from loss by sea. The testator embarked with these goods in a ship, which was totally wrecked, and he and the chattels perished together:—Held, that A. had no interest in the money recovered by the executors from the insurance office.

A testator gave the residue of his estate to B, the interest to be paid to her until her first-born son should attain the age of twenty-one years; one-half of the said principal sum then to be paid to her aforesaid son, the other half to be paid to his mother. Should his mother die before the said son, the whole to be paid to him. Should the aforesaid son die before his mother, his share to go to her. B. had one illegitimate son at the date of the will, who was maintained by the testator:—Held, that this son was not entitled under the above bequest.

Daniel Friend made his will, dated the 10th of December 1847, which contained the following bequest:—

"I give and bequeath unto my father aforesaid, and my three brothers, George, John, and Stephen Friend, the whole of my wearing apparel, sea clothes, charts, mathematical and musical instruments, to be equally divided share and share alike; and I give unto my aforesaid adopted daughter, Eliza Friend, my gold watch, gold chain, and pianoforte, with all musical books and pieces belonging thereto."

The testator then bequeathed one half part of his residuary personal estate on the trusts therein named. The will then proceeded as follows:—

"I give and bequeath the other half unto my adopted daughter, Eliza Friend, the interest and dividends to be paid to her half-yearly, until her first-born son attain the age of twenty-one years; one-half of the said principal sum then to be paid unto her aforesaid son for his own absolute use and benefit; the other half to be paid unto his mother, my adopted daughter aforesaid; but should his mother die before the said son attain the age of twenty-one years, the aforesaid interest and dividends shall be paid unto the said son for his maintenance and education until he attain the age of twenty-one years, then the whole of the said principal sum to be paid unto him for his sole use and benefit. Should the aforesaid son die before he attain the age of twenty-one years, I bequeath his share or moiety unto his mother for her own absolute use and benefit, and I declare that the same shall not be liable to any debts, controul, or engagements of any husband she may hereafter marry, and that her receipt alone shall be a sufficient discharge for the same."

At the date of the will the testator was possessed of some wearing apparel, sea clothes, charts, and mathematical and musical instruments, and a gold watch and chain, which, in February 1848, he insured in the Royal Exchange Insurance Company for 200*l*.

The testator, who was a seafaring man, afterwards embarked in the ship Canton for China, taking all these articles with him. The ship was totally wrecked in the North Pacific Ocean, on her homeward voyage, and the testator and all hands perished.

The will of the testator was proved by the executors, and in 1849 they received from the insurance company the amount for which the articles were insured.

The bill in this suit was filed by the executors of the testator against the specific and residuary legatees.

One of the questions raised was, whether the testator's father, and brothers George, John, and Stephen Friend, and Eliza Friend were entitled to the sum received from the insurance office in respect of the articles specifically given. The other arose from the following case:—"Eliza Friend, named in the will, had an illegitimate child, who was born in 1844. This child was maintained at the expense of the testator, who was in the habit of advancing money from time to time for that purpose." The question was, whether the testator under the description of "the first-born son" of Eliza Friend intended to benefit this child.

The above-mentioned facts had been found by the Master on a reference made to him.

The cause now came on for further directions on this report.

Mr. B. L. Chapman, for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Welford, for the defendants, contended, first, that the illegitimate child of Eliza Friend was entitled; and, secondly, that the specific legatees were entitled to the sum received from the insurance office. On this point he cited Rook v. Warth (1), Norris v. Harrison (2), Parry v. Ashley (3), and Rogers v. Grazebrook (4), which were questions relating to money received from insurance offices, in respect of houses burnt down, and Sillick v. Booth (5).

PARKER, V.C.—Eliza Friend, the legatee in this case, had an illegitimate son. The testator knew of this, and made provisions for its maintenance. It has been suggested that this son should take, as a person designated, certain benefits given by the will to the first-born son of the legatee. Now, from the language used by the testator, the gift for the first-born son would be strictly applicable to a legitimate son. There are no circumstances in the case to take it out of the general rule, and I must, therefore, hold that the illegitimate child in this case has no interest in the property.

As to the other question, I think that as the testator and the articles perished by the same act, the legatees never had any interest in them. Had the testator perished before them, it might have been different. I will, however, think of this point further.

PARKER, V.C.—The testator, being a seafaring man, bequeathed chattels to certain persons. He and the chattels perished together. These chattels he had previously insured. The question is, whether the legatees are entitled to the money received from the insurance office. If the testator had died, leaving the goods in existence, the legatees would have had an interest in them, and it would have been quite reasonable that the executors should have held the policy in trust for them. If the chattels had wholly or partially perished in the lifetime of the testator, and no money had been received from the office, the testator would have had, at the time of his death, a right of action on the policy, and it is clear that the legatees would not have had any interest in the money to be recovered by means of it. Here, however, the testator and the goods perished together. It is a very difficult thing to say how such a case should be dealt with. I thought of the case several times; but I am unable to change the opinion I expressed before, which is, that the legatees never had any vested interest, under the will, in the chattels, and that they are not entitled to the money recovered from the office.

WACE v. MALLARD.

Will—Construction—Precatory Words—Gift for Wife and Children.

A testator bequeathed all his property to his widow, her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, for her sole benefit, in full confidence that she would appropriate and apply the same for the benefit of his children:—Held, that this amounted to a gift of an estate for life in the property to the widow, with a power of appointment in favour of the children, with a gift in default of appointment to the children as joint tenants.

Mr. Mallard made his will, dated the 20th of March 1823, in the following terms:—"I give, devise, and bequeath all my estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature or quality soever, which I shall or may be possessed of, interested in, or entitled unto, either in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy at the time of my decease, unto my dear wife Mary Mallard, her heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, to and for her sole use and benefit; in full confidence that she, my said wife, will in every respect appropriate and apply the same unto and for the benefit of all my children." The testator then appointed his wife his sole executrix.

The testator made a codicil to his will, dated the 27th of May 1826, which was as follows:—"Since the making of my last will and testament on the 20th day of March 1823, I have built two houses called Melville Place, Devonshire Hill, in the parish of Hampstead. Now, my will and desire is, that all my right, interest, and property in that estate should be disposed of to my beloved wife Mary Mallard for the same intents and purposes as in my last will my other property is directed to be applied to."

The testator died in September 1828, leaving four children.

Mrs. Mallard, by her will, gave the property bequeathed by the will of the testator to the four children for their lives, with remainder to their issue.

The question in this suit was as to the effect of the will of the testator.

Mr. Nevinson, for the plaintiff.

Mr. Russell and Mr. Toller, for the children of the testator, contended, that the widow had only an estate for life, with a power of appointment among the children; and that, in default of appointment, they took as joint tenants. They cited Crockett v. Crockett (1).

Mr. W. M. James, for the grandchildren, contended, that the widow took the property absolutely, subject only to the charge of maintaining the children.

Mr. Shebbeare, Mr. C. H. Keene and Mr. Urquhart, for other parties.

Mr. Russell replied.

PARKER, V.C. said that he thought that the widow took a life estate with a power of appointment among the children, and that the gifts by the will to the children for life were valid, but that the remainders over were an excess of the power. The children of the testator took the unappointed part of the property as joint tenants.

Baron and Feme—Separate Use without Power of Anticipation.

A sum of stock was vested in trustees upon trust to pay the dividends to A, a married woman, for her life, for her separate use, without power of anticipation, and, after her decease, to pay the capital to B. On the petition of A. and B, the Court ordered a transfer of a portion of the stock to B, and a sale of such other portion as would be sufficient to purchase a government annuity equal to the dividends of the two sums of stock, and that the sum thereby produced should be laid out in the purchase of such annuity, to be settled on A. for her separate use, without power of anticipation.

A testator bequeathed all the residue of his personal estate to trustees, upon trust to pay the income to his daughter for her life, for her separate use, without power of anticipation, and, after her death, to pay the income to her husband, for his life; and, after his death, to divide the capital among the children who should attain twenty-one.

The testator's daughter was sixty-three years of age, was married, and had four children, who were all of age, and the capital was invested in the funds.

This was a petition by one of the sons praying for the sale of a part of the stock which represented his share, and the payment to him of the proceeds, and for the sale of such other part as would be sufficient to purchase a government annuity for his mother equal to the dividends of the two sums of stock to be sold, such annuity to be settled on her for her life, for her separate use, without power of anticipation.

This petition was consented to by all the parties interested in the fund.

Mr. Russell and Mr. G. L. Russell, for the petition.

Mr. Bichner, for the other parties.

PARKER, V.C. made the order.

Domicile.

A Scotchman, a surgeon, came to England and was appointed hospital mate in the Haslar Hospital. He subsequently was appointed an assistant surgeon, and afterwards surgeon on board various ships of the Royal Navy. He was then for several years employed under the Admiralty on board various convict ships, and also upon other medical duties. During this time he twice, while on half-pay, re-visited Scotland and remained there up to the time of obtaining employment, but he ultimately, while on duty, died at Malta:—Held, though he removed all his goods from Scotland, and also his sister and only relation, and never afterwards returned, that he had not lost his domicile of origin.

William Conborough Watt, by his will, dated the 11th of January 1830, gave to his sister Margaret, as then of London, but who died in his lifetime, all his wages and money due for service as therein mentioned, to purchase an annuity for her, for her life, and he gave her all the rest and residue of his estate, both real and personal, and appointed her and Richard Smith, surgeon, of Lasswade, near Edinburgh, executors of his will.

The testator died without altering his will, which was proved by Richard Smith, in the Prerogative Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and this bill was filed by William Brown, John Bryson, and Christina Brown, his wife, and Margaret Brown Waddell, the first being the maternal uncle, and the two last the maternal aunts of the testator, W. C. Watt, against R. Smith, for the administration of his estate in this court.

Upon the hearing of the cause, a reference was directed to the Master to ascertain, among other things, the domicile of the testator at the time of his decease, and he, by a separate report, dated the 26th of November 1850, found, that W. C. Watt was born in Scotland, of Scotch parents, and was baptized, on the 12th of June 1795, in the parish of New Monkland, in the county of Lanark, and was educated in Scotland for the medical profession.

The testator had one brother, Thomas Watt, and an only sister, Margaret. Thomas Watt was an assistant-surgeon in the Royal Navy, and resided chiefly at Deptford, in the county of Kent, and upon his death was buried at Greenwich.

W. C. Watt resided in Scotland until 1811, when he came to England and was appointed a surgeon in the Royal Navy, and was employed as hospital-mate at Haslar Hospital.

In 1812 he was appointed assistant-surgeon to Her Majesty's ship Aboukir. He then employed H. Stanger of Clement's Inn as his agent in England, upon whose decease he was succeeded by Joseph Dufaur, and afterwards by his son, and from time to time he remitted money to them for investment in England.

After serving in several ships, the testator, in May 1817, was appointed acting surgeon in the Raccoon, in which he remained until December 1818, when, for the first time, he was put upon half-pay. He then returned to Scotland, and resided there until January 1821, when he returned to England, and was appointed surgeon of the Grasshopper, in which he continued until January 1824, and about February in the same year was appointed surgeon of the Arachne, in which vessel he served in India.

On the return of that ship in October 1826 he was for the second time put upon half-pay, and again went to Scotland. On arriving in Glasgow he found the circumstances of his family much altered for the worse, his mother had died in that year, and his father, who died in March 1833, had become of irregular habits, and his sister Margaret was in circumstances and in society very unsatisfactory.

The testator then left Glasgow, taking his sister with him, and went to reside at the house of Richard Smith, at Lasswade, where he placed his sister in the boarding school of the Misses Mutter, and continued to reside there until the autumn of 1828, during which time he took the degree of M.D. from the University of Glasgow.

In 1828 he expressed a desire to obtain a private practice in England, but as none offered he visited Falkirk, in the county of Stirling, and endeavoured, but unsuccessfully, to make arrangements for succeeding to a business there.

In the autumn of 1828, having obtained employment, he removed his sister from school to the family of R. Smith, and was appointed surgeon to the convict ship Edward, which he held until October 1829. While on this voyage the wife of R. Smith died; the testator then removed his sister to the house of a lady near London.

In December 1829, the testator was appointed surgeon of the Roslin Castle convict ship, and before sailing made his will; he left this ship in December 1830, and in January 1831 was appointed to the Exmouth convict ship, which was lying at Deptford: he took his sister with him, and placed her in the house of a lady there: he also caused her pianoforte to be removed from Scotland to her then residence. The testator subsequently served on board the ship Mary, and was afterwards for a short time with a marine detachment at Spike Island, off the coast of Cork, when, in April 1834, he was appointed surgeon to the Temeraire, and to the ships in ordinary at Sheerness, which he held until the end of September 1839, when he was for the last time placed upon half-pay.

While at Sheerness the testator's sister Margaret resided with him in the town.

After being placed on half-pay he was appointed secretary to the medical officers of the Navy, who were then raising a fund among themselves to present a testimonial to their chief, Sir W. Burnett. This required his presence in London, and he accordingly removed with his sister and took lodgings at Pimlico, where he resided until 1841, during which time he pressed his claim for employment and promotion in the Navy. There being a prospect of employment which would complete his period of service and entitle him to retirement, the testator wrote two letters to R. Smith, dated the 8th and 18th of December 1840, requesting him to procure a residence in or near Edinburgh for his sister, in one of which he said, should he be spared to return, "it is more than probable that my final abode will be in Scotland, unless I shall succeed to a staff appointment." Lodgings such as described were not obtained.

Early in October 1841 the testator was appointed a Deputy-Inspector of Fleets, and joined the Queen at Portsmouth, and sailed for the Mediterranean, and remained in that ship until March 1843, when he was appointed Deputy-Inspector of Hospitals, and went to Malta. This appointment he held until his death there in August 1848.

He was joined by his sister at Malta, where they resided until her death in 1846; he informed Mr. Smith of that event, requested him to announce it to his friends, and asked counsel and advice as to retirement on half-pay and coming to reside at Lasswade, as the money he had realized and his half-pay would enable him to live comfortable. The testator, in conversing with John Campbell when he referred to his ultimate intentions, spoke of finally settling in Scotland, and a desire to endow certain bursaries in one or other of the universities in Scotland. Similar conversations were also deposed to by other persons.

Upon these facts the Master certified that the testator at the time of his decease was domiciled in Scotland.

The plaintiffs excepted to this report, and insisted that the testator at the time of his decease was domiciled in England.

Mr. Stuart and Mr. Hetherington, in support of the exceptions.—Had the testator been in the service of the East India Company, there would have been an undoubted abandonment of the domicile of origin, but a distinction was made when the service was under the Crown. In this case, however, the testator had abandoned his domicile of origin animo et facto, and when that was done, even if the party did return, it was necessary that it should be for the purpose of restoring the original domicile. His only brother was residing here, he removed his sister here, and all the connexions he had were here. He had found Scotland not a home; it had been made distasteful to him. He had removed himself and his sister from the land; he left there no house; he left there no property, and no connexions; he even removed his sister's piano and became a stranger in the land of his birth. On the other hand, after leaving Scotland, his intention was evidently to fix his residence in England, to make it the centre of his affairs and the source of all his future occupations. It was true he had gone subsequently to Scotland, but it was upon visits to his mother and sister, and when the former had died, he, after a temporary residence for which a purpose was apparent, removed the only remaining relation, and with her the luxuries of life, to the chosen scene of his operations, and not a doubt could be raised of its being animo manendi. His sister had followed him to Malta, they had both died there, his father had died without relations, and by the law of Scotland the present plaintiffs could take nothing as next-of-kin to his mother.

Story on Conflict of Laws, 48.

Mr. Elmsley and Mr. G. S. Carr, for Richard Smith, were not heard.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I regret that the plaintiffs, by the law of Scotland, will not obtain any advantage from the property of their maternal relative, but I can only administer the law as I find it here. The testator's time of service had been divided by three periods of half-pay of nearly two years each: on each of those occasions he had gone to Scotland and spent his time there, and had even speculated upon establishing himself either in England or Scotland; had it been in England there might have been a change, but whatever was contemplated, nothing was done, and as soon as employment in his office offered, he came to England and remained in the government service to 1826. There having been no alteration, his domicile consequently was in Scotland, as employment in the Navy creates no change in the domicile. Subsequently he was employed in convict ships, but it was in the service of the Admiralty. In October 1839 he was again on half-pay; he lived in lodgings at Pimlico, and remained there from a state of circumstances caused by hopes and necessities; that residence was, no doubt, chosen from its being contiguous to the place from which he hoped to obtain employment, and not for any fixed or permanent residence. In the case of Bruce v. Bruce the employment was for life. In the case of Ommaney v. Bingham, Sir Charles Douglas had been in foreign service before going to reside at Gosport, his only residence, but that was not so here; on the contrary, every act shewed that the residence was only until employment could be obtained in the Navy; had however any change been shewn, it must have been animo manendi, but the permanence was negated by its being only to obtain employment: and during this residence he wrote to Mr. Smith in a way which shewed the disposition with which he remained in England and his animus towards Scotland. Subsequently he went to Malta and died there; it was argued that he was disposed to marry and settle in England and not in Scotland, but this amounted to nothing, and it did not appear that the testator had lost his domicile of origin. I therefore think the conclusion of the Master right; but though I must overrule the exception, I shall give the costs out of the estate (1).

PIDDOCKE v. SMITH.

Guardian ad litem—Lunatic.

Guardian ad litem to lunatic defendant (not found so by inquisition) appointed without a commission.

This was a motion, by the plaintiff, that H. might be appointed guardian ad litem, without a commission for that purpose, to the defendant Thomas Pidcocke, a lunatic, but not found so by inquisition. The motion was supported by affidavits of the wife of the lunatic and of his medical attendant as to the lunacy; and of the solicitor in the cause as to the fitness of H. to be appointed such guardian.

Mr. W. H. Terrell, for the motion, cited Drant v. Vause (2).

Mr. H. F. Bristowe (who appeared to consent), cited Howlett v. Wilbraham (3).

TURNER, V.C. declined to make the order without a commission; but recommended the case to be mentioned to the Lord Chancellor.

Dec. 13.—Mr. W. H. Terrell mentioned the case to the Lord Chancellor, who made the order.

(1) The testator's father was illegitimate, and died in March 1833, before the testator. In Scotland, where the father succeeds to personal estate as the child's next-of-kin, he does so to the entire exclusion of the mother: she, though the father is dead without leaving any person who can succeed through him, is in no case accounted as of kin capable of succeeding to her children, dying intestate, though the property originally should have come from her.

Feb. 18. } ROSE v. GOULD.

Legacy—Residuary Legatees—Private Ledger—Debts—Set-off—Statute of Limitations.

A testator gave his residuary estate equally among his six children, and directed that sums of money appearing by his private ledger to be due from them, should in the division be brought into account:—Held, that allowance must be made for all sums appearing due, though they were barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Richard Rose, by his will, dated the 15th of June 1835, gave the residue of his estate among his six children, Richard N. Rose, Maria Gould, Hannah Bellin, Eliza Stanger, Sarah D. Rose, and William Rose, in equal shares, subject to the several provisos, directing "that in order to equalize my residuary estate between and amongst my six children, in case it shall appear by my private ledger, or any other of my books, that any, or either of them, my children, or the present or any future husband or husbands of any or either of my daughters, are indebted to me at my death in any sum or sums of money; or in case I have, or shall at any time during my life become security or responsible for the payment of any sum or sums of money, on their or any of their accounts, which shall be then outstanding and unsatisfied, then and in either or any of such cases, such debt or debts, security or securities, shall be considered as forming a part of my residuary estate, for the purpose of equalizing the same between and amongst my children; and in such case the share or shares of such of my sons respectively, or of such of my daughters whose husband or husbands shall be so indebted to me as aforesaid, or for whom or on whose behalf I may have become such security or responsible as aforesaid, of and in my residuary estate, shall in the first place be subject and liable to pay and discharge such debt or debts to my estate, or redeem such security or securities, as the case may be, and if the same shall not be sufficient for that purpose, then the deficiency shall be paid and made good to my estate by the party or parties by whom such debt or debts shall be owing, or for whom or on whose behalf such security or securities shall have been given by me." The testator then directed his son Richard's share to be invested in trust for his son Richard for life, with remainder for his wife for life, with remainder to his children.

This bill was filed on behalf of George Rose, an infant, the only child of R. N. Rose, for the administration of the estate of the testator.

It appeared that the testator kept a debtor and creditor account, in a private ledger, against all the members of his family, in which he made entries, whether to his debt or credit. At the decease of the testator, 1,557*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.* appeared to be due from his son R. N. Rose, which was made up of sums advanced and payments and interest upon balances, which had been calculated every six months, and added to the principal. Some of these were made more than thirty years ago, and were barred by the Statute of Limitations; and the question now was, what sums were to be deducted from the share to which the testator's children were entitled in the residuary estate.

Mr. Stuart and Mr. Bates, for the plaintiff.—Sums not barred by the Statute of Limitations are alone to be deducted from the shares of the testator's children; they are sums due that are to be deducted, not debts that have ceased to exist. In this case, it appears from the ledger that the greater part of the debt due from R. N. Rose is barred by the statute. The income of R. N. Rose's share ought to be invested and accumulated, to make good to the plaintiff the amount which R. N. Rose has received of the capital.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Batten, for Richard N. Rose.—The testator by his will intended benefits for his children, and he evidently meant that, what was properly speaking a debt should be deducted, and not those sums which had been barred by the Statute of Limitations. Were it otherwise, they might have been deprived of all advantage under the residuary bequest.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Sheffield, for S. D. Rose, W. Stanger, and Eliza, his wife, and other persons interested in the residue.—The testator intended that the residuary legatees should participate equally in his estate.

Williamson v. Naylor, 3 You. & C. Exch. 208.

Mr. Stuart, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The construction which must be put upon the clause is very evident. It has been contended the proviso in this will did not mean the items which appeared upon the ledger, but that it meant only what appeared by the ledger to be by law a subsisting debt; but nothing was more apparent than that what appeared to be due by the private ledger was what the testator referred to, and what he intended to be deducted. The son could only take under the will, and in doing so he must bring the debt, whatever it was, and however it was made up, into the general account of the residuary estate, for the purpose of making an equal division.

Feb. 11, 12. } PAUL v. ROY.

Foreign Debt—Conflict of Laws—Jurisdiction—Foreign Court—Interlocutory Order—Assignment—Parties.

Messrs. P. and R, the plaintiff and defendant, were writers to the Signet in Edinburgh, P. being the agent of the mortgagee, and R. being the agent of the mortgagor of an estate in Scotland, upon which various incumbrances were existing. 2,100*l.*, part of the mortgage-money, was deposited in the Bank of Scotland, in the joint names of Messrs. P. and R, to discharge existing claims upon the estate, but this sum was subsequently drawn out by them from the deposit account, and applied partly in payment of charges upon the estate, and partly to satisfy other liabilities of the mortgagor. Some creditors of the mortgagor afterwards obtained an order from the Court of Session in Scotland to arrest the money in the hands of Messrs. P. and R, and after various proceedings in Scotland an order was made upon them jointly and severally that they should re-deposit in the Bank of Scotland the fund paid out. R. did deposit a part, and afterwards left Scotland and came to England. P. then re-deposited the whole of the fund, in pursuance of the order of the Court of Session, and took an assignment of the order of the Court, and after exhausting the process in Scotland against R, and failing to enforce payment there, filed a bill in this court:—Held, that no final judgment had been obtained; that this Court would enforce a foreign judgment if final; that the order made was not final, and that this Court would not enforce an interlocutory order of a foreign court; that the assignment of the order by parties in the foreign suit did not render them the less necessary parties to this suit, and created no separate contract between Messrs. P. and R; and that this Court had no jurisdiction, and the bill was dismissed, with costs.

The plaintiff and the defendant were Writers to the Signet, and this bill was filed by Thomson Paul, asking this Court to declare that Robert Roy was bound to relieve him from all sums of money drawn from the 2,100*l.* which had been placed in the Bank of Scotland upon a deposit account, and which had been applied for purposes different from those for which the deposit had originally been made, and that he might pay the balance due, with interest, and also the sum of 27*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.* and the costs of the actions of forthcoming and multiplepoinding in the courts of Scotland, when taxed and ascertained, for which purposes it asked that accounts might be taken. It also asked in the alternative a declaration that the defendant was bound to contribute rateably with the plaintiff to make good the sums of money improperly drawn out, and pay his proportion to the plaintiff, and give him the benefit of all liens and collateral securities he might have against the estate of Robert Anstruther, in respect of the sums of money.

In February 1835 Robert Anstruther borrowed 10,000*l.* on the heritable security of an estate called "Caiplic," and Third Part, which was subject to annuities and other charges, and upon which divers of his creditors had used the diligence of inhibition, which, by the effect of the law of Scotland, created a judicial security upon the real estate of the debtor.

Upon the agreement for the loan, on the 26th of February 1835, a memorandum was drawn up as follows:—

“Memorandum as to loan of 10,000*l.* by Messrs. Wood to Robert Anstruther, the rate of interest to be 4½ per cent., and no change on either side for three years. Major Anstruther to grant an heritable bond, or disposition in security for the 10,000*l.*, interest and premiums of insurance over the estate of Third Part in common form, and also to grant a conveyance of the estate along with his present trustees, Messrs. Mackonochie & Paul, to Mr. Renton, accountant, in trust for behoof of the lenders, and the better to secure them, Mr. Renton, the trustee, to engage that any charges of management shall be postponed to the claims of the lenders for interest and insurance. The money to be applied preferably in paying the 1,000*l.* heritable bond to Lady Anstruther, and in redeeming the present annuities, amounting to 5,500*l.*, and these securities to be conveyed to the lenders as a collateral security. The following policies now subsisting on the life of Major Anstruther to be assigned to Messrs. Wood, by the respective holders, viz., Edinburgh Life, 2,000*l.*, Eagle, 2,000*l.*, Insurance Company of Scotland, 1,000*l.*; an additional insurance to the amount of 5,000*l.* to be effected for the benefit of Messrs. Wood; Major Anstruther's and Major Sinclair's bond for 1,000*l.* to be assigned, at Major Anstruther's expense, to a party, who will restrict the security, so far as regards the bond, to Messrs. Wood. The debt to Mr. Thomson's representatives to be paid out of the loan, and the inhibition discharged, as well as the other inhibitions now subsisting. The debt to Mr. Paul to be settled out of the loan, and the titles of the estate to be placed with Mr. Renton on an acknowledgment that they are so for behoof of the lenders in the action now depending at Mr. Paul's instance decerned to pass, by consent, for the amount as reported by the auditor in terms of the libel. Major Anstruther's account to Messrs. Dickson & Stuart to be paid, and the policy of 450*l.* held by them, also to be assigned to Messrs. Wood, to secure any arrear of interest at the death, Messrs. Wood to receive a proper guarantie from Mr. Renton that the sum of 2,000*l.* payable to the tenants for amelioration shall be set apart out of the present loan or in some other way equally satisfactory to them, that is to say, that Mr. Renton shall become bound to account for the rents, without abatement, for the yearly payments in respect of the said improvements.”

The 10,000*l.* was advanced by Christopher Wood alone, and under this agreement 7,900*l.* was expended, and on the 20th of May 1835 2,100*l.* remained unapplied, which Messrs. Paul and Roy agreed to deposit in the Bank of Scotland, in their joint names, upon a deposit receipt as follows:—

“Bank of Scotland, 20th May 1835.—2,100*l.*—No. —Received for the Governor and Company of the Bank of Scotland, from Thomson Paul, Esq. W.S., and Robert Roy, Esq. W.S., jointly, 2,100*l.* sterling, which is placed to the credit of their deposit account, by order of the board of directors.”

On the 27th of June 1835 the plaintiff and the defendant drew out of the Bank of Scotland 861*l.*, including a sum of 4*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* for interest, and employed it in satisfaction of claims which were considered preferable, and for the discharge of which it was alleged the deposit-money was primarily applicable, that is to say, 496*l.* 16*s.* 1½*d.*, the amount of a debt owing from R. Anstruther to Messrs. Dickson & Stuart, and secured by inhibition affecting the estate; the sum of 209*l.* 13*s.* to the plaintiff for expenses connected with the loan, and the security; 70*l.* 6*s.* 4½*d.* to Robert Roy, for costs relating to the loan; and the sum of 84*l.* 17*s.*, repaid to the plaintiff for principal and interest monies advanced to pay the first premium on a policy of assurance upon the life of Robert Anstruther, for 5,000*l.* in the Asylum Life Assurance Company.

On the 9th of July 1835, Messrs. Paul and Roy drew out a further sum of 182*l.*, including 16*s.* 3*d.* for interest, and applied it in paying 55*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.* due from Robert Anstruther to Dr. Briggs, for which he held an infestment in security over the estate, and also 99*l.* 8*s.* 11*d.* due from R. Anstruther to Mr. Brockell, which was secured by inhibition affecting the estate, and the remaining 27*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* was retained by R. Roy to meet claims which he had against R. Anstruther.

On the 13th of November 1835, Messrs. Paul and Roy drew from the deposit account 452*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, including 7*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.* for interest, and on the same day Mr. Roy gave the plaintiff a letter saying, "In respect you have at my request agreed to draw the sum of 452*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* from the money deposited in our joint names for behoof of C. Wood and Major Anstruther, in order to satisfy the arrears of interest and premiums of assurance, and also for payment to me of 200*l.* on account of advances for and business charges against Major Anstruther, I hereby engage to indemnify you against all responsibility for having consented to this appropriation of the money, and if necessary for that purpose to replace the same."

This sum of 452*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* was applied by the defendant in payment to the plaintiff of 130*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.* which had been advanced by him on the 1st of August 1835 to C. Wood for interest on the loan; 3*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* for progressive interest and expenses, and 70*l.* 15*s.* advanced by the plaintiff to pay premiums upon policies of assurance effected for securing the loan. 47*l.* 12*s.* was retained by R. Roy for advances made by him on account of premiums of assurance, and also 200*l.* which he claimed for advances made on account of Major Anstruther.

A jointure of 1,000*l.* a-year was secured to Lady Anstruther, the mother of Major Anstruther, upon the estates of Caiplic and Third Part, and the plaintiff, as her agent, applied to R. Roy, the factor and agent of Major Anstruther, for payment of the half year's jointure, which came due the 31st of July 1835, but, not being able to discharge the demand, the plaintiff at his request paid the 500*l.* upon Mr. Roy's promising to repay it out of the rents of the estate; but after various applications for payment, Messrs. Paul and Roy on the 12th of May 1836 drew from the deposit account the sum of 519*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.*, being the half year's jointure, with interest, to the 12th of May 1836, and applied it in paying the advance which had been made, and on the same day R. Roy gave the plaintiff a letter as follows:—"You have just now delivered to me a receipt for Lady Anstruther's jointure due on the 31st of July last, viz. 500*l.* with 19*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* of interest, together 519*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.*; you having at my request advanced that money to her ladyship soon after falling due, I beg to explain that the repayment has been made by an indorsation to the above extent in your favour of a bank deposit receipt in our joint names of part of the loan from Mr. Wood to Major Anstruther."

On the same day, R. Roy wrote another letter as follows:—"In respect there is now due to you the half year's jointure due to Lady Anstruther at the 31st of July last, amounting with interest to this date to 519*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.*, I have for your relief countersigned the Bank of Scotland deposit receipt of the 13th of November last for 616*l.* 12*s.* 5*d.* to you and myself, being a part of the loan made by C. Wood to Major Anstruther, in order that if you find it necessary you may draw the same to the extent of the foresaid advance, and in that case I agree and engage to apply the free rents and produce of the estate of Third Part, after satisfying all public burthens, the jointure to Lady Anstruther, and the payments to Mr. Wood, in replacing the said sum in the Bank to answer its original purpose, viz. of securing Mr. Wood against the inhibition at the instance of the late Mr. Thompson, when such inhibition shall be made effectual by his representatives, in so far as such free rents and produce shall come into my hands or the hands of Major Anstruther's trustee."

The interest upon the 616*l.* 12*s.* 5*d.* from the 13th of November 1835 to the 12th of May 1836 was 6*l.* 3*s.*, and after drawing the sum of 519*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* from the bank, that amount of interest was included in the balance of 103*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.* for which a new deposit receipt was given, as had always been done before when the account was reduced.

From the years 1835 to 1838, Mr. Roy received the rents of the estates of Caiplic and Third Part, amounting to nearly 2,000*l.*, and in his accounts took credit for the payments made on account of Major Anstruther out of the monies drawn from the deposit account, except those retained by himself, and except the three sums of 496*l.* 16*s.* 1½*d.*, 55*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.* and 99*l.* 8*s.* 11½*d.* paid to Messrs. Dickson & Stuart, Dr. Briggs and Mr. Brockell, and also except the sum of 209*l.* 13*s.*, the plaintiff's expenses of the loan. It was also alleged that R. Roy, as agent for R. Anstruther, took credit in his cash accounts for the sum of 209*l.* 13*s.* as if he had advanced the same, and that he also took credit for the sum of money paid upon the deposit account.

Messrs. Dickson & Stuart had another claim against Major Anstruther of 433*l.* 13*s.* 5½*d.* after deducting 8*l.* 19*s.* paid on account. They brought an action to recover the sum, and on the 13th of June 1835 they obtained arrestments, and arrested or attached the funds belonging to Major Anstruther in the hands of Messrs. Paul and Roy to the extent of 1,000*l.* more or less, and having obtained a decree in the action, they, on the 26th of January 1838, commenced an action of forthcoming in the Court of Session in Scotland against Messrs. Paul and Roy as arrestees, and Robert Anstruther, as the common debtor, to obtain payment out of the money arrested of their debt with 12*l.* 17*s.* the expenses of the action, and 1*l.* 3*s.* 7½*d.* the dues for extracting the decree.

After various proceedings, the action of forthcoming was directed to stand over, that Messrs. Roy and Paul might, in an action of multiplepoinding, bring before the Court all parties interested in the money deposited in the Bank of Scotland.

On the 28th of December 1840, R. Roy commenced an action of multiplepoinding in the names of himself and plaintiff, concluding the balance of the consigned money, as the same might be ascertained, might be paid to the parties having the best right, and calling as parties defenders the said C. Wood, Messrs. Dickson & Stuart, Lucy Thompson, the personal representative of James Thompson, W. S., and afterwards the wife of Robert Davidson, the only inhibiting creditor of R. Anstruther, whose debt had not been satisfied.

On the 22nd of June 1841, after various proceedings were taken in the conjoined actions, Lord Murray, Ordinary, made an order upon Mr. Roy, stating that he "appoints the pursuer, Mr. Roy, to consign the part of the fund in medio admitted to be in his hands, and that in the Bank of Scotland upon a receipt taken payable to such person or persons as may be preferred thereto by the Lord Ordinary or the Court in the course of the process."

On the 30th of June 1841, Mr. Roy having failed to comply with the order "the Lord Ordinary of new appoints the pursuer Mr. Roy to consign the part of the fund in medio admitted to be in his hands in the terms specified in the former interlocutory, and decerns against him to that effect accordingly, and if the said consignment is not made within fourteen days from the date, allows an interim decree to the above effect to go out, and be extracted at the lapse of that period at the expense of the pursuer."

On the 2nd of July 1841, R. Roy deposited in the Bank of Scotland 569*l.* as being the whole amount of the monies not applied in pursuance of the agreement.

On the 15th of June 1843, after further proceedings in the conjoined actions, Lord Murray pronounced an interlocutor, viz., "The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties, and thereafter made avisaandum to himself with the whole cause, and considered the same before answer, remits to Mr. Donald Lindsay, accountant, to report as to the amount of the fund in medio, being the residue of the sum of 2,100*l.* deposited in the name of Messrs. Paul and Roy, so far as the same was not paid in terms of the memorandum referred to in the letter by Mr. Roy of the 26th of February 1835, for the better security of the loan of 10,000*l.* from Mr. Wood to Major Anstruther, and whether the same is more or less than the sum consigned by Mr. Roy."

The accountant by his report stated his opinion that Messrs. Roy and Paul should be ordered to replace all the sums drawn out, except so much as had been applied in paying the debts of creditors who had used inhibition, namely, the three debts of 496*l.* 16*s.* 1½*d.*, 55*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.* and 99*l.* 8*s.* 11½*d.*; and also excepting the sums of 209*l.* 13*s.* and 70*l.* 6*s.* 4½*d.*, the expenses incurred by the plaintiff and R. Roy, connected with the loan, on which sum, the amount of the fund in medio with Bank interest would be 1,445*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.*, or if the Court should be of opinion that the expenses of the loan ought not to have been paid, that the fund in medio would amount to 1,770*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*, or if interest of the legal rate of 5*l.* per cent. were chargeable, the amount of the fund in medio would be 1,981*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.*

On the 15th of February 1845, the Lord Ordinary, by his decree, approved of the accountant's report according to the second view, "and in the terms thereof finds that the fund in medio, in the hands of Messrs. Paul and Roy as at the 12th of July 1843, amounted to 1,981*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.*, stating and appointing them conjointly and severally to consign that sum under deduction of 726*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.*, being the sum reported on as deposited in bank at that date, together with the legal interest of the sum of 795*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.* thereof, being principal from the said 12th of July 1843 till the date of consignment in the Bank of Scotland, upon a receipt taken, payable to such person or persons as shall be found entitled thereto by the Lord Ordinary, or the Court, and decerns; and if the said consignment is not made within three weeks from this date, allows an interim decree therefore at the instance of the claimants and at the expense of Messrs. Paul and Roy to go out and be extracted accordingly, and further finds Messrs. Paul and Roy liable to the expenses of the discussion relative to the amount of the fund in medio, and the consignment thereof, subject to modification, and allows account thereof to be given in, and when lodged remits to the auditor to tax the same and to report."

Messrs. Roy and Paul severally presented reclaiming notes, which are petitions of appeal, against this order; but on the 23rd of May 1845, the inner house affirmed the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and remitted the cause back.

On the 9th of July 1845, the Lord Ordinary found the amount of the costs incurred in the inner house and the outer house, for which he decerned against Messrs. Roy and Paul conjunctly.

Messrs. Dickson & Stuart having obtained a warrant on the 18th of July 1845, caused a messenger-at-arms to execute a charge of consignment and payment on Messrs. Roy and Paul respectively, in pursuance of the foregoing orders.

On the 21st of July 1845, the plaintiff presented a petition of appeal to the House of Lords, which had the effect of staying execution until leave to proceed should be obtained from the Court (48 Geo. 3. c. 151. s. 17), and in consequence of this Messrs. Dickson & Stuart, Mrs. Thompson, the wife of R. Davidson and her husband, C. Wood, together with J. W. Arnold, and J. T. Murray, writer to the Signet, and the agents of Mrs. Thompson and Mr. Wood, to whom the payment of costs had been directed, presented a petition in the conjoined actions, and on the 6th of December 1845, obtained an interlocutor from the first division of the Court of Session, allowing execution to proceed, notwithstanding the appeal on the interlocutors of the 15th of February, 23rd of May, 28th of June, and 9th of July, 1845, caution being first found to pay back the sums of expenses decerned for with interest, and also the difference between bank and legal interest, if it should ultimately be found that the arrestment must be removed unico contextu with the consignment.

On the 11th of March 1846, Mr. Paul alone deposited the sum of 1,981*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.* under deduction of 726*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.*, with legal interest of the 795*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.*, being principal from the 12th of July 1843 to the date of consignment, amounting, after deducting income-tax, to 1,357*l.* 12*s.* 9*d.*, and he also paid the costs, amounting to 271*l.* 8*s.* 3*d.*

By a deed of assignation in the Scotch form, dated the 10th, 16th, and 18th of February 1846, Messrs. Dickson & Stuart, C. Wood, Mrs. Thompson and her husband, R. Davidson, Walter Malcolm as assignee of Mr. Davidson, and J. W. Arnold, and J. T. Murray, after reciting the decrees and orders, and the consignment and payment by the plaintiff, assigned, transferred and made over from them and their respective heirs and successors, to and in favour of T. Paul, his heirs and donators, the aforesaid decree for consignment and payment and warrant, at their instance pronounced in the conjoint actions; and they surrogated and substituted T. Paul, his heirs and donators, in their full right and place of the premises to enable him to follow out and enforce the decrees and warrants against R. Roy as joint debtor along with him.

By virtue of this the plaintiff, according to the law and practice of Scotland, claimed to be entitled to proceed against R. Roy in a summary manner, to enforce the relief in respect of the deposit or consignment, and the payments made, and stated that if the defendant had any grounds for objecting to such proceedings, he could do so by suspension and interdict in the Courts of Scotland.

On the 12th of March 1846 the plaintiff sued out letters of horning on the decree and assignment against the defendant, directed to the messenger-at-arms, who, on the 14th of March 1846, charged the defendant as follows: "Our will is, therefore, and we charge you that on sight hereof ye pass, and in our name and authority command and charge the said R. Roy personally, or at his dwelling-place, if within Scotland, and forth thereof by delivering a copy of charge at the office of Keeper of the Record of Edictal Citations at Edinburgh, to make payment to the complainers of the several sum and sums of money above specified, all in terms and to the effect contained in the decree and extract and assignation above written within, and have referred to as repeated brevitatis causâ within fifteen days, if within Scotland, and if forth thereof within sixty-one days next after he is charged by you to that effect, under the pain of rebellion." The letters also contained a warrant to arrest and distrain the goods, money, and effects of R. Roy.

Subsequently letters of caption were sued out to seize and incarcerate the defendant, but it was found impossible to execute them as the defendant was in England out of the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts. The plaintiff also had been unable to discover any property in Scotland belonging to the defendant.

The bill then charged that R. Roy was bound to re-deposit the money, and to relieve the plaintiff from the payment made, and that the defendant in account of the rents of the estate had taken credit for the several sums drawn out of the deposit accounts, and had the defendant continued in the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts, that the plaintiff would have obtained it in Scotland without making the other parties to the actions of forthcoming and multipointing parties to any action or suit.

That warrants of execution had been issued in Scotland against the defendant, who had no heritable or movable estate in Scotland available to satisfy the claim.

The defendant, by his answer, admitted generally the facts stated in the bill, but denied the jurisdiction of the Court, and said that he had re-deposited 569*l.* in the Bank of Scotland, which was a larger sum than he had guaranteed, and was more than the money misapplied, and that he was not further responsible as no surplus rents had come to his hands, and because the inhibition of the representatives of James Thompson, deceased, had never been effectual, and that as factor he had received rents amounting to about 1,800*l.* a-year for the years 1835, 1836, 1837, and 1838, but that there was a balance of 192*l.* 19*s.* 11½*d.* due to him, besides the 569*l.* re-deposited; that his residing temporarily at Chester was by the law of Scotland not a withdrawal from the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts, and that if the plaintiff was entitled to any relief he could obtain it through process issued from the Scotch Courts; that the plaintiff could sue him in Scotland, and he could appear there and plead, but that from the plaintiff residing in Scotland he was prevented from obtaining any relief under this bill, or in any other proceedings in this court, and that he knew nothing of the deed of assignation.

Mr. Anderson and Mr. Toller, for the plaintiff.—By the law of Scotland the plaintiff is justified in applying to this Court to enforce a claim legally available there, but which the defendant has rendered it impossible to enforce there by removing to another jurisdiction. But the Courts of England are ever anxious to do justice, and they avail themselves of all means to effect it, and for that reason they operate in personam—Penn v. Lord Baltimore (1). If therefore two Scotchmen or other foreigners have cause of suit there inter se, and one comes and resides in this country, that gives the one remaining in Scotland a direct right in these courts, and authority to sue, and entitles him to relief in this country, the same as if they were both in Scotland. In this case, Mr. Roy, jointly with Mr. Paul, was ordered by a Court of competent jurisdiction to make a payment of an ascertained sum; and by the law of Scotland if one executor paid a sum of money which the Court of Session had directed two to pay, the one paying would have his remedy against the other. The sum having been ascertained, it is also immaterial that other persons have been parties to the proceedings in the Scotch Courts during the progress of those suits, as these proceedings have been determined and concluded by the decree of the 15th of February 1845: and the deed of assignation, by the law and practice of the Courts of Scotland, has vested all the right to the money in Mr. Paul, and gave him a right to summary relief against Mr. Roy for the money deposited, as well as the payments under the decree. It, in fact, in England, amounts to an original claim by Mr. Paul against Mr. Roy for the non-performance of his liability—Young v. Wildey (2). It is, in fact, a liability in Mr. Roy to make good money paid by Mr. Paul for what they as co-trustees have been made responsible.

Mr. R. Palmer, Mr. Goodeve and Mr. Forbes, for the defendant.—It is impossible to consider this suit apart from the proceedings in the Courts of Scotland. Without them there is no evidence of the transaction or of the contract. The suit here was founded entirely upon them; an order has been made by the Scotch Courts to bring the fund in medio, in other words to bring it into court. Mr. Roy has complied with the order to the extent of 569*l.*, the sum he had received, which exhausted his liability. The rest had been received by Mr. Paul, who was the party to bring it back. The fund, however, was ample to satisfy the claims of the creditors upon the estate, as Mr. Thompson's representatives have been held to have no claim for their debt in consequence of its not being duly registered—Malcolm v. Mansfield (3). This, therefore, is not a case in which this Court will entertain a suit to carry out by its forms, elaborated from its dealings with trusts, the claim made by the plaintiff. Neither can the Court deal with the forms of proceedings in the Scotch Courts, or get rid of them. An assignment has been made behind the back of Mr. Roy, but no final decree has been made. How can this Court, therefore, inform itself of the foreign law? No action at law can be brought upon an assigned decree. The plaintiff either can or cannot get final judgment: if he gets it, he can then proceed at law; but if he cannot, why is he to call upon a court of equity to support his claim? The Courts of Scotland, therefore, are competent to enforce their own decrees, and no original jurisdiction has arisen in this country. The deed of assignment of the order to deposit gave rise to processes peculiar to the laws there. The defendant also is not personally liable. He was only the agent of Major Anstruther. The plaintiff also was merely the agent of C. Wood, whose consent was necessary to the institution of this suit, to which Major Anstruther was a necessary party. The bill, therefore, must be dismissed.

Mr. Anderson; in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—After considering this case, my opinion is, that the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief he asks, and I do not think that the case made would sanction my making a decree. The facts, so far as it is necessary for me to state them, are that Major Anstruther in the year 1835 being entitled to an estate, or the life interest in an estate in Scotland called Caipie, which was heavily encumbered, borrowed the sum of 10,000*l.* from C. Wood, which, by a memorandum of agreement, was to be applied in the discharge of several incumbrances or charges affecting the estate. The estate itself was to be conveyed to Mr. Renton, in trust that the rents arising therefrom might be applied for the purposes there specified, 7,900*l.* was accordingly applied, and the remaining sum of 2,100*l.* was deposited in the Bank of Scotland in the names of the plaintiff, who was the agent of C. Wood, and the defendant, who was the agent of Major Anstruther in this transaction, for the purpose of carrying out the stipulations expressed in the memorandum.

In the years 1835 and 1836, payments were made by Messrs. Paul and Roy out of this fund; and Major Anstruther being still indebted, certain of his creditors by inhibition commenced proceedings by arrestment, which is analogous to the proceedings in this country by attachment, and a suit of forthcoming having been instituted to compel Messrs. Paul and Roy to re-deposit the funds, that they might be made available for the purposes of the creditors, the Court of Session determined that many of these payments had been improperly made; and the rights and claims of all the parties interested in the funds having been ascertained in this suit, the Court directed Messrs. Paul and Roy to bring back and re-deposit certain sums specifically enumerated. Under an order made in July 1841, Mr. Roy re-deposited a sum of 569*l.*, asserting at the same time that it was the utmost amount that had not been properly applied; but subsequently, in the year 1845, the Lord Ordinary directed the sum of 795*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.* then in the Bank to be made up to 1,981*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.*, and this order was made jointly upon both parties. After this order, Mr. Roy came to England and Mr. Paul paid in the whole amount, and obtained an assignment of the decree from the creditors in the suit in the Court of Session; and this enables him in the terms of the decree to call upon Mr. Roy to repay not merely one-half, but the whole amount which he had paid into court according to the order. Mr. Paul upon this took out letters of horning, but not having obtained any satisfaction from the goods or movable estate of Mr. Roy, he obtained letters of caption, which entitled him to take the defendant himself, and imprison him until the whole amount claimed was satisfied; but as Mr. Roy had come to England, Mr. Paul was unable to execute the letters of caption; he, therefore, instituted this suit.

I was early embarrassed in the case when considering in what way the Court had jurisdiction, if it had any. Whether it was upon the ground of its being a foreign judgment, or that it was a contract which I was called upon to enforce, between strangers, the subjects of a foreign country, one or both of whom had come afterwards into this country. This Court has jurisdiction to enforce a foreign judgment, and in the great majority of cases to enforce the debts and rights which may arise on a contract made between two persons of another country when they come afterwards into this country and reside here. I first thought whether it was a foreign judgment which must be considered final, as it would be new to find that this Court would enforce a foreign judgment unless it were final. I have not found, nor have I been referred to, any case in which this or any Court in similar cases would enforce a merely interlocutory judgment, and give relief which must be enforced by final judgment in another country. By so doing the Court might do great injustice. If there is a final judgment to pay a certain sum of money, the Courts of this country can compel the debtor, if residing here, to pay the foreign judgment creditor. But, considering this case either as a final judgment or not, in no way can this be considered as a suit for enforcing a foreign judgment. The decree, in the first place, directs the plaintiff and the defendant jointly and severally to pay the money into the Bank of Scotland, that is, as between the creditors and the plaintiff and defendant themselves. They were jointly liable to pay the whole amount; but then, upon one paying in the whole amount and obtaining an assignment of the decree this singular result takes place, that if by order of the Court of Session, the plaintiff obtains such an assignment of the decree, it enables him and gives him a right to obtain repayment from the other, not of the proportion of the amount ordered to be paid jointly, but of the whole amount he has paid into the bank. In such a case the Court, no doubt, would inquire into the propriety of the foreign judgment. Even if this were the case of a final judgment in a foreign court, the case of Houlditch v. Lord Donegal shews that it is to be treated as prima facie evidence of the right in the party who had obtained the judgment, and that its propriety may be inquired into; and therefore that the Court has jurisdiction. If so, then the only case to be considered is, that of contribution; and the ground brought forward is, that the Court having ordered two persons jointly and severally to pay a sum of money into court, it is inequitable that one of them, the plaintiff, should pay in the whole amount; but so, on the other hand, it must be considered equally inequitable that the other, the defendant, should be called upon to repay the whole amount to him. Yet the effect of it would be, if I were to make a decree in favour of the plaintiff, to make the defendant pay the whole amount of the money into court. That is a result so monstrous that the Court has not been asked to give such relief or effect to the judgment pronounced in Scotland; and I consider, if I were to act upon it, it would be treating it as the final judgment of a foreign Court and not an interlocutory order of the Court of Session. In that court relief and justice might be administered between the parties, notwithstanding such a decree; and therefore I am not able to consider this as a case of enforcing a foreign judgment. It would be unjust to do so, and the bill, although it states the proceedings in the court of Scotland, and asks that effect may be given to the whole of the judgment of the Court of Session, only asks this Court to give effect to a portion of it.

Independently of the question of not enforcing a foreign judgment, I have then to consider whether anything has arisen upon the proceedings in Scotland which enables the plaintiff in this court to require the defendant to pay, either, as the prayer of the bill puts it, the sums of money which have been improperly paid out of the 2,100*l.*, or to pay half of the sum of money which has been paid into the Bank of Scotland. In the first place, as to the money which has been paid out of the 2,100*l.* for the purposes mentioned in the memorandum. From the evidence that has been given, there was paid out with propriety a sum of 551*l.* 19*s.* for inhibition debts: upon that no question is raised on either side or with respect to the necessary sums which were paid out, but there are various sums amounting altogether to 1,019*l.*, which, according to the statements in the bill and the whole of the evidence, seem to have been paid to the plaintiff himself. One sum was for costs, another sum was to replace premiums on policies which the plaintiff had paid, and which fact he not merely mentions, but also states that the money paid to him included the interest from the time when he advanced the money; and the aggregate sum paid out of the money in the bank consists of the capital amount of the premiums and the interest due to the plaintiff. The observation is material as shewing that the money was not paid out merely to be applied in payment; but that the premiums on the policies had been actually paid by the plaintiff at that time, and that he then came to make the trust fund available to repay him, with interest upon the amount so paid, without considering the sums received or paid by Mr. Roy. There could be no question the Court of Session having determined that these sums of money were improperly paid, that the person who received them ought to replace them; in that manner this Court, and I have no doubt the Court of Session, will ultimately work out the rights of the parties and the equity of the case. There were some sums of money advanced by the plaintiff out of his own pocket, which, he says, were properly payable out of the rents; and he makes this sum of 2,100*l.* available to repay himself. The Court of Session having decreed that sum to be replaced, both the plaintiff and the defendant must, as against the creditors, make it good. But, suppose this solely a trust fund, and that the money had not been applied for any other purpose, it would rest simply between the plaintiff and the defendant, and each would have to pay the sums he had received. These sums were paid out to repay debts, in respect of which the plaintiff was a creditor; but an elaborate account has been gone through on both sides, and the plaintiff says, that, in fact, although the plaintiff paid this annuity to Lady Anstruther, the rents of the estate were applicable to this purpose; and that the defendant Roy has had credit in his account for that express application of the rents. I assume that to be so; observing that Mr. Roy was in possession of the estate, as factor to the trustee; and according to the law of England the factor could only be answerable to his trustee, and not to the cestuis que trust, for any of those rents:—the factor, being nothing more than what we in England call a steward, a person who, by authority, receives the rents, having misapplied those rents. The trustee as between himself and the factor would equally remain answerable and liable for the due application of the rents received by himself, his factor or agent. In fact, were the case different, it would be totally impossible for me to take an account of the rents to see whether they had been properly applied. It could not be done, because it is obvious that Mr. Renton would be and is a necessary party to a suit for that purpose, and also that Major Anstruther should be a party, or else the Court would be taking accounts which would not bind absent parties, and it would have to take them over and over again for every one of those parties as they instituted proceedings in this court.

It is impossible, therefore, that I can, in a suit constituted as this is, regard any question arising upon the rents of the estate for the purpose of considering whether it is true or not that the defendant Mr. Roy has, in the account of those rents had allowance for those very sums advanced by Mr. Paul, which were repaid to him out of the 2,100*l.* improperly, and which the Court of Session has ordered to be replaced. In this view of the case therefore I consider that this suit is not constituted in a form which would enable me to look at anything except the 2,100*l.*

The other alternative of the prayer is, that the plaintiff may have contribution, that is to say, that the defendant may be compelled to pay into the Bank of Scotland or into the Court of Session one-half of the sum which Messrs. Paul and Roy were ordered jointly to repay. Upon what ground can I do that? Not upon the ground that it is a foreign judgment, because it is not a final judgment: not on the ground that it is shewn to be the proper amount between the parties, because it is not possible for me to ascertain that it is the proper amount; but it is only upon the ground that a foreign Court has directed two persons to pay a sum of money into court, jointly and severally, and has thought proper to make a decree, under which this Court is asked to say they ought to pay it into the Bank of Scotland separately, while the Court of Session has jurisdiction, and while proceedings are going on in that court to work out full and complete justice. If I were to deal with the case in its present state I should be carrying on the suit concurrently with the Court of Session; not having before me the whole of the parties who are before the Court of Session or the evidence which is before the Court of Session, or the means of obtaining that evidence, or the means of doing justice between the parties. When the arguments were proceeding I put this question: supposing I should order Mr. Roy to pay to Mr. Paul one-half of what I should consider was due, or any other sum, and the Court of Session would not afterwards look upon that decision as correct, and should determine that it was not the proper amount to be paid, and should call upon Mr. Paul to repay it, how could I enable Mr. Roy to get it back? Were I to make such an order I should be making a final decree in a case pending in another court, when that Court has made no final decree in that case. I am also of opinion that it would be necessary for the plaintiff to ascertain, by proceedings in the foreign court, the amount properly due from the defendant. I am not satisfied that he has not the means of efficiently doing that, or that by means of an account taken against the defendant in the foreign court the plaintiff has not the means of discovering whether he has property. I am not satisfied that there is not property in Scotland belonging to Mr. Roy which might give a right of jurisdiction against him. I do not call upon Mr. Roy to shew that he has property; but if it is true that the plaintiff could not obtain a final decree against the defendant, the burthen would lie upon him to prove that; and if a final decree had been obtained in Scotland and accounts taken ascertaining what was the sum due, there would have arisen a question, which it is not necessary for me to discuss, whether the plaintiff could have enforced his claim in this court or whether he might not have gone to a court of law. As I have expressed my opinion that no case of a foreign judgment is made out upon which I could act; and as I have gone into the other questions, I do not stay to inquire whether this is the proper tribunal or not, or whether this is one of those peculiar cases which relate to the accounts of rents in a foreign country in which this Court would have jurisdiction to enforce a contract entered into by foreigners alone, because I am of opinion that no case for relief has been made out; and therefore the bill must be dismissed, with costs.

M.R. { COOKE v. LAMOTTE.
Nov. 18, 19, 21. { LAMOTTE v. COOKE.

Bond—Undue Influence—Testatrix—Disposing Power—Will, Restraint on—Suppression of Facts.

*L. F. requested her nephew, J. L. L., to come and reside with her, and while so doing she altered her will in his favour; she subsequently made several other alterations, and by the last, the greater portion of the property she had power to dispose of was given to J. L. L. and his two brothers. These alterations were made by her own solicitor. After the last of these alterations, she executed a post obit bond for 15,000*l.* in favour of J. L. L. and his two brothers. This was done by a solicitor unknown to her, who was employed at her request by J. L. L. Differences afterwards arose between L. F. and her nephew J. L. L., who left her house. L. F. then sent for her own solicitor, and, without taking any notice of the bond, altered her will, and disposed of the whole of her property among other persons, and died leaving insufficient to pay the bond. Her solicitor, who was one of her executors, upon communicating the decease of the testatrix to J. L. L., was, for the first time, informed of her having executed the bond; and upon a bill by the executors to set it aside,—Held, that the bond was obtained by undue influence and upon a suppression of facts, and was void, and that it must be delivered up to be cancelled, with costs to be paid by J. L. L.*

This bill was filed by Isaac Cooke and Simon Frazer Piggott, the executors and trustees of Louisa Foster, deceased, praying for a declaration that a bond, dated the 7th of February 1846, was fraudulently obtained and was void, and that it might be delivered up to be cancelled.

By the will of John Lagier Lamotte, the father of Louisa Foster, four eighth parts of his residuary personal estate were settled in equal proportions upon Louisa Foster and his three other daughters and their respective children; and it was declared as to the said eighth shares of his daughters, who should have been married and die without issue, that the trustees under the will should assign, transfer and make over the share of such his said daughter unto such person or persons as his said daughter who should so die without issue should by her last will duly appoint.

Louisa Foster intermarried with Lieut.-General Thomas Foster, who died in May 1843, and she never had any issue.

The defendants John Lewis Lamotte, Charles Wyndham Lamotte and George Thomas Crespigny Lamotte, knew that the plaintiff, Isaac Cooke, was the confidential solicitor of Thomas Foster and also of Louisa Foster, their aunt. After her husband's decease, she retired and kept up no correspondence with her nephews; but in November 1844, her health was broken, and J. L. Lamotte came to see her at Clifton; he at first stayed a week, but subsequently returned and stayed with her until June 1846. She had previously made her will, which had been prepared by Isaac Cooke, but she became greatly attached to J. L. Lamotte, and took an interest in his and his brothers' welfare.

On the 23rd of December 1844, Louisa Foster executed another will, and appointed J. L. Lamotte her sole residuary legatee, and signed a letter of that date, which was inclosed in the will, requesting him to divide what he might receive from her property equally with his brothers. In July 1845, I. Cooke prepared a fresh will for her, by which J. L. Lamotte was appointed sole residuary legatee, and which she executed in July 1845, and signed another letter similar to that she had signed when she executed the former will. In November 1845, L. Foster again instructed I. Cooke to prepare a new will for her, and directed that all the defendants should be made her residuary legatees, which was done, disposing of more by the residuary gift than was disposed of by the former wills. On each occasion Mr. Cooke informed L. Foster that the amount given to J. L. Lamotte by the will of July 1845, was about 18,000*l.*, and by the will of November 1845, was about 22,000*l.*

In June 1846, in consequence of a quarrel, all friendly feeling between L. Foster and J. L. Lamotte ceased, and she continued estranged from him until her death, and this feeling extended to her nephews Charles W. Lamotte and George T. C. Lamotte.

On the 22nd of September 1847, L. Foster executed another will, by which she appointed all her one-eighth share of her father's residuary estate, and gave all her personal estate and effects to Isaac Cooke and Simon Frazer Piggott, upon trusts therein mentioned, and appointed them her executors.

On the 18th of May 1848 she executed a codicil, but did not vary the bequests.

The principal part of the property which L. Foster had power to appoint, consisted of 24,000*l.* reduced annuities, standing in the name of John Henry Lamotte, Lord Tenterden, and J. L. Lamotte, as trustees of the will of her father.

In giving instructions to I. Cooke for her will, L. Foster made statements of the amount of her property, which exceeded 20,000*l.*, and the bequests were made upon the supposition that she had a right to dispose of property to that amount, and that she was not indebted to the defendants or any other person in the sum of 15,000*l.*

The testatrix made bequests to sixty-seven legatees of sums amounting to 19,487*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* sterling, and the residue was estimated at 2,945*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* sterling.

The testatrix died on the 14th of December 1848, and her will was proved by I. Cooke and S. F. Piggott.

A special gift of some plate was made to G. T. C. Lamotte, and also an annuity of 100*l.* a year to him and to his brother, C. W. Lamotte, payable after the death of his brother J. L. Lamotte, but no legacy was given to J. L. Lamotte.

J. L. Lamotte, upon being informed of the death of his aunt, wrote to Mr. Cooke, on the 22nd of December 1848, informing him that by will made in 1845, he and his brothers had been appointed residuary legatees, and that their interest was secured by a bond given to them in February 1846.

This was the first intimation received by the plaintiffs that the testatrix had executed any instrument in favour of the defendants.

Messrs. White & Borrett afterwards wrote to Mr. Cooke :—"Jan. 2, 1849.—Sir,—Understanding from Mr. John Lamotte that you are one of the executors of the will of his late aunt, Mrs. Foster, we beg to acquaint you that we hold her bond to her nephew for 15,000*l.*, dated the 7th of February 1846. The bond was prepared by us, and has remained in our custody from its execution. Mr. J. Lamotte and his brothers will not be entitled to the bond in addition to any legacy under the aunt's will, but such legacy, according as the amount may be, is to be considered as in satisfaction or pro tanto in satisfaction of the bond." In reply, Mr. Cooke requested a copy of the bond. On the 5th of January 1849 Messrs. White & Borrett, at the request of I. Cooke, enclosed a copy of the bond, and wrote as follows :—"We may state that a similar bond for 10,000*l.* was first given by Mrs. Foster to her nephews, but which was cancelled, and the bond for 15,000*l.* signed; the cancelled bond we find is with our draft."

This bond was dated the 7th of February 1846, and was given to John L. Lamotte, C. W. Lamotte, and G. T. C. Lamotte, and was for 30,000*l.*, and was conditioned to be void if the heirs, executors, or administrators of Louisa Foster should pay to them or the survivors or survivor of them, their or his executors, administrators or assigns within six calendar months after her decease the full sum of 15,000*l.* with interest in the meantime, or if the said J. L. Lamotte, C. W. Lamotte, and G. T. C. Lamotte, or the survivors or survivor of them, should become entitled under the last will and testament or any testamentary appointment or disposition of the said L. Foster to a legacy and sum or sums of money of equal or corresponding amount with the sum of 15,000*l.* intended to be thereby secured.

The cancelled bond for 10,000*l.* varied only in amount.

It was now alleged that if the bond was executed by the testatrix, it was done so in ignorance of its nature, effect, and contents, without professional assistance, and at the solicitation and at the request and under the influence of the defendant J. L. Lamotte, and under the impression that it was an instrument of a different character.

The bill then charged that J. L. Lamotte had suggested to the testatrix that a bond of the nature of the instrument of the 7th of February 1846 should be prepared for her execution, and that by his influence he procured its execution, but that he never informed her that she would deprive herself of the power of disposing by will of property to the extent of 15,000*l.*, and that if she executed a bond of that nature, she could not deprive the defendant of the right to receive that sum out of her assets. That he had previously drawn up a written statement to obtain legal or other advice, whether, by means of a bond, the testatrix might not be prevented from making any alteration to his disadvantage in the will then in force in his favour, and whether he could not thereby secure the benefit given to him by the will from being taken away or revoked by a subsequent change of mind of the testatrix. That he did obtain such advice, but never informed the testatrix, and that she never intended to create in favour of the defendants, or either of them, an irrevocable demand against her estate, and that the different nature of a gift to the defendants of a sum of money by will or by bond, to be paid after her death, was never explained to her by the defendant J. L. Lamotte, or any other person, and that she never understood the nature and effect of an instrument of that description, but to the end believed that she had the power to dispose of the whole of her property and of exercising her power of appointment the same as if the bond had never been executed. That the defendants alleged that the testatrix executed the instrument with the intention of creating a debt against the assets in favour of the defendants; that thereby, and on the security thereof, J. L. Lamotte and C. W. Lamotte might be enabled to purchase promotions in their respective services, and that G. T. C. Lamotte might obtain preferment in the church; but had such been the case, it was done under the impression that it was to effect an immediate object, and that no attempt had ever been made by any of the defendants to raise money upon the instrument.

The defendants by their joint answer said, that J. L. Lamotte went by invitation to visit his aunt in November 1844, and that, with occasional short absences, he stayed with her until the month of August 1846; that Louisa Foster made many inquiries respecting the pecuniary circumstances of the defendants, and ascertained that no fortune had devolved upon them by the death of their maternal grandfather; that she then expressed a determination to alter her will in favour of J. L. Lamotte, which she afterwards told him she had done, and in July 1845, she again altered it through I. Cooke, who furnished her with an epitome, which she shewed to J. L. Lamotte. In 1841 J. L. Lamotte became by purchase one of the corps of gentlemen-at-arms, and was, in 1845 and 1846, desirous of purchasing promotion in the corps; that on the 6th of August 1837, G. T. C. Lamotte was ordained by the Bishop of Ripon, and Louisa Foster in January 1846, became desirous that he should obtain church preferment, that J. L. Lamotte should purchase promotion in the corps, and that C. W. Lamotte should purchase his majority in the army, and urged this upon J. L. Lamotte, as she was providing handsomely for them by her will: and that in July 1845, J. L. Lamotte suggested to her that the provision by will would not enable them to obtain money necessary to procure such promotion and preferment as it could be easily altered, but that she could enable them so to do by giving them a bond, and that this suggestion was much considered by Louisa Foster. That at that time J. L. Lamotte had not made any inquiry as to its legality; but in the month of July he wrote to his brother G. T. C. Lamotte, requesting him to mention it to a friend, who told him that it was commonly called a post obit bond, but promised to mention it to Mr. Francis Turner, the conveyancer, upon being furnished with a written statement; that the testatrix afterwards told J. L. Lamotte that she had altered her will, and that upon his advocating the claims of the legatees who had been deprived of legacies, an angry discussion ensued which induced him to leave her house on the 29th of November 1845, and that while absent he wrote the following statement:—

“Louisa Foster, of Clifton, widow, made a will in November 1845, by which she made her three nephews residuary legatees. To prevent the possibility of her hereafter making any alteration to the disadvantage of the above nephews, is it not practicable that she now give a bond for 10,000*l.* in favour of one or all the three nephews which will not be invalidated by any further will she may make? The amount of her property is 24,000*l.* invested in the 3*l.* per cent. reduced consols, in the names of J. H. Lamotte, Lord Tenterden and J. L. Lamotte, one of the residuary legatees, as trustees under the will of her father John Lagier Lamotte. She has no controul over the property during her life, but possesses absolute power of bequeathing her property. The estimated amount of the residuary estate is 19,000*l.*”

This statement was given to G. T. C. Lamotte that it might be shewn to Mr. Francis Turner, which, for want of opportunity, was not done until the 2nd of February 1846.

In January 1846, a treaty was on foot to purchase the advowson of the rectory of D—, and the terms were arranged. Inquiry was also made respecting G. T. C. Lamotte becoming incumbent of the parish of H—, but in June 1846 the idea of purchasing was abandoned. Louisa Foster expressed a desire to assist, and on the 1st of February 1846, she, in conversation, desired J. L. Lamotte to have a bond made for her to execute in favour of the defendants; she was asked if she would write to I. Cooke, but having become dissatisfied, she refused to employ or consult him, thinking him less attentive to her than formerly, and she had refused to see him when he called. In compliance with the wishes of Louisa Foster, who desired that her giving the bond might not be made known to any of her relations or friends, J. L. Lamotte wrote to G. T. C. Lamotte in London the following letter:—

“Our aunt has this day expressed a strong desire to benefit us during her lifetime, and has asked me in what way her wish can be fulfilled. I answered, that in case of any of us purchasing promotion or preferment, although her residuary legatees, we could not raise the money on her will, a fact of which she is fully aware. I have suggested the only means in her power to benefit us is, to give us a bond conjointly in our three names, securing us the money bequeathed to us, which she is now most anxious to effect, and which I need not say that I am as anxious to obtain and thereby guard against her future whims and oddities. On asking me to name the sum we wished to be secured, I named 10,000*l.* as being half of the residuary estate bequeathed to us in her last will. As Mr. Cooke, I regret to say, is on the black list for the absurd reason I stated to you, she will on no account listen to me employing him as bondsman on this occasion, and I cannot, therefore, with propriety apply to any one else. With respect to our cousin Lagier, it may cause some family heart-burning in such a case, which I think had better be avoided. You will do well, therefore, to apply to Mr. Goodchild's friend to draw up the bond, taking care to instruct him as to our present position in her will, and that our chief object is to secure our interest in it, and guard against the caprice of the most varium et mutabile of her kind. I have been diffident in naming a larger sum, though, perhaps, I should have acted wisely in securing the whole sum bequeathed to us, although she vows she never will alter her last will. Having incurred her displeasure once by refusing to swear eternal enmity to her foes, I shall feel safer in possession of her bond. Lose no time, therefore, in getting it ready for execution, and forward it. All going on here as dull as ever. Love to my mother. Yours, &c.

"P.S.—I had almost forgotten to say by express command that this business is to be confined exclusively to ourselves; and neither you nor C. to address one word of thanks to our benefactress. I need not observe, I am sure you will do what your feelings will naturally prompt by return of post."

G. T. C. Lamotte called on Mr. F. Turner, and through him was referred to Messrs. White & Borrett, whom he instructed to prepare the bond, which was settled by Mr. F. Turner, and the engrossment sent by Messrs. White & Borrett to G. T. C. Lamotte, who forwarded it to his brother, J. L. Lamotte, at the house of his aunt at Clifton.

On the 4th of February L. Foster expressed her regret that the bond had not been for 15,000*l.*, and on J. L. Lamotte saying that the 10,000*l.* was ample, she, unknown to J. L. Lamotte, wrote to G. T. C. Lamotte.

"(Private.)

"Feb. 4th, 1846.

"My dear George, On second thoughts I insist on a bond for 15,000*l.* to your dear brothers and self—employ your solicitor. Your affectionate aunt,

"N.B.—On this important, I pray you to be silent. The deed must faithfully be promised, Saturday. God bless those I love best."

She gave this letter to J. L. Lamotte open, and requested him to read it and forward it, which he did not do, as G. T. C. Lamotte was that day to leave town. On Thursday the 5th of February the engrossment arrived at Clifton, and was read by J. L. Lamotte to Louisa Foster, while she looked over it herself, and expressed herself as if she understood it, and approved of everything, except the amount, which she desired to be increased to 15,000*l.*, but at the same time she stated her determination to execute that engrossment, and have a fresh bond for 15,000*l.* prepared; that she objected to having her physician as a witness, as also Giles the elder, but approved of R. W. Giles the younger, who attested her execution of the bond. After its execution, it was sent to Mr. Borrett, requesting the preparation of another bond for 15,000*l.*, and saying, "You are aware, I presume, that the principal object of myself and brothers in obtaining such a document is to prevent any future change in any will Mrs. Foster may be prevailed on to make to our disadvantage, my brother and myself being bequeathed by her last will the residuary property amounting to 19,000*l.*" Mr. Borrett, by return of post, sent another bond to secure the 15,000*l.*, which J. L. Lamotte took to his aunt and read over to her, while she looked over it and read it herself; that she expressed herself satisfied, and, at her request, R. W. Giles again called and attested her execution, after which it was returned to Mr. Borrett. In April 1846 G. T. C. Lamotte was appointed curate of D; he completed his purchase of the advowson in July 1846, and since the death of the incumbent had become the rector, and G. T. C. Lamotte, C. W. Lamotte and Sarah Lamotte the mother had since resided there.

J. L. Lamotte disposed of his aunt's house and furniture at Bayswater, and after recovering from an illness, he went to her at Clifton on the 3rd of May 1847, but finding her under the dominion of her servants he remonstrated with her, which gave offence, and on the 5th of May 1847 he left her residence, and never saw her again.

In a further answer the defendants said, that in 1845 Louisa Foster hoped and firmly believed that the plaintiff, Isaac Cooke, was on the point of making her an offer of marriage, but that at the end of the year 1845, or early in 1846, she found or fancied that his visits were less frequent, and expressed to those about her great displeasure and surprise at his not calling, and gave directions to her servants not to admit him when he called, and on one occasion she refused to see him, but that in April 1846 he called and took leave of her on the eve of her leaving Clifton for London.

Mr. Elmsley and Mr. Whitbread, on behalf of the plaintiffs, contended that the bond was obtained entirely through the influence which J. L. Lamotte had over the testatrix, without any professional assistance, without its effect being explained to her, and without her knowing that it would create a legal disability to her disposing of so much of her property. The bond had been prepared at a distance by solicitors unknown to her, though she had a solicitor in whom she had always placed the greatest confidence; and so little did she know what she had executed, or the effect of such an instrument, that in the subsequent disposition of her property she did not think it necessary to mention it to her solicitor, but disposed of nearly the whole. The bond had clearly been obtained by the influence which J. L. Lamotte had over the testatrix, and though it was in favour of her nephews, who were the objects of her bounty by will, this Court would not allow them, relations though they were, to obtain, through their personal influence, a deed to render a revocation of that bounty impossible or tolerate any trick to deprive her of her disposing power by will.

Hunter v. Atkins, 3 Myl. & K. 113.

Mr. R. Palmer, Mr. Walpole and Mr. Busk, for the defendants, contended that the circumstances attending the preparation and execution of this bond were so peculiar, that it was impossible to say that any surprise, misrepresentation, or deceit had been practised upon the testatrix. It was also difficult to suppose that she did not know the effect of what she was doing; there were but few who did not know that a deed or bond was a solemn act not to be torn or obliterated at pleasure, and few also who did not know that a will was a document revocable to the hour of dissolution. In the present case the testatrix was desirous of giving an immediate advantage to the defendants; their advancement was in her mind; their welfare was at her heart; it was sharpened perhaps by her own disappointments, at finding that the acme of her expectation was not to be reached; she had therefore denied herself to Mr. Cooke and had refused him admittance. Was it, therefore, to be wondered at that she had refused to consult him respecting the bond or its details? Might it not be said that the plaintiff, Cooke, himself had been the cause of not being consulted? Had not his visits been fewer and his attentions more frosty? When, therefore, the testatrix had resolved to give a benefit to her nephews, and to execute a bond to secure it, was it surprising that she should tell her nephew that he must take the necessary steps to have it prepared, or that he should communicate with those with whom he was acquainted, whose legal knowledge was undoubted, and in whom all must feel confidence? Was it also surprising that being ignorant of the law, he should seek advice respecting it? All case of deception however had vanished; all that remained for equity was influence alleged to have been improperly exercised, but it was that alone which was dictated by kindred and by affection. While that prevailed, this lady had considered the situation of the family and her relationship, and she had placed herself in loco parentis and looked upon her nephews as objects of her favour and compassion. She intended to provide for them. Did she then understand the effect of the documents she was executing? Was there any evidence she did not? Or that she did not know that the effect of a bond was to give an immediate legal security? If therefore she intended to provide for her nephews, and had done so, whether the security was revocable or irrevocable, whether in presenti or in futuro was immaterial. Where was the undue influence exercised? No misrepresentation had been made to her. It had been said that J. L. Lamotte stood in a fiduciary relation to the testatrix, but that was no ground for depriving him of post mortem benefits: let that but once be assigned for reason, and no one would take upon himself the execution of trusts. Upon the whole, the plaintiffs' case, therefore, must fail.

Mr. Elmsley was not heard in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I have carefully considered this case, and after anxiously looking at the papers I entertain no doubt upon the decree which ought to be made. It is said that the rule with respect to these cases is, that where there are relationships through which dominion may be exercised by one person over another, then the Court will not allow a deed to stand unless the person who takes the benefit of it can shew that the whole transaction was a righteous one. It is difficult to say what is meant by the expression, "where there is a relationship existing by which one person may exercise dominion over another." Lord Cottenham says it ought not to be confined to cases of a doctor and his patient;—a person and his spiritual adviser, when recourse is had to a clergyman for spiritual instruction:—a guardian and ward, only, as if it was capable of no extension; but that it is applicable to every case in which a person takes a benefit from another to the prejudice of that person and to his own advantage: but in each of those cases it is essential, if subsequently questioned, that the transaction should be proved to be one which this Court will allow to stand, and that the person voluntarily and deliberately performed the act with a clear knowledge of what it was, its operation and its effects. It is not, I think, possible to draw the rule closer or to make it more stringent, and it seems to embrace every case.

There are undoubtedly cases in which the Court considers from the relationship of the parties that there is a probability of undue influence being used, as in the case of guardian and ward, solicitor and client, and various other transactions of a similar description in which the Court from the nature of the relationship looks at the matter with jealousy. But as a general rule, I consider that in every transaction in which a person takes a benefit from another it is requisite that he should be able to establish that the donor did so voluntarily and deliberately, knowing what he was doing. That may be said in some respects to contradict the judgment in Hunter v. Atkins. There may be passages not quite consistent with what I have stated, but they are also inconsistent with a long series of authorities decided at different times. It is undoubtedly a peculiar case, but if carried further it might sap the foundation of one of the most valuable rules of equity, and might prevent the Court from administering that equity which has not only made its decisions established principles of jurisprudence, but at the same time has enforced an observance of high morality.

I shall first consider whether the evidence establishes that this lady, knowing what she was doing, voluntarily and deliberately performed the act,—as this I consider comes within that class of cases in which, if the Court cannot arrive at a conclusion one way or another, the instrument cannot stand, and it is upon that ground and upon that principle I put it. It is one of those cases in which the onus is not so much upon the plaintiff to establish a direct case of fraud, as it is necessary for the person claiming the benefit under the instrument to prove that the transaction is one which the Court will allow to remain unimpeached. Lord Eldon, in Gibson v. Jeyes (1), says, "It is necessary to say broadly that those who meddle with such transactions take upon themselves the whole proof that the thing is righteous," and that expression, I think, applies to this case; it remains, therefore, to consider, whether the evidence proves that the transaction upon the whole was a righteous one. From the year 1806, when J. L. Lamotte was born, to the year 1825, when the testatrix was married, he and his brothers seem to have been objects of her affection, and she made them a great many gifts. After her marriage there was less intercourse between them, but the correspondence was carefully preserved, and a great deal was put in evidence up to 1825. From that time, a great deal of correspondence is produced, and some is referred to after the decease of General Foster. After the decease of the General, the testatrix renewed her correspondence with J. L. Lamotte; she asked him to come to see her, which he did, and resided there at intervals, until the middle of the year 1846. The testatrix had made several wills during that time, giving increasing bounties to J. L. Lamotte and his two brothers. The last of these was made in November 1845, and gave a residue of 22,000*l.*, calculated at least to that amount, between the brothers. In the same year there was a correspondence, or rather conversation, with respect to a bond, but what the conversation was does not appear; but in December 1845 J. L. Lamotte prepared a statement to be laid before counsel, and the inquiry whether she could not give a bond "to prevent the possibility of her hereafter making any alteration in her will to the disadvantage of her nephews," was by no means immaterial.

This document was sent to George T. C. Lamotte, to be laid before Mr. F. Turner, for his opinion; but it does not appear that the statement was laid before the testatrix, or that it was made by her desire or at her wish; this was next followed by the letter of the 1st of February 1846, from J. L. Lamotte to G. T. C. Lamotte, which is also of importance. It has been said, on behalf of the defendants, that the real question was, whether the testatrix did or did not know that what she was about was, to make that irrevocable which was revocable. That was the object expressed in the statement that was to be shewn to counsel. In the letter of the 1st of February 1846, J. L. Lamotte explained why Mr. Cooke was not called in to prepare the bond, and why it was necessary to have it prepared in London. As to not calling in Mr. Cooke, I think it is not sufficient that in cases of this description there is no third party for the purpose of shewing that a transaction is invalid: still it is a very important ingredient in the transaction, but it amounts only to this, that the Court requires distinct evidence that the transaction is a "righteous" one; therefore, the investigation of a third person acting solely on behalf of the donor is the best security that can be given that she understood exactly what it was that took place. But if the Court receives that evidence from other sources, it will not consider the non-introduction of a third person, as in the present case, will be fatal to the transaction.

The bond was prepared by Mr. Borrett, a solicitor in London, and was sent down to J. L. Lamotte, but there was no one who acted on behalf of Mrs. Foster. Mr. Borrett did not consider that he acted as her solicitor; had he been, he would have taken care that the bond had been fully and entirely explained to her, and that she knew exactly its operation and effect. Did she then know that it was to make an irrevocable gift? It is suggested in this letter that her wish was to benefit them during her lifetime, and that this instrument was suggested as the means of effecting that purpose, and that money might have been raised upon this bond. But a security of this description would have been of no value, or at any rate of very little, for raising money. The property of the testatrix consisted chiefly of a large sum of money in the funds, of which she was tenant for life, with a power of appointment at her decease, but without any power of disposition during her life, and if she had not executed that power of appointment the bond was absolutely useless; and no person would advance money on such a bond, unless under very remarkable circumstances, and at very usurious interest. He could not have been secure that this lady would have executed this power of appointment; the bond, therefore, as an advantage to the defendants during their aunt's lifetime, was valueless, and no attempt having been made to raise money upon it shewed the impression, and such also appeared to have been the impression of the advisers in this matter.

Did, then, this lady, when she executed the bond, consider that she was making her will irrevocable? J. L. Lamotte admits that he never told her anything to that effect; he says, he believed she understood it, because he believed she knew that the transaction was to bind herself; and it has been argued that any person reading the bond must have understood that to be the effect of it; but there is no evidence that she did read the bond, or that it was ever read over, but there is distinct evidence by J. L. Lamotte that he never explained the nature of the bond; that when she signed it, in the presence of Mr. Giles, he says it was not read over by her, and that no explanation was given, but that she simply and voluntarily signed it. Is it certain that an elderly lady between seventy and eighty would, upon reading that bond, understand the effect of it? J. L. Lamotte, himself, did not consider that he knew the effect of such a bond without legal advice; he took the opinion of counsel before the bond was prepared, and he even thought it necessary to refer to his solicitor for explanation why the bond was double the amount of the gift. These, then, apparently, were not things understood by persons clearly, simply, and as a matter of course, though the effect might be apparent to a lawyer who read it. In the absence therefore of evidence, my impression is, that no person told this lady that the effect of the bond would be to make her will irrevocable.

Without information this lady could not have understood the effect of the bond, and it would be a monstrous assumption to say that she did; and I cannot consider that the transaction was explained to her, if she did it under the notion that it was to benefit them during her life. Why was not Mr. Cooke called in? It is stated in one of the letters that he was on "the black list;" but a reconciliation took place so shortly afterwards that it certainly seems it might have taken place before as well as so shortly after the transaction, and why did not Mr. J. L. Lamotte make the attempt to produce a reconciliation, that there might be no question or doubt about the validity of the transaction? If, however, it had taken place before the transaction, and the evidence on this is not clear, then there is no ground for not calling him in.

Mr. Borrett advised that a solicitor or some gentleman of high respectability should be called in to witness the bond; had it been an ordinary transaction in which a simple witness would have done, any person who could swear to the handwriting would have been sufficient; what, therefore, was meant was, not merely a person against whose character there was no impeachment, but a person of such rank and station as of itself would be a security that this lady knew what she was executing. There was no impeachment upon the character of Mr. Giles, whose evidence was given in the clearest and most truthful manner: he witnessed the execution of both documents, and could speak to the execution of one, but was not quite certain about the execution of both. The transaction being the same in both cases, and there being no explanation, it seems clear that the bond was not explained at the time; that Mr. Giles did not explain it, and so far as the evidence extends, it was not explained to her by any other person. What evidence, therefore, is there that she herself understood it?

There were then the letters of the 1st and the 4th of February; the last was not sent by the post to London, because George had left on the 5th for Brighton, but it is difficult to understand why she executed the first bond on the same day that she wrote the letter insisting upon the second bond; why also did she execute the second bond without requiring the first to be delivered up to be cancelled? But both were executed, and sent to Mr. Borrett, who might have got both stamped, and kept them in his possession ; but I cannot explain how this lady wrote this letter coupled with the fact of her executing the first bond almost contemporaneously with it. At the same time there is her handwriting "I insist on a bond." There is also undoubtedly her handwriting in her pocket book, "February 7, 1846.—This day gave my dear John a bond," but it is open to the same explanation. It is impossible also to consider if she believed that there was a bond which made her will irrevocable, that she should not have informed Mr. Cooke of it during the subsequent period when she employed him to make her will, and I cannot doubt that Mr. Cooke was ignorant of the whole transaction, and that he never heard of the existence of the bond.

The letter of the 1st of February 1846, also, cannot pass without remark. Why was it desired that neither George nor Charles should write to thank the lady ? They would be informed of the transaction, as the lady herself wrote to George, insisting on a bond for 15,000*l.* ; why, then, did she require that they should not write to thank her for her bounty ? If the answer could have thanked her for making an unalterable gift, that would have explained the transaction, and had it been entered into with her eyes open the Court would not have set it aside, though no party had been engaged on her behalf. If also it was necessary to employ a London solicitor, it would not have been improper to send him down to explain it, and had he witnessed the transaction he would undoubtedly have explained, and taken care that the lady knew the nature of the transaction before she signed it. I, however, think that the proof that she did understand the effect of the bond, lies upon the defendants, and it is their duty to establish the propriety of the transaction ; it is not necessary for the plaintiffs to establish the contrary, and in this case the evidence shews that she did not know that the bond would make her will irrevocable.

I place no reliance upon the evidence of the servants : it is open to grave observations.

I do not think that any question arises upon the preservation of the bond after it was executed or of no communication being made respecting the bonds, either on the one side or the other, except that it was not communicated by the testatrix to Mr. Cooke : but when in 1847 all intercourse ceased, and she deprived J. L. Lamotte of all benefit under her will and gave certain sums to her other nephews, that is quite inconsistent with the notion that she understood the nature of the instrument.

It has been argued that I ought to look at this transaction as if it had been impeached by the lady immediately after it took place ; but that is not my opinion, and if I could there would be this disadvantage, so far as the defendants are concerned, that it must be on the assumption that there was a denial by the lady herself that she had any knowledge of the transaction, and that the onus of proof would lie upon the defendants to establish what the transaction was, and that she was not ignorant of the nature of the instrument. Had it been contested in her lifetime she might have given evidence in answer to a cross-bill, and it might have set up the case of the defendants ; but it is they, I do not say improperly, who have made that impossible ; as Mr. J. L. Lamotte, when, in 1847, he wrote to Mr. Cooke respecting some supposed improper acts of the servants, might have mentioned that he had this bond. Mr. Cooke would then undoubtedly have mentioned it to this lady, and he would have had the advantage of as full and complete an answer as she would have been compelled to give to any suit if he had thought fit to institute any proceeding. The defendants, however, cannot take advantage of the absence of any testimony that might have been obtained from her admission. It was, however, subsequently, in September 1847, that she made her will, and a codicil in May 1848, and she died on the 14th of December 1848 : then immediately Mr. Cooke was informed of the bond.

Considering the whole of these facts, therefore, I am of opinion that it is not a case in which I ought to direct any issue, but I think it a case in which it was incumbent on the defendants to prove the validity of the transaction, and that its validity has not been proved. I am also of opinion, from the evidence, that the transaction was not properly explained to the lady when she executed the bond; but I do not consider that cases of this description require greater or stronger evidence than ordinary transactions, but there must always be sufficient to satisfy the Court. In this case, however, it is not proved, but I think the contrary is proved, that the bond was sufficiently and properly explained. But if credit is given to J. L. Lamotte's statement, that he believes she understood it, admitting that he did not explain it, the mere possibility of her understanding it is not sufficient to enable me to decide that the transaction can be supported. It is therefore with regret that, by the rules of this Court, which are of the greatest possible importance in transactions of this description, I consider myself bound to say that this bond cannot stand, and that I must make a decree that it shall be delivered up, with costs, to be paid by J. L. Lamotte. As to his brothers, the other defendants, I shall not give any costs. They do not appear to have been mixed up in the transaction further than as they took a benefit. As, therefore, the bond fails against Mr. J. L. Lamotte, it cannot be supported in favour of his brothers. The whole must either stand or fall together. A cross-bill has been filed by C. W. Lamotte and G. T. C. Lamotte, the framer of which would seem to raise a distinction between their cases and the case of J. L. Lamotte; but upon the authority of Bridgman v. Green, if the transaction is bad as to John L. Lamotte it is bad as to the others. At the same time, therefore, that I make the decree in the original bill, I must dismiss the cross-bill, with costs.

PARKER, V.C. } THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH v. ST. JOHN.
Jan. 12, 26. }

Church — Rectory — Waste — Timber — Repairs.

A rector is justified in cutting timber growing on the glebe, provided that he specifically applies it to the repairs of the rectory-house and the buildings on the glebe; but he is not justified in cutting such timber and selling it.

The circumstance that the rector had applied a much larger sum in the repairs of the rectory-house than the proceeds of the sale of timber cut by him, was held not to be an answer to a case made against him of cutting and selling timber, in a suit instituted by the patron.

The Duke of Marlborough, the plaintiff in this case, was the patron of Baldon-cum-Woodstock, in Oxfordshire, and Mr. St. John, the defendant, was the rector.

In June 1849, Mr. St. John cut down some timber standing on the glebe. In March 1850, Mr. St. John cut down more timber, sold it, and received the purchase-money. In April 1851, he cut down more timber, the greater part of which was lying on the glebe lands.

The plaintiff filed a bill against the defendant in respect of the timber which he had cut. The bill prayed that the defendant might be restrained from cutting timber growing on the glebe lands belonging to the rectory, except such trees as might be required for repairs necessary to be done on the buildings or lands of the rectory, and as should be assigned for that purpose, either by the agents of the plaintiff, or in such other manner as the Court should direct, and from mutilating or injuriously lopping any of such trees, and from selling or disposing of any of the timber or trees which had been already cut, and remaining unsold, and from applying or employing any part of such timber other than in and about such repairs, and from committing any other act of waste or injury upon or to the rectory or the lands or property thereof, or any part thereof, and for an account of the monies received by the defendant on account of the sales.

A notice of motion in the terms of the prayer was served on the defendant.

In answer to the motion, the defendant filed an affidavit to the effect that he had expended on the repairs of the rectory-house a much larger sum than he had received from the sale of the timber which had been sold.

The motion now came on to be heard.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Cairns, for the motion, contended that the defendant had no right to sell the timber. They said that in Knight v. Mosely (1) there was certainly the following passage from Lord Hardwicke's judgment. — "Parsons may fell timber or dig stone to repair, and they have been indulged in selling such timber or stone where the money has been applied in repairs."—In a note, however, to the case in Mr. Blunt's edition, Lord Hardwicke's judgment was given from Mr. Hargrave's manuscript, in which the corresponding part was stated thus :—"Parsons may fell trees for repairs and dig stone to be applied for the benefit of the rectory," omitting the passage as to the selling. The expressions of Lord Hardwicke were thus commented on, by Lord Eldon, in Wither v. the Dean and Chapter of Winchester (2) : — "There, too, Lord Hardwicke expressly declares, (if his words are rightly reported,) that parsons may, &c. If the case referred to be correctly reported, it was, &c.," thus shewing that Lord Eldon had some doubts as to the correctness of the report.—They also referred to The Bishop of Winchester v. Wolgar (3) and Herring v. the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's (4), and cited Strachy v. Francis (5), in which case Lord Hardwicke said :—"A rector may cut down timber for the repairs of the parsonage-house or the chancel, but not for any common purpose."

Mr. Willcock and Mr. Bird, for the defendant, relied on the passage in Lord Hardwicke's judgment in Knight v. Mosely, and cited Wither v. the Dean and Chapter of Winchester.

Mr. Bacon replied.

PARKER, V.C. (after stating the terms of the notice of motion).—The defendant on several occasions cut and sold timber, and he said that monies were expended by him upon necessary repairs upon the rectory buildings, exceeding the sums received for the timber sold. It has been insisted, on his behalf, that he was entitled to sell timber to defray the expenses of such repairs, and authorities were cited in support of this proposition. An ordinary tenant for life, it is well known, may take timber for repairs, but, if he sells the timber, it is considered as an act of waste. Lord Coke says, (Co. Litt. 53, b,) "The tenant cutteth downe trees for reparations, and selleth them, and after buyeth them againe, and employs them about necessary reparations, yet it is wast by the vendition." He laid it down that the tenant could not sell timber to enable him to pay for the general expenses of the repairs. It was not disputed in the argument that a rector was under restrictions as to waste, he being merely tenant for life. I know of no principle of law upon which a rector can obtain more extensive privileges as to waste than an ordinary tenant for life. It will be found that Littleton (pl. 644,) has stated, "That the parson or vicar that is seised, &c., as in right of his church, hath no right of the fee simple in the tenements, but the right of the fee simple abideth in another person." It is true that Lord Coke, in his commentary upon this section, notices that a rector had some rights which do not belong to an ordinary tenant for life. The words are, (Co. Litt. 341, a), "Upon consideration of all our bookes, I observe this diversitie, that a parson or vicar, for the benefit of the church and of his successor, is in some cases esteemed in law to have a fee simple qualified; but to doe anything to the prejudice of his successor, in many cases the law adjudgeth him to have in effect but an estate for life." The authorities seem to shew that a prohibition for waste, which was the ancient remedy against tenants for life, lay, if it did not now do so, at the suit of the patron against the rector—Com. Dig. tit. 'Wast,' (A 1.), Vin. Abr. tit. 'Waste,' (A). It was said that the powers of a rector to take wood could not be thus limited, for that, if timber was grown beyond what was wanted for repairs, the trees might go to decay, and that mines might remain for ever unopened. But it is to be observed, that the parson, with the consent of the patron and Ordinary, has unlimited power of alienation. He may cut timber and open mines, the patron and Ordinary taking care of the interests of the church, and, at this day, the Court would have no difficulty, upon a proper application, in directing timber to be cut, and the purchase-money to be applied for the benefit of the living. Knight v.

(2) 3 Mer. 421.

(3) 3 Swanst. 493, n.

(4) Ibid. 492.

(5) 2 Atk. 217.

Mosely, decided by Lord Hardwicke, and Wiher v. the Dean and Chapter of Winchester, were relied upon. In the latter of these cases, the extent to which the dean and chapter were entitled to cut timber for repairs came in question. But it must be observed, that a dean and chapter have an estate in fee simple, and at common law they have unlimited power of alienation. On whatever grounds, therefore, the restrictions under which they lay as to waste may depend, their privilege cannot be less than those of a rector. In the case before Lord Eldon, the Dean and Chapter of Winchester stated that timber was wanted for repairs of the cathedral, and that the timber growing upon the premises in question was insufficient to supply them. The dean and chapter, as Lord Eldon observed, had an undoubted right to cut the timber, and the question to which he adverted, as a point of some controversy, was, whether an ecclesiastical body having cut timber for repairs was bound specifically to apply such timber to the actual repairs wanted. He intimated an opinion that an ecclesiastical body was not to be compelled to apply the identical timber by removing it from a distant part of the country. The right of an ecclesiastical person to sell timber or to apply the proceeds, generally, without regard to the quantity wanted, was not in question in that case.

In reference to the question before Lord Eldon, it may be remarked that his Lordship referred to the case in Ambler, with an intimation of some doubt whether Lord Hardwicke's words were rightly reported. In the case of Knight v. Mosely, Lord Hardwicke was reported to have said, "that parsons might fell timber, or dig stone, to repair, and that they had been indulged in selling such timber or stone where the money had been applied in repairs." It appears from Mr. Blunt's note, that this latter part was not contained in Mr. Hargrave's notes of the judgment. The passage was ambiguous. It might only mean that parsons had been indulged to the extent contended for by the permission of the patron. But, however this may be, the report in Ambler is too imperfect and too doubtful to give the weight of Lord Hardwicke to the proposition attributed to him, that rectors and vicars may cut to any extent to provide a fund for general repairs. It is also to be observed, that Lord Hardwicke, in the case of Strachy v. Francis, treated the privilege of a rector to cut timber as being the same as that of an ordinary tenant for life. The greater part of the timber in the present case had been cut in 1849, 1850 and 1851. Part of this was sold, and of such part no account had been given by Mr. St. John. Shortly after the filing of the bill, some trees were cut, which are now lying on the glebe lands. There was some dispute as to whether they were cut by Mr. St. John's authority. Considering the admitted fact, that timber on the former occasions was cut by the defendant under circumstances which appear to me to amount to waste, and also the claim of right made by the defendant, I think that the patron is entitled to the injunction sought by him. The terms of the injunction will be very much in the terms of the prayer of the bill—(omitting part of it)—"to restrain Mr. St. John from cutting or felling, or causing to be cut or felled, any timber or other trees growing on the glebe lands, or other the lands belonging to the rectory, except such trees as may be required for the repairs necessary to be done upon the buildings or lands of the rectory, and from selling or disposing of any of the timber or other trees which had been already cut upon such lands, and now remaining unsold." Where the rector is entitled to cut for repairs, he is at liberty to take without anybody's consent. As Mr. St. John has merely taken an erroneous view of his rights, and thereby has committed waste, the Court will not be justified in restraining him beyond what the law had declared to be waste.

Practice—Order of Course—Irregularity—Discharge.

Applications to discharge orders obtained as of course at the Rolls should be made to the Court to which the cause is attached.

An order had been obtained as of course at the Rolls to change a solicitor in this cause, which was a cause attached to the court of Vice Chancellor Turner.

Mr. Moore now moved, before the Master of the Rolls, to discharge it on the ground of irregularity.

Mr. Giffard.—Whatever the practice may have been, it is now settled that applications to discharge orders of course ought to be made in the court to which the cause is attached; the merits of the cause, if necessary, can then be gone into, but that cannot be so in this court, which never considers more than the question of regularity or irregularity: this had been found inconvenient, and it has been abandoned—26th Order of the 2nd of November 1850 (1).

Trustee Act, 1850—Vesting Order.

A sum of stock was standing in the names of A. and B, in trust for C. for life, with remainders over. A. and B. refused to pay the dividends to C. On a petition presented by C. under the Trustee Act, 1850, that the right to receive the dividends accrued and to accrue, might be vested in her,—Held, first, that under the 23rd and 24th sections, an order might be made as to the dividends already accrued, notwithstanding the refusal of the two trustees; and, secondly, that no order could be made as to the future dividends.

Mr. Hartnall, by his will, dated in 1823, bequeathed a sum of stock to trustees, upon trust to pay the dividends to the petitioner for life, with remainders over. This sum became vested in Mr. Poole, the surviving trustee. Mr. Poole died, and administration to his estate was granted to two administrators.

This was a petition by the tenant for life stating that the administrators of Mr. Poole had refused to receive the dividends, and praying for an order of the Court to vest in her the sole right to receive the dividends which had accrued and the future dividends to accrue due during her life (2).

Mr. Freeling, for the petition, stated the difficulty to the Court arising from the above-mentioned sections of the act. By applying the interpretation clause to the 23rd section, or by the 24th section the case might be brought within the act.

PARKER, V.C. made the order.

On the above order having been made, the Bank of England objected to that part of it by which the right of receiving the future accruing dividends was vested in the petitioner. At their request this point was brought before the Court.

Mr. Cotton, for the Bank of England, contended that the act gave the right only to receive past dividends, and said that the Court was not empowered under it to give an order vesting the right to receive

(2) The 23rd section of the Trustee Act, 1850, so far as relates to the question before the Court, is this:—"That where any sole trustee of any stock shall neglect or refuse to receive the dividends thereof, according to the direction of the person absolutely entitled thereto, for the space of twenty-eight days next after a request in writing for that purpose shall have been made to him by the person absolutely entitled thereto, it shall be lawful for the Court of Chancery to make an order vesting the sole right to receive the dividends thereof in such person or persons as the said Court may appoint."

The 24th section is as follows:—"That where any one of the trustees of any stock shall neglect or refuse (using the language of the last section) it shall be lawful for the Court of Chancery to make an order vesting the right to receive the dividends, &c. in the other trustee or trustees of the said stock, or in any person or persons whom the said Court may appoint, jointly with such other trustee or trustees."

By the 2nd section it is enacted, "That generally, unless the contrary shall appear from the context, every word importing the singular number only shall extend to several persons or things, and every word importing the plural number shall apply to one person or thing, and every word importing the masculine gender only shall extend to a female."

the future dividends in a person not entitled to the capital.

PARKER, V.C. said that he had made the first order on an ex parte application. On considering the question, with the assistance of the counsel for the Bank of England, he thought that he had not the power, under the act, of directing the payment of the dividends of stock to a person not entitled to the stock. The effect of this would be to make the Bank of England perform the functions of the Accountant General. He thought that, unless there were express words in the act to that effect, he could not create such a relation between the Court and the Bank of England. The order must be confined to the dividends due at the date of the petition.

Trustee Act, 1850—Vesting Order.

Stock was standing in the names of A. and B. upon trust for C. for life, with remainders over. By an order made in a cause instituted by C. against A. and B, with respect to the stock, it was ordered that A. and B. should transfer the stock to the credit of the cause. A. refused to make the transfer. A petition was presented by C. under the Trustee Act, 1850, and in the cause, praying that the right to transfer the stock might be vested in B. alone:—Held, that the Court had not jurisdiction to make the order.

A sum of stock was standing in the names of R. Mayne and Donald Mackenzie, upon trust for Miss Mackenzie, afterwards Mrs. Simpson, for life, with remainders over. This suit was instituted by Miss Mackenzie against the trustees in respect of this stock. By an order made in the cause, on the 8th of August 1851, the trustees were ordered to transfer the stock to the credit of the cause. Mr. Mayne having declined to comply with the order, Miss Mackenzie presented a petition in the cause and under the Trustee Act, 1850, under which an order was made, in accordance with the prayer, declaring that Mr.

Mackenzie was a trustee of the stock, and that the right to transfer the stock had vested in Mr. Mayne, and directing that Mr. Mayne should transfer it into court.

The sections of the act having reference to this order are the 23rd and 24th (1).

The Bank of England having declined to allow of this transfer, on the ground that the order made was not authorized by the act, a motion was now made for directing them to comply with the order.

Mr. Tennant, for the motion, cited—

In re King, 10 Sim. 605; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 257.

In re Russell's Trust, 1 Sim. N.S. 404; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 196. and referred to the 37th and 43rd sections of the act.

Mr. Wigram and Mr. Cotton, for the Bank, contended, that the act did not apply to the case in question, as the words were "according to the direction of the person absolutely entitled thereto," whereas in this case the petitioner had only an estate for life.

PARKER, V.C. said that, while he thought that a large construction ought to be put on the act, care must be taken that a loose construction was not put on it. There were two positions to be established in applications under the act: the first, that the case came within it; the second, that the application should be made by the proper parties. The case brought before the Court was the disobedience of a trustee to obey an order where there was an absolute interest in the stock. The proper remedy was to be found in the 1 Will. 4. c. 36. sect. 15. division 15. He thought that the order could not be proceeded with.

(1) By the 23rd section it is enacted:—"That where any sole trustee of any stock shall refuse to transfer such stock, according to the direction of the person absolutely entitled thereto, for the space of twenty-eight days next after a request in writing for that purpose shall have been made to him by the person absolutely entitled thereto, it shall be lawful for the Court to make an order vesting the sole right to transfer such stock, in such person or persons as the said Court may appoint."

By the 24th section it is enacted:—"That where any one of the trustees of any stock shall refuse to transfer such stock, according to the directions of the person absolutely entitled thereto, for the space of twenty-eight days, &c. it shall be lawful for the Court of Chancery to make an order vesting the right to transfer such stock, in the other trustee of the said stock."

Mr. Tennant asked that the order of the 8th of August might be discharged.

PARKER, V.C. said that this could only be done by consent of all parties, or on notice.

Attachment—Affidavit—Title of Order.

By an order entitled in a cause and in the matter of the Trustee Act, A. was ordered to transfer a sum of money into court. The affidavit of service of this order on A. was entitled in the cause only. A. was committed for contempt for refusing to obey the order. The writ of attachment was discharged for irregularity, on the ground of the difference between the title of the order and the title of the affidavit.

Miss E. F. Mackenzie, an infant, by her next friend, filed a bill against Donald Mackenzie and R. Mayne, in respect of a sum of stock standing in their names, and afterwards, having married Mr. Simpson, filed a bill of revivor against him.

By an order made, on the 8th of August 1851, in the cause and under the Trustee Act, 1850, it was ordered (among other things) that the right to transfer the stock should be vested solely in Mr. Mayne, and that Mr. Mayne should transfer such stock into the name of the Accountant General to the credit of the cause. The Bank of England having declined to allow the transfer to be made, on the ground that the case did not come within the Trustee Act, the matter was again brought before the Court, and the Court declined to interfere (see last case).

On the 22nd of January 1852 an order was made, on the motion of Mr. Mayne, whereby it was (among other things) ordered, that the order of the 8th of August 1851 should be discharged, and that Mr. Mackenzie should concur with Mr. Mayne in making a transfer of the stock into court.

The title of this order was as follows:—
“Between E. F. Mackenzie, plaintiff, and D. Mackenzie, R. Mayne, and P. S. Keir, defendants, and between E. F. Simpson, an infant, by her next friend, plaintiff, and C. R. Simpson, defendant, and in the matter of the Trustee Act, 1850.”

Mr. Mayne having refused to comply with the order, was committed for contempt.

The title of the affidavit of the service of the order on Mr. Mayne, upon which the writ of attachment was issued, was as follows:—“Between E. F. Mackenzie, plaintiff, and D. Mackenzie, R. Mayne, and P. S. Keir, defendants, and between E. F. Simpson, late an infant, by her next friend, plaintiff, and C. R. Simpson, defendant.”

The differences between the two titles were, that in the former there were the words “an infant,” and in the latter “late an infant,” and that in the latter there was no mention of the Trustee Act.

This was a motion that the writ of attachment of Mr. Mackenzie might be discharged for irregularity.

The deponent to the affidavit stated that he “did personally serve the said D. Mackenzie with an order made in this cause.”

Mr. Toller, for the motion, contended that the affidavit of the service was irregular: first, on the ground that in the title there ought to have been the words “E. F. the wife of C. R. Simpson,” instead of “E. F. Simpson;” and, secondly, that the title ought to have contained a reference to the Trustee Act.

Mr. Tennant, for Mr. Mayne, contended that the affidavit was regular.

PARKER, V.C. (after conferring with Mr. Berrey, the Clerk of Records and Writs) said that Mr. Berrey's opinion was, first, that if the title of the affidavit had followed the title of the order, the affidavit would have been regular, although the title of the order might not have been correct; and, secondly, that as the title of the affidavit did not follow the title of the order (the Trustee Act being mentioned in the one and not in the other), the affidavit was irregular. He said that he thought that the opinion of the officer of the Court was deserving of great consideration in such matters, and that he should follow it. There was the possibility that there might have been the service of some other order. The writ must be discharged.

Mr. Toller asked that it might be discharged, with costs, and contended that in such a matter the Court had not discretion as to costs.

PARKER, V.C. said that he considered that he had a discretion in the matter, and that he should not give Mr. Mackenzie his costs.

Writ discharged, without costs.

SIMS v. HELLING.

Practice—Appeal from an Order on a Claim.

On the hearing of an appeal from the whole order, made at the hearing of a suit by claim, the same rule is followed as to opening as on an appeal from the whole decree made in a suit by bill.

This case came on, by way of appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, by which he made a decree in favour of the plaintiff (1), the defendant appealing from the whole decree.

On the case being called on,

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. Sandys requested an expression of opinion from the Bench as to the rule of practice to be adopted on appeals from decrees made upon claims, as to the proper party to open the case. The plaintiff here appeared to support the order of the Master of the Rolls made in his favour, the defendant having appealed against the whole decree.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—We have had this point not unfrequently mentioned, but on each occasion we have as yet abstained from laying down any general rule, and have not desired what we did to be taken as a precedent.]

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Tripp, for the appellant.—It would be very convenient if a general rule of practice were settled. The general scope of the wording of the 29th of the Orders of April 1850, would seem to imply that the rule respecting appeal motions was to be followed, for it is said, "any order made in pursuance of these Orders may be discharged, altered, varied, or set aside on motion," and the 30th Order says that any order may be discharged or varied "on motion," so that your Lordships would appear to be called upon to frame your proceedings in the same way as if the defendant, the appellant, were now moving to discharge the order made by his Honour the Master of the Rolls. If that be so, then, as appellant, he would begin.

Mr. Bedwell (the Registrar), in answer to a question from the Court, said his impression was, that the Orders contemplated that the proceedings on such an appeal should be conducted on the same rule as on an appeal from a decree made in a suit by bill.

Mr. Roundell Palmer.—That view is borne out by the language, for although the word "order" is used throughout when speaking of the decision come to on a claim, yet the 14th Order says that every order "so to be made is to have the effect of, and may be enforced as a decree or decretal order made in a suit commenced by bill." It certainly appears, independently of the wording of the Orders of April 1850, more rational that the same practice should be followed in a suit by claim, as in a suit by bill, so far as an appeal is concerned.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—In my opinion the better rule to follow will be to adopt the analogy to a decree pronounced in a suit by bill, and to treat this appeal and all subsequent appeals in that manner. The appeal here being against the whole decree, the plaintiff will begin. I do not think that by the use of the word "motion," in the Orders, there was any intention to give any collateral advantage as to the opening and the reply in the case of an appeal. The order of the Court, in the case of a claim, is as much a decree as a decree or decretal order in a suit by bill.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE concurred.

Legacy—Specific Bequest of Leaseholds—Covenant to Repair—Dilapidations.

A testatrix bequeathed leasehold property to R. A. absolutely during the residue of her term, subject to the payment of the rent and performance of the covenants reserved and contained in the lease; and, as to her residuary estate, subject to the payment of her debts, &c., she gave the same to J. B. absolutely:—Held, upon appeal, reversing the decree below, that R. A. took the leaseholds cum onere, namely, with the liability to make good the dilapidations that had accrued during the life of the testatrix; and that R. A. should indemnify the executors against liability under the covenant to repair before he was let into possession.

The principal question in this case was, whether a specific legatee of a leasehold estate took the same subject to the liability, under the covenant to repair contained in the lease, to make good the dilapidations that had accrued in the lifetime of the testatrix, or whether the residuary estate of the testatrix was primarily liable in exoneration. The Vice Chancellor Wigram held that the residuary estate was liable in exoneration of the specific bequest, and directed a certain part of the residuary estate to be set apart as an indemnity fund to the executors of the testatrix.

The present appeal was from that decree.

Mr. Teed and Mr. Craig, contra.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear in the judgment; but the following cases were cited, besides those noticed in the judgment:—

Cox v. King, 9 Beav. 530.

Nov. 6.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is an appeal against so much of an order of Wigram, V.C., made on the 12th of July 1844, on further directions, as directed that a certain sum of stock should be set aside to indemnify the executors of the testatrix in the cause against liabilities in respect of the repair of premises held under a lease, which was bequeathed by the will. The facts of the case are these: Zillah Taylor, by her will, dated in October 1837, bequeathed the leaseholds in question to R. Ashby, his executors, &c. absolutely, during the residue of her term therein, subject to the payment of the rent and performance of the covenants reserved and contained in the lease under which she held the same premises; and as to her residuary real and personal estate, subject to her debts, &c., she gave the same to James Boyer, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns absolutely. In September 1839 the testatrix died, and afterwards two of her executors filed a bill for the administration of her estate. In May 1842 a decree was made referring it to the Master to take the usual accounts and directing certain inquiries as to liabilities. In 1844 the report was made, certifying that by an indenture of lease of the 7th of April 1803, a piece of ground and seventeen messuages thereon were granted to George Taylor for ninety-nine years from the 25th of March then last, and that in such lease was contained a covenant on the part of George Taylor, his executors, administrators and assigns, to keep the said premises, and all buildings that might thereafter be erected on the said piece of ground, in proper repair during the continuance of the term; that G. Taylor made three underleases of different parts of the said premises, containing similar covenants to repair; and that the said G. Taylor bequeathed the premises to his cousin

George Taylor, who bequeathed the same to Zillah Taylor; that at the time of her death, dilapidations had taken place (but whether any had taken place before the commencement of her title the Master was unable to state); that in November 1839 it would have required 1,849*l.* to have put the premises in repair, but in April 1843 only 1,369*l.* By the order of the 12th of July 1844 it was ordered, among other things, that the sum of 1,500*l.* 3*l.* per cent. bank annuities should be carried over to an account to be entitled "The Executors' Indemnity Account," and that the dividends thereof should be laid out in the like stock, &c.; and it was ordered that Richard Ashby should be let into possession, and that the deeds should be delivered up and the rents paid to him, and that J. Boyer should be at liberty to take legal proceedings to compel the under-lessees to repair, and for that purpose to make use of the names of the executors, who were to be indemnified out of the indemnity fund. In April 1845 J. Boyer died, and by an order of the 7th of May 1846, it was ordered that the executors of J. Boyer should be at liberty to take proceedings against the under-lessees, to compel them to make good the dilapidations, and for that purpose to use the names of the surviving executors of the testatrix. By an order of the 30th of May 1846, on the petition of the surviving executors of the testatrix, it was ordered that the legacy duty of the residue of the testatrix's estate should be paid, partly out of the indemnity fund, and that the dividends of that fund should be paid to the executors of J. Boyer, and that the deficiency in that fund, caused by such payments thereout, should be made up out of certain other funds. In 1847 R. Ashby died, and William Cherrington, the executor of J. Boyer, has appealed from so much of the order of July 1844 as directed 1,500*l.* to be carried over to an account entitled "The Executors' Indemnity Account," and the dividends invested in trust to the like account, and the executors of the testatrix to be indemnified thereout, and from so much of the order of the 30th of May 1846 as directed the deficiency in the executors' indemnity fund to be made good; and the appellant prayed that what remained of the indemnity fund, after the payments directed by the order of the 30th of May 1846, with the dividends thereof, should be paid to himself.

The appellant contends that, under the terms of the bequest, the legatee took subject to the liabilities attaching to the lease, and that he, and not the testatrix's estate, was bound to pay the expenses of the repairs; and I am of opinion that by the express terms of the will, R. Ashby was to take the leasehold estate cum onere. For the respondents, the cases of Cochrane v. Robinson (1) and Fletcher v. Stevenson (2) were cited; but in neither of those cases did the will contain any expressions similar to those in the present case. But there are two cases in which similar expressions occur. In Serle v. St. Eloy (3) the testator devised his land in D. to A, an infant, at her age of twenty-one, subject to the incumbrances thereupon, the rents to be paid to her father for her maintenance, and he devised other lands to trustees for the payment of his debts. It was objected that the lands in D. were devised subject to the incumbrances thereon, for which reason the devisee must take them cum onere; but the Master of the Rolls said that the devise of the estate, subject to the incumbrances, was no more than what was implied; for the testator could not do otherwise; but when the testator devised other lands to pay his debts, that must be intended all his debts; and that was the stronger by reason of the disposition of the interim rents, which was as much as to say that they should not be applied in discharge of the mortgage. In Graves v. Hicks (4) a testator devised real estate, subject nevertheless to such charges and incumbrances as should, at the time of his death, be existing thereon by virtue of any marriage settlement or otherwise; and he bequeathed his residuary personal estate, subject to and charged with the payment of his debts; the real estate was in mortgage to secure a sum settled on his daughter on her marriage; and the mortgage deed contained the usual covenant for the payment of the money. The Vice Chancellor held, that the mortgaged premises were charged with and subject and liable in the first instance to the payment of that sum; and he grounded his decision partly on the words "subject nevertheless," and partly, on the distinction between an ordinary mortgage and the provisions in a settlement; and he quoted the words of Lord Hardwicke, in Lanoy v. the Duke of Athol (5), "There being a borrowing and a lending in the case of a mortgage, the real estate is considered only as a pledge, and the personal estate, which is the natural fund, is liable in the first instance; but this rule has never been carried so far as to extend it to a provision upon a settlement. There is a distinction also between testamentary gifts of mortgaged estates and leaseholds; the words 'subject, &c.' when used in relation to the first, are not mere surplusage, even when they are not construed to import that the party is to take cum onere; for they may be meant to shew at once that the estate is in mortgage; but those words, when used with reference to property described as leasehold, are surplusage, unless they are construed to signify that the bequest is to be subject to the performance of the covenant to repair in respect of dilapidations existing at the death of the testator. It appears to me, however, only natural, and in accordance with the presumable intention of the testator in making a specific bequest of leaseholds, that the legatee should take them subject to the burden of repairs. It is true that, except in special cases, the general personal estate is the first fund for the payment of debts, and the other kinds of property are exonerated; but the doctrine of exoneration has no application to a case like the present. Lord Hardwicke, in the passage quoted by the Vice Chancellor in Graves v. Hicks, has pointed out a distinction between ordinary mortgages and provisions in a settlement; and even in the case of a mortgage, the cases of Scott v. Beecher (6), The Earl of Ilchester v. the Earl of Carnarvon (7) and The Earl of Clarendon v. Barham (8) shew that where the mortgage debt was not the original debt of the testator, the estate itself must bear the burden, even though the testator has charged other parts of his property with the payment of his debts; and if there is a distinction between an ordinary mortgage and a settlement by way of mortgage as regards exoneration, there is, at least, an equal distinction between a mortgage and the present case. The general personal estate of the testatrix never received anything which, as in the case of a mortgage debt, it was under a natural obligation to replace; nor was the liability in respect of the dilapidations an actual debt of the testatrix, for non constat but that the under-lessees would do the repairs when called upon. Both on the language of the will and on general principles I am of opinion that R. Ashby was liable as between himself and the executors of the testatrix to do the repairs in respect of dilapidations existing at the time of the testatrix's death. But whatever may be the case with respect to the liability to repairs as between the specific and residuary legatees, no disposition and no expression of intention on her part can alter the rights of the lessor.

The testatrix was an assignee of the lease, and an assignee cannot, by assigning over, get rid of his liability for breaches of covenant committed during the period of his occupation. The executors, therefore, are entitled to an indemnity in respect of such liability. I do not consider the lessors barred in this case by not having come in before the Master; for though the liability was known, yet it was uncertain whether it would not be removed by a repair of the premises; which, indeed, has taken place to a considerable extent since the death of the testatrix.

An objection was taken that the right of the appellant has been waived by the petition of the 7th of May 1846, and the order obtained thereon. But this objection is not tenable, for the executors of Boyer were entitled to the residuary estate, and the residuary estate was liable to the lessor, and the under-lessees were liable to those claiming under George Taylor and the testatrix; and the executors of James Boyer were justified in endeavouring to compel the under-lessees to repair for the purpose of removing the liability of the testatrix's estate; but this did not affect their right as between R. Ashby and themselves to require that the expense of the repairs should be borne by R. Ashby rather than by the residuary estate. In Shadbolt v. Woodfall (9) it was held that an executor who had consented unconditionally to a specific bequest of the testator's personal estate was not entitled to an indemnity out of the general estate in respect of a covenant in the lease. But in this case it does not appear that such an assent was given. I think the order of July 1844 was wrong in directing the leaseholds to be given up to R. Ashby, but that he ought to have been required to give an indemnity to the executors before being let into possession; and then there would have been no need of impounding any part of the residuary estate. How to make a decree which will be consistent with the rights of all parties, the executors of the testatrix, the executors of Boyer, the executors of R. Ashby and the lessor, is not easy to determine. But I think I shall be accomplishing this, as far as may be, by declaring that R. Ashby took the premises subject to the liability of performing the covenant to repair, and by directing the personal representative of R. Ashby to deliver up possession to the executors of the testatrix till the repairs be done or indemnity given; and that the present indemnity fund be made up as directed by the order of the 30th of May 1846; and that, when the executors of the testatrix shall have been so indemnified, then the indemnity fund shall be paid to the executors of J. Boyer, and the dividends be paid to them in the mean time; and that the personal representatives of R. Ashby be at liberty to take proceedings against the under-lessees, and for that purpose to use the names of the executors of the testatrix, they being indemnified out of the fund retained by them. At the same time I think it right that the personal representative of R. Ashby should have an opportunity of contesting this order. Therefore, I make the order I have mentioned, unless such representative within one month after the service of the order present a petition to have the matter re-heard.

Interpleader—Defendants—Relief against Plaintiffs.

G. P. the elder was the owner of one-third of a ship, Messrs. S, M. & Co., of Calcutta, were the owners of another third, and were mortgagees of the other third, of which G. P. the younger was the owner. R, I. & Co., of London, were the agents of S, M. & Co., and they appointed Messrs. T. the ship's brokers, who as such received the freight, which amounted to 2,721l. 2s. 7½d., and paid one-third, 907l. 0s. 10d., to G. P. the elder. R, I. & Co. accepted several bills of exchange drawn against this freight, and before they became due stopped payment. S, M. & Co. also stopped payment, and finally became insolvent. Claims were then made upon Messrs. T. for the whole freight by R, I. & Co., and also by the holders of the bills drawn by them, as well as on behalf of S, M. & Co. and G. P. the younger, and upon a bill filed by Messrs. T. that the defendants might interplead in respect of the 1,814l. 1s. 9d. :—Held, that no decree could be made in the suit to compel the plaintiffs to bring the entire freight into court; that as no defendant asked to have the bill dismissed, the Court must make a decree of interpleader; and that such decree would only protect them to the extent of 1,814l. 1s. 9d.

This bill was filed, by Henry Heyman Toulmin and Calvert Toulmin, who in and previous to the month of July 1847 carried on the business of ship-brokers at 31, Great St. Helen's, under the firm of "Henry and Calvert Toulmin," against Sir John Rae Reid, Bart., John Irvine, George Reid, James Milligan, Robert and J. Henderson, and against George Palmer the younger and John Cochrane, when they should come within the jurisdiction; and it prayed that the defendants might interplead together; and that it might be ascertained and declared to which of the defendants the sum of 1,814*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.*, and every part thereof, of right belonged, or was payable, or ought to be paid, the plaintiffs being ready and willing and offering to pay the sum to such of the defendants as should appear to be entitled thereto; and that the plaintiffs in the mean time might pay the money into court; and that Messrs. R. & J. Henderson might be restrained from issuing execution on an attachment issued from the Lord Mayor's Court, or taking any other proceedings in respect thereof against the plaintiffs; and that Messrs. Cochrane & Palmer might be restrained from prosecuting the actions commenced by them, and that Messrs. Cochrane & Palmer, Sir J. R. Reid, and Messrs. Irvine, G. Reid and Milligan might be restrained from taking any proceedings at law against the plaintiffs.

Previously to July 1847 George May and Charles Hampden Pickford carried on business at Calcutta in partnership, as merchants and agents, under the style of Saunders, May, Fordyce & Co. And Sir J. R. Reid, J. Irvine, G. Reid & J. Milligan carried on business in London, in partnership as merchants and agents, under the style of Reid, Irvine & Co.

Previous to this time both these firms were in mutual intercourse and correspondence, and had divers dealings and transactions with each other.

In July 1847 G. Palmer the elder, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, G. Palmer the younger, now residing at Calcutta, out of the jurisdiction, master mariner, and the defendants, G. May and C. H. Pickford, as the partners constituting the firm of Saunders, May, Fordyce & Co. were possessed, as part owners, of the ship called the Punjaub, of which G. Palmer the younger was master, and G. May and C. H. Pickford, as partners constituting the firm of Saunders, May, Fordyce & Co., were possessed of one-third of the ship, and G. Palmer the elder and G. Palmer the younger were respectively entitled each to one-third of the said ship; and G. May and C. H. Pickford alleged that G. Palmer the younger had mortgaged to them, or to the firm, his one-third of the ship to secure the repayment of a considerable sum of money; and that such mortgage was subsisting in 1847 and 1848.

In February 1847 the Punjaub was at Calcutta, bound on a voyage to London with a cargo of merchandise, and was with the cargo consigned by Messrs. Saunders, May, Fordyce & Co. to Messrs. Reid, Irvine & Co.

In July 1847 the plaintiffs were appointed by G. Palmer the elder and the defendant, G. Palmer the younger, and Messrs. Reid, Irvine & Co. as the correspondents and agents of Messrs. Saunders, May, Fordyce & Co. to be the brokers for the ship Punjaub, to transact the necessary business connected with the homeward voyage of the ship, and, upon her arrival in the port of London, to make all necessary payments and disbursements in respect of the ship, and to collect and receive the freight payable for the cargo to the owners of the ship.

On the 21st of July 1847 the plaintiffs received a letter from Messrs. G. Palmer the elder and G. Palmer the younger, as follows:—

“Messrs. H. & C. Toulmin.

“Dear Sirs,—We request you to pay over to Reid, Irvine & Co. the freight per Punjaub when received. We are, &c.

“G. Palmer and G. Palmer, jun.”

In July 1847, the ship Punjaub arrived in the port of London, and was reported at the Custom House on the 26th of July 1847.

It was alleged by Sir J. R. Reid, J. Irvine, G. Reid and J. Milligan that the said G. May and C. H. Pickford, or the house of Saunders, May, Fordyce & Co., had drawn at Calcutta upon the firm of Reid, Irvine & Co. five bills of exchange, dated in the month of February 1847, and two bills dated in April 1847, amounting to 4,338*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.*, payable respectively ten months and six months after date, against the share of the freight which would be payable to Messrs. Saunders, May, Fordyce & Co. in respect of their own one-third share thereof, and in respect of the said one-third share of the freight so mortgaged to them as aforesaid by the defendant, G. Palmer the younger; and that such bills of exchange had been accepted by the defendants, Sir J. R. Reid, J. Irvine, G. Reid and J. Milligan, and were charged upon the two shares of the freight of the said Saunders, May, Fordyce & Co. and the said defendant, G. Palmer the younger.

After the arrival of the ship Punjaub in the port of London, and before the bills of exchange became due, the defendants, Sir J. R. Reid, J. Irvine, G. Reid and J. Milligan, required the plaintiffs to give them, or the firm of Reid, Irvine & Co., an undertaking in writing to pay to the firm the freight when it should be received, which the plaintiffs did, as follows:—

“Messrs. Reid, Irvine & Co.

“31, Great St. Helen's, 26th July 1847.

“Gentlemen,—We hereby engage to pay over to you the freight per Punjaub when received, and we engage not to release the cargo without first receiving the freight. We are, gentlemen, yours obediently,

“H. & C. Toulmin.”

In the month of September 1847 Messrs. Reid, Irvine & Co. stopped payment and dishonoured all the bills of exchange, but continued to carry on the business under a deed of inspection, dated the 1st of January 1848.

On the 4th of November 1847, Messrs. Saunders, May, Fordyce & Co. stopped payment; but George May and C. H. Pickford continued to carry on the business under a deed of inspection, dated the 29th of December 1847.

In consequence of the failure of Reid, Irvine & Co., George Palmer the elder wrote to the plaintiffs as follows:—

“Newcastle on Tyne, September 28, 1847.

“Messrs. H. & C. Toulmin.—Dear Sirs,—From circumstances which have arisen, my son and myself deem it prudent that the freight of the Punjaub should either be paid to us or our agent; and we should, of course, prefer you to any other party receiving it on our account. Any order given hitherto to or on behalf of any other person we revoke, as we have been advised we ought. I shall feel obliged by a communication from you in course, that no misunderstanding may arise between us.—I remain, &c. Geo. Palmer.”

The plaintiffs collected the freight, and after deducting their payments and commission there remained in their hands a balance amounting to 2,721*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.*, out of which they paid 907*l.* 0*s.* 10*d.* to George

Palmer the elder, as owner of one-third of the ship, which left a balance in their hands of 1,814*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.*, which, in consequence of the conflicting claims, they could not pay with safety to themselves.

On the 1st of January 1848, William Henry Harton and Hugh Hamilton Lindsay, of 15, South Street, Finsbury, caused the following notice to be served upon the plaintiffs:—“Gentlemen,—We hereby, as the legally constituted attorneys of Messrs. Saunders, May, Fordyce & Co. of Calcutta, merchants, the agents for as well as part owners of the ships or vessels Punjaub and Nankin, give you notice to retain in your hands for their use all sums of money which you may have collected or received, or which you may hereafter collect or receive, on account of freight earned by those ships or vessels, or either of them, on their last voyages from Calcutta to London; the said Messrs. Saunders, May, Fordyce & Co., as such agents as well as part owners of the said ships or vessels as aforesaid, claiming a lien upon the money in your hands, or which may come to your hands, for the amount of such freight of the said ships or vessels or either of them. Dated the 1st of January 1848. Yours, &c., W. H. Harton, for self and H. H. Lindsay.”

Sir J. R. Reid, John Irvine, George Reid and James Milligan also sent the following letter to the plaintiffs:—

“London, February 23, 1848.

“Messrs. H. & C. Toulmin.—Gentlemen,—Having accepted the under-mentioned drafts of Messrs. Saunders, May, Fordyce & Co. of Calcutta against the freight of the ship Punjaub, and having received from you an engagement to account to us for the said freight, we hereby give you notice not to part with the amount except on payment of the said acceptances, and that we shall require it to be so applied. We are, gentlemen, your most obedient servants,

Messrs. Robert & John Henderson, of
3 E

Mining Lane, alleged that in June 1848 they were holders of two of the bills of exchange mentioned in the letter of the 23rd of February 1848 as being numbered 6,932 for 452*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.* and 6,934 for 519*l.* 3*s.*, amounting together to 971*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.*; and they commenced an action of debt against Sir J. R. Reid, John Irvine, George Reid and James Milligan, in the Lord Mayor's Court in the city of London, upon which an attachment was issued against the 1,814*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* in the hands of the plaintiffs for the recovery of the 971*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.*; and on the 2nd of June 1848 notice of the attachment was served on the plaintiffs.

"Messrs. H. & C. Toulmin.—Take notice, that by virtue of an action entered in the Lord Mayor's Court, London, against Sir John Rae Reid, Bart., John Irvine, George Reid and James Milligan, trading under the firm of Reid, Irvine & Co., defendants, at the suit of Robert Henderson and John Henderson, plaintiffs, on a plea of debt upon demand of 2,000*l.*, I do attach all such monies, goods and effects as you now have or which hereafter shall come into your hands or custody of the said defendants', to answer the said plaintiffs on the plea aforesaid, and that you are not to part with such monies, goods or effects without licence of the said Court."

The plaintiffs entered an appearance to the attachment, but though the action was still pending no further proceedings had been taken.

Applications for payment of the freight were afterwards made on behalf of Messrs. Harton & Lindsay, as the agents of Messrs. May & Pickford, the surviving partners of the firm of Saunders, May, Fordyce & Co., and also on behalf of George Palmer the younger.

On the 13th of May 1848, George May, and on the 9th of July 1849, C. H. Pickford respectively became insolvent, and took the benefit of the 11 Vict. c. 21, intitled, 'An Act to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to Insolvent Debtors in India;' and their joint and separate estate and effects became vested in John Cochrane, who resides at Calcutta, as the official assignee; and on the 20th of October 1849 application was made on behalf of J. Cochrane for payment of one-third of the freight claimed by them, and a similar application was also made on behalf of G. Palmer, jun.; and these were followed by actions at the suit of J. Cochrane and J. Palmer the younger against the plaintiffs, to recover the 1,814*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.*, upon which this bill was filed, charging that they ought to set forth what rights and interests they respectively claimed in the 1,814*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* and every part thereof; and on the 11th of January 1850, upon a motion by the plaintiffs, an order was made, under which the 1,814*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* was paid into court and invested.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Piggott, for the plaintiffs, contended that the facts stated in the bill entitled the plaintiffs to the decree asked for—

Crawshaw v. Thornton, 2 Myl. & Cr. 1; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 179.

Jew v. Wood, Cr. & Ph. 185, 190; s. c. 3 Beav. 579; 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 261.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—Does any party ask that the bill may be dismissed?

Mr. Roupell.—No.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. W. S. Ferrars, for Messrs. Reid, Irvine & Co., contended that the plaintiffs had parted with one-third of the freight, and as the plaintiffs had filed this bill the decree ought to do justice, and they could not escape bringing in the entire freight. Messrs. Reid, Irvine & Co. accepted the bills, believing that Messrs. Saunders, May, Fordyce & Co. were the sole owners of the ship and freight, and the plaintiffs gave Messrs. Reid, Irvine & Co. their personal undertaking to pay the freight to them. It was, therefore, improper to make a decree except upon terms which would enable the Court to deal fully with the entire freight. Messrs. Reid, Irvine & Co. did not desire to receive the money, but that it should be applied to discharge the bills of exchange which have been drawn. It was laid down that, if at the hearing the question between the defendants was ripe for decision, this Court would make a decree, and if such was not the case it would direct an action, an issue or a reference to the Master to bring the matter to a determination—Mitford's Pleadings, 142, 4th ed., Duke of Bolton v. Williams (1), Angell v. Hadden (2). The answers of the co-defendants might be read against each other—Bowyer v. Pritchard (3), and Reid, Irvine & Co. could claim the benefit of any question which arose upon the answers of the opposite parties. It was, however, clear that the plaintiffs had no right to file this bill, and if any decree was made it must be upon equitable terms—Crawshaw v. Thornton (4), Mitchell v. Hayne (5). The case made on the bill was against the plaintiffs. The bill of exchange was accepted against all the freight, and Reid, Irvine & Co. had a claim against it all, and not against two-thirds only. Being consignees they had taken an undertaking from the plaintiffs which was authorized by both the Messrs. Palmer—The East and West India Dock Company v. Littledale (6), Horton v. the Earl of Devon (7), In re Gledstanes (8), Burn v. Carvalho (9). It might, therefore, be considered settled that the undertaking given was not revocable, even if it was wished, since notice of the appropriation was given. The plaintiffs also might be sued at law, and could not be discharged from the liability they had incurred. The case of Mitchell v. Hayne arose upon motion, and there it appeared that the amount proposed to be paid was less than the entire sum demanded. By what right did the plaintiffs part with the third of the fund when they accepted the duty of collecting, and knew that the parties trusting them expected to receive the whole? It was, therefore, clear from the bill and answers that the defendants' claim extended beyond this amount. The position of Reid, Irvine & Co. was not altered by the bankruptcy—Ex parte Waring (10), Laycock v. Johnson (11). They only claimed the fund on account of the holders of the bills, and they had always insisted on its being so applied. Messrs. Reid & Co. therefore asked for a reference to the Master, to inquire into the circumstances and to take an account of the freight, and by whom received, and how discharges had been obtained for it, who was entitled to it, and in what shares and proportions.

Mr. Walpole and Mr. Selwyn, for Messrs. Henderson, insisted that the whole amount of the freight was applicable to the payment of the bills of exchange.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Busk, for George Palmer the younger and John Cochrane, raised no question upon the one-third of the freight paid to George Palmer the elder. This suit was properly an interpleader suit: were it not it would be multifarious. It was proper that the right to the fund should be tried in an action at law by Reid, Irvine & Co. against the plaintiffs.

Mr. Busk tendered some evidence to prove that the defendants had notice at whose expense the ship Punjab was built, and also of certain accounts.

Mr. R. Palmer objected to its being read—The Thames and Medway Canal Company v. Nash (12), The Duke of Bolton v. Williams (13).

Mr. Roupell.—The practice is novel, but on behalf of the plaintiffs I refuse to notice it.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I am not disposed to introduce anything at variance with the practice. As the plaintiffs do not object, the evidence may be entered against them, but I cannot admit it against the co-defendants.

Mr. Roupell, in reply, referred to Stevenson v. Anderson (14), Hyde v. Warren (15) and Jones v. Gilham (16), and argued that this was strictly an interpleader suit. The money had been brought into court in the presence of the defendants: they could not agree who was entitled to it, and they were brought here to settle their differences.

Reid, Irvine & Co. insisted that the defendants had bound themselves to account to them, but at the same time they disclaimed any personal interest. The objection that too little was to be paid into court should have been taken when application was made to pay it in. It was impossible for the plaintiffs to bring G. Palmer the younger here if an account was asked against him. This suit was not analogous to one between trustee and cestui que trust; the plaintiffs, however, were not trustees, but mere depositaries. The defendants could not therefore ask to convert this into a bill for relief; and according to the practice in cases of interpleader, the plaintiffs were entitled to their costs.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I am of opinion that the defendants may submit at the hearing that the suit is not proper, and that they are not precluded by not taking the objection by demurrer, or on the motion to pay the money into court. In Hyde v. Warren, Lord Eldon said, it was not competent for parties to demur to a bill of interpleader, but it was not right to say that it was not proper for them to interplead. If no objection could be taken at the hearing, the plaintiff might make a garbled statement sufficient to entitle him to a decree of interpleader; it was not until the hearing that evidence could be brought forward; the defendant then might have the means of proving his case, and supposing the plaintiff suppressed a document, that could only be brought forward by a cross bill; but if the argument of the plaintiffs was correct, the defendant would be precluded from bringing his case forward. The suit would have been proper had it related to the 1,814*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* only; but if the plaintiff seeks to protect himself against the 907*l.* 0*s.* 10*d.* he has paid over, I am inclined to think it is not proper. Upon this I shall take time to consider; should I make a decree it will be in the ordinary form, but if I do not, then I shall have to consider whether I can make any decree against the plaintiffs, or whether I can use the pressure of the Court and say, if you do not consent to a decree for the whole I shall dismiss the bill with costs.

Dec. 2.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—

This suit was instituted by Messrs. Toulmin, the brokers and agents of Reid, Irvine & Co., the consignees of a ship called the Punjab. The bill prays that the defendants may interplead as to their rights to a sum of 1,814*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* received by the plaintiffs for freight. By an order made in this cause on the 11th of January 1850, this sum has been paid into court and invested. Several of the defendants contend that it is not a proper case for interpleader, but none of them on that or any other ground ask that the bill may be dismissed; on the contrary, they all appear to consider that the dispute can best be settled by the matter being put in such a course of inquiry as will enable the Court to determine the questions between the parties; but they insist upon this objection to the bill to induce the Court to make, instead of the usual interpleading decree, one keeping the plaintiffs before the Court and making them liable to a general account. The defendants call upon me to make such a decree as will effect complete justice between the parties, and not merely to enable me hereafter to determine the right to this 1,814*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.*, but also to determine the rights and settle the disputed questions that may arise, or have arisen, between all the parties.

The ship Punjab sailed in the beginning of March 1847 from Calcutta to England; one-third belonged to George Palmer the elder, and one-third to George Palmer the younger, but was mortgaged by him to Messrs. Saunders, May & Co. at Calcutta, to whom the remaining one-third of the ship belonged. The ship and cargo were consigned to Reid, Irvine & Co., the agents of the Calcutta house. Messrs. Toulmin were duly appointed the ship's brokers by the Messrs. Palmer and by Reid, Irvine & Co. as the agents of the Calcutta house. The plaintiffs duly received the freight, amounting, as they alleged, after making such deductions as they were entitled to make, to the sum of 2,721*l.* 2*s.* 7½*d.*; they have paid one-third, amounting to 907*l.* 0*s.* 10*d.*, to George Palmer the elder, and hold in their hands the remaining sum of 1,814*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* to be paid to the persons entitled; but as conflicting claims have arisen, and actions have been brought against them in respect of it, they have filed this bill, paid the money into court, and now ask for the usual interpleading decree. In the first place, Reid, Irvine & Co. claim to be entitled to the entire freight, by virtue of an express authority given on the 21st of July 1847, by the Messrs. Palmer to the plaintiffs, directing them to pay the produce of the freight to Reid, Irvine & Co., which authority was followed by an undertaking in writing of the 26th of July 1847, entered into by the plaintiffs, to pay the freight to Reid, Irvine & Co. Relying on this, Reid, Irvine & Co. contend that the payment of the one-third of the freight to G. Palmer the elder is wholly unauthorized and incorrect; that the plaintiffs are liable to pay the whole to them, and that the letters of the 21st and 26th of July constituted, at law, a legal appropriation of the money arising from the freight, or that if it had not this effect, that it constituted at least a valid assignment thereof in equity. And these defendants, not asking me to dismiss the bill, although contending that in this state of circumstances this is not a proper case for interpleader, ask for a decree compelling the plaintiffs to account generally for the one-third, as well as for the two-thirds of the freight: or if the Court cannot directly do this, to arrive at it by dismissing the bill with costs, unless the plaintiffs will, as a consideration for obtaining a decree, consent voluntarily so to account. Another class of claimants on this fund are the Messrs. Henderson, who are bond fide holders for value of bills drawn by the Calcutta house against this freight, and which, after having been accepted by Reid, Irvine & Co., have not been paid, that house having stopped payment in the month of September following this transaction, and having since continued to carry on business under a deed of inspection. The Messrs. Henderson have obtained an attachment in the Lord Mayor's Court on the fund, in an action against Reid, Irvine & Co., and urged similar arguments with them. And between Messrs. Henderson and Reid, Irvine & Co. there is not really any contest, as Reid, Irvine & Co. do not dispute, if they succeed, that the fund must be distributed amongst the holders of the bills drawn specifically against this freight and accepted, but not paid by them.

The defendants, Messrs. Henderson,

however, expressly contend that the plaintiffs ought not merely to account for the one-third of the freight paid to George Palmer the elder, but ought also to account for the gross amount of freight received by them, and ought not to be allowed the deductions which they have made thereout, but that the propriety thereof ought to be adjudicated upon under the decree to be made in this cause. The defendant Cochrane is the official assignee of the Calcutta house, Saunders, May & Co. They stopped payment, and after carrying on business for some time under a deed of trust, have ceased altogether to carry on business, and the partners composing that firm have become insolvent. Mr. Cochrane claims only the two-thirds of the freight; he does not contend that the plaintiffs ought to account for more than the 1,814*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* paid into court, nor does he resist the decree of interpleader, but he contends, that the questions at issue between the defendants can best be determined by an action at law, and that complete justice could be done in an action in which Cochrane was plaintiff, against the Messrs. Toulmin as defendants at law, provided that such action were defended by the firm of Reid, Irvine & Co.

In my opinion, it is not competent for the Court, in cases of this description, to make any hostile decree against the plaintiffs, compelling them to account in respect of the various matters stated in the bill. No point is better established than that a defendant cannot have active relief against a plaintiff unless he himself file a bill for that purpose. It is true that there are many cases in which the mere failure of the plaintiff operates to give relief to the defendant, as in the case of a bill to redeem; so, also, it is true there are many cases, to several of which I was referred, where the plaintiff, an accounting party, who files a bill for taking the account, and for the administration of the fund, is treated by the Court as having thereby undertaken to account as the Court might direct; yet these cases do not weaken and will not affect or form any exception to the rule I have already stated, nor will they, in my opinion, enable the Court, in an interpleading suit, to make a decree against the plaintiff, in the same manner in which it might have done if one of the defendants had instituted a suit for the purpose sought, and made the plaintiffs defendants thereto. I cannot, therefore, make the decree required by Reid, Irvine & Co. and the Messrs. Henderson, unless it is by consent, and, adversely, I am compelled either to dismiss the bill with or without costs, or to make such a decree as may enable the questions arising between the interpleading defendants to be most speedily and satisfactorily disposed of.

With respect to the dismissal of the bill, it is not wished by any one, but it is desired, that the Court should use its power of dismissing it, and of leaving the plaintiffs open to the litigation with which they have been threatened, for the purpose of compelling them to consent to such a decree, as will enable the Court not merely to settle the question in dispute as between the co-defendants, but to determine those also which exist between the plaintiffs and the defendants. In answer to this, it was argued by the plaintiffs that it was too late to contend at the hearing that this was not an interpleader suit, and that the objection must be taken by demurrer, or in opposition to the motion to pay the money into court, or not at all. I disposed of that objection at the time. The objection, however, is now only taken conditionally, and professedly with a view to compel the plaintiffs to consent to the decree, which, unless by their consent, I have stated my inability to make. I am, however, of opinion that I cannot properly use the power of the Court for this purpose, and that not being able directly to impose such a decree on the plaintiffs, I am not at liberty to extort their consent to it by threatening to do that which, in substance, is not desired by any party in the cause.

In this state of circumstances, I am of opinion that I must make the usual interpleader decree. So far as the plaintiffs are concerned, this will do no more than protect them from legal proceedings in respect of the particular sum paid by them into court, but they will remain liable to all such proceedings, if any, as the defendants may think fit to institute against them, either at law or in equity, in respect of other matters ; in other words, the defendants, by interpleading as to this 1,814*l.*

1*s.* 9*d.*, will not be thereby held to admit that the plaintiffs are entitled to all or any of the deductions they have claimed and retained out of the gross amount of freight received by them, and they will not thereby escape the necessity of rendering an account of their receipts and payments in respect of such freight, if called upon so to do by competent authority. All that they obtain by this decree is, that they will have discharged themselves of this sum of 1,814*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* ; and in respect of that sum of money the Court will not permit any future suit or action to be instituted against the plaintiffs by the defendants to this record, but beyond that, the decree of interpleader will not afford them any protection.

As regards the question between the co-defendants, I have arrived at the conclusion that the course suggested of the action by Mr. Cochrane against the plaintiffs, to be defended by Reid, Irvine & Co., would not finally determine the questions at issue between them and the defendants Reid, Irvine & Co. and Messrs. Henderson ; both the latter classes of defendants contend that the letters of the 21st and 27th of July 1847 constituted a legal appropriation of the freight in the hands of the plaintiffs, and this question might, no doubt, be tried in the action ; but if they fail in that, they contend that these letters constitute a good assignment in equity of the money received for the freight. There are many cases in the books of this double remedy, and in several, as in Burn v. Carvalho, the circumstance that no remedy exists at law has been held to give a right to relief in equity.

I cannot, in the present stage of the case, form any surmise as to whether this is or is not a case of that description, but the possibility of its being so shews that an action at law could not finally conclude the question between the co-defendants. I must, therefore, refer it to the Master, to ascertain whether the defendants, or any and which of them, are or is entitled to this sum of 1,814*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* or to any and what part thereof, in any and what proportions ; with liberty to state any circumstances specially.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } ARCHIBALD v. HART-
Jan. 24. } LEY.

Will—Dividends—Legacy—Securities—Balance at a Banker's.

A testatrix directed her trustees to pay the dividends arising from her personal estate invested at her decease in or upon any stocks, funds, or securities whatsoever, yielding interest, to certain persons mentioned in her will. The testatrix, at her death, left a balance in the hands of her banker, who was in the habit of allowing his customers interest upon the amount standing to their credit on a particular day in the year:—Held, that this balance did not come within the terms used by the testatrix, but was undisposed of by the will.

This was a special case, agreed upon between the parties, pursuant to the statute 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35, for diminishing the delay and expenses of proceedings in the Court of Chancery. It was stated that Jane Strickland, a widow, by her will, dated the 8th of December 1846, appointed T. Dixon and the defendant Philip Hartley, trustees and executors of her will, and devised all her real estate unto and to the use of the said trustees and their heirs, upon trust for the plaintiff Bridget Archibald, during her life, and after her decease in trust for her children, who being a son should attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter should attain that age or marry, as tenants in common, with a power to the trustees to apply the income towards the maintenance of such children during minority; and the said will then continued as follows:—

“I empower my said trustees to permit my personal estate invested at my decease in or upon any stocks, funds, or securities whatsoever yielding interest, to continue in the same state of investment so long as they shall think fit, with power from time to time to vary and transpose such investments for any other stocks, funds, or securities, or any real securities in England, upon trust to pay or permit my said daughter to receive the interest or dividends arising therefrom for and during her life, and subject thereto, upon trusts corresponding as nearly as may be with the limitations herein contained of my real estate.”

That the said will contained no other disposition of any personal estate than such as was thereinbefore set forth; that the testatrix died on the 19th of April 1848, leaving the plaintiff Bridget Archibald her only child and sole next-of-kin, according to the Statute of Distributions; that the testatrix was, at the time of her death, entitled to various sums of personal estate, including the sum of 1,099l. 17s. due from Messrs. Petty & Postlethwaite, bankers, at Ulverstone; that the testatrix had for several years a banking account with these bankers, and that it was the custom of the said bankers on the 31st of December in every year to allow to their customers interest in respect of their deposits left in the hands of the said bankers during the past year, and that on that day the bankers credited the testatrix with a sum in respect of interest at the rate of 2l. 10s. per cent.; that the testatrix had stock in the funds and she had 1,000l. at her bankers; that the plaintiffs Bridget Archibald and her husband claimed that the said balance of money was undisposed of by the said will, and that the plaintiffs, in right of the said Bridget Archibald, as the sole next-of-kin of the testatrix, were entitled thereto.

For the defendant, the infant child of Bridget Archibald, it was contended that the balance of monies at the bankers was included under the bequest of “any stock,” &c. The prayer was, that the Court would put a construction on the words “my personal estate invested at my decease in or upon any stocks, funds, or securities whatsoever yielding interest,” contained in the said will, and that it would determine whether the said balance of monies at the testatrix's bankers passed under such bequest, and whether the same was undisposed of by the said will, and belonged to the plaintiffs in right of the said plaintiff Bridget Archibald, as the sole next-of-kin of the testatrix, and to make such order as to the Court should seem just.

Mr. Shapter, for the infant defendant; and

Mr. Chapman, for the trustees.

Vaisey v. Reynolds, 5 Russ. 12.

Foley v. Hill, 1 Ph. 399.

Pott v. Clegg, 16 Mee. & W. 321.

Devaynes v. Noble, 1 Mer. 529.

Carr v. Carr, 1 Mer. 541, n.

Parker v. Marchant, 1 Ph. 356.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—This will contains very little in any other part to assist in the construction of the clause in question. If I were to indulge in conjecture, I should imagine that the testatrix meant to give all her personal estate, but that is not the effect of the language she has used. She has given no estate to the trustees; she has appointed two persons trustees and executors of her will, and she directs payment of all debts and expenses, and then she devises her real estate in a particular manner. As to the personal estate, the only clause is that which is set forth in the case. Now, that the balance at the bankers is a debt is not in controversy, but it is a debt in this sense, that it is an engagement that the cheques of the customer will be honoured from time to time; and in this particular case, as to country bankers, an amount of interest is allowed on money which may have remained for a given time. According to the facts stated it appears that the bankers were in the habit, on the last day of each year, to allow interest on deposits left in their hands during the past year, and they credited her with a certain amount every year. Now, it does not appear that the testatrix was not entitled to draw out the money from time to time as she pleased. There was no contract to leave any sums for any given time, and according to the statement in the case, as to the amount of balance in the hands of these bankers, it was very fluctuating. How, then, can this be called personal estate invested in or upon any stocks, funds, or securities yielding interest? Is it stock? Certainly not. I should apprehend any balance at a banker's is not the same as stock or funds, because "stock" or "funds" have acquired a meaning as government securities, or funds of that nature. Then, the only definition under which it could come would be securities yielding interest. Now, in one sense, it is not a security, because a banker gives no security. The money stands only upon the credit of the bankers or upon their solvency. Therefore, in fact, there is no security taken. It is true that the money yields interest, but that does not make it a security. It is personal estate due from the bankers, yielding interest, but not personal estate invested on any security. The term "investment" implies investment for a given term, but that cannot be applied to a balance in the bankers' hands, using it in a technical or popular sense. You cannot say an investment of a balance at the bankers, although the bankers allowed interest upon such sums as remained in their hands. Therefore, my opinion is, that the balance at the bankers will not come within the terms used by the testatrix; and as there is no residuary bequest, it will belong to the next-of-kin.

Supplemental Answer—Replication.

A supplemental answer may by consent be filed after replication, without withdrawing the replication already filed.

This was a motion that J. R. Walker, one of the defendants in the cause, might be at liberty to file a supplemental answer in respect of an erroneous statement in the original answer as to the execution of a certain mortgage deed mentioned in the bill; and that the replication already filed in the cause might be ordered to be taken as replication to the supplemental answer; or, if necessary, that the present replication might be withdrawn, and new replication filed. No evidence had been yet taken, but a commission to take evidence was about to be issued immediately.

Mr. Boys, for the motion, cited Jackson v. Parish (1).

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. E. R. Turner, for the plaintiff, did not oppose the motion.

TURNER, V.C. said he thought it would have been more regular to withdraw the present, and file a new replication; but he would make the order as asked by the notice of motion, on the authority of the cited case.

Order according to that in Jackson v. Parish.

BLENKINSOPP v. BLENKINSOPP.

Deed to defeat Process of Ecclesiastical Court—Privy Council—Suit to enforce Proceedings before the Privy Council—Alimony—Costs.

A deed executed by a husband, pending proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court, for the purpose of preventing the suit, if successful, from affecting his property, declared void, and all arrears of alimony directed to be paid; but as to future payments, quære.

Where a Court of Appeal agrees with the main part of the relief granted in the court below, it will not depart from its adjudication of the costs, excepting in a very strong and clear case.

The facts of this case, which are very fully reported, together with the arguments, 19 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 425, may, in effect, be very briefly stated thus:—Mrs. Blenkinsopp, in March 1841, instituted a suit against her husband, Mr. G. T. L. Blenkinsopp, for a divorce, by reason of cruelty and adultery. Pending this suit, Mr. Blenkinsopp conveyed his real and personal estate to trustees, upon trust, out of the income to pay off certain mortgages affecting the real estate and certain bond creditors specified in a schedule to the deed; then to pay an annuity to himself, an annuity to his sons, and then an annuity of 100*l.* a year to his wife, if she abandoned the proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court against him, and did not prosecute any other; and then to invest the residue and accumulate the same and the resulting income. Mr. Blenkinsopp went to Scotland, and resided in the precincts of Holyrood Palace. Mrs. Blenkinsopp prosecuted her suit and obtained a decree, and the same was affirmed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and 300*l.* a year alimony was awarded her. Writs of sequestration were issued against him for the alimony and arrears, and the costs of suit; but by reason of the conveyance the sequestrators were unable to recover the money. Mrs. Blenkinsopp filed her bill to set aside the deed as fraudulent, excepting as to bond fide creditors, and the same was decreed, together with a declaration that the trustees of the deed were trustees for her as to the arrears and costs, and for all monies to become due to her for alimony. From the whole of this decree Mr. Blenkinsopp appealed.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Glasse, and Mr. J. V. Prior, for Mrs. Blenkinsopp; and

Mr. Willcock, Mr. Robson, and Mr. W. R. Ellis, for other parties, having stated the case, the Court called on

Mr. Dickinson, who appeared for the appellant, Mr. Blenkinsopp.

The cases cited in support of the view taken on behalf of the defendant in the court below, the appellant here, are also set forth in the report in the Law Journal Reports before referred to.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—We are of opinion that the fraud of the deed against the plaintiff is clearly established, and that she was entitled to be relieved against it. It appears to have been executed pending a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court against the defendant who executed it, which suit, according to the law as it then stood, might, if successful, have ended in a kind of execution against his property. We consider it to be established by the evidence that the deed was executed with a fraudulent intention of preventing the suit, if successful, from affecting his property. It can make no difference at all that, by subsequent improvement or alteration in the law, a better or more effectual mode of affecting the property by way of execution in such suit has been created, or that the lady has resorted to the process which she has resorted to rather than to the mode of execution which was alone in force when the deed was executed. We are of opinion that that is of no manner of importance. She had issued execution in the suit before she filed this bill, and therefore it is not necessary to consider or give any opinion upon the question, whether, to the success of this kind of suit it was necessary that any execution at all should issue before the filing of the bill. It has been suggested that the lady, the plaintiff, might have obtained relief in another court or in another mode: that, also, we think immaterial, according to the established law of the country. Wherever else, if anywhere else, she might have obtained a remedy, she still was entitled to come to a court of equity for the purpose of delivering herself from a deed fraudulently obtained for the purpose of interfering with her just rights. The only doubt that we have,—the only point, rather, on which we are not satisfied,—is, whether the decree does or does not go beyond the proper functions of a decree in such a suit; and upon that point we wish to be satisfied. The decree was right in setting aside the deed, so far as it was set aside, and in giving the costs. It may be considered, for the sake of the argument, that it was questionable whether some less costs than are given might not have been given against the plaintiff; but if the Court agrees with the main relief given, it requires a very strong and clear case indeed to render it right for the Court, at the rehearing of the cause, to depart from the adjudication of the former Court as to the costs. No such clear or strong ground has been shewn to us here; and therefore we think that the only question to be considered is, whether, as I have already stated, the decree has or has not gone beyond the proper limits of a decree in such a suit.

Mr. Bethell addressed a few observations to the Court on the question of costs, and LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said :—We propose to dismiss the petition of appeal, with costs, without prejudice to the question what ought to be done in the event of the payment to the plaintiff of all the arrears of her alimony up to the date of the Master's general report, and with such other costs as the plaintiff is now entitled to, and with liberty in that event, as well as otherwise, to apply from time to time. We reserve to ourselves the faculty of altering the decree in any respect in which it may appear to us to go beyond the strictly proper functions of the Court, if there be such limits. That will relieve the case, I think, from a position of some little difficulty; but still a more extended and deep consideration of the subject may possibly relieve it from all difficulty. The difficulty may be only apparent.

Devise—Vesting of Shares—"Having" or "leaving" Issue.

A testator devised an estate to his daughter for life, and after her decease to all and every the children of the body of his daughter lawfully begotten (in case she should leave more than one child), their heirs and assigns for ever, as tenants in common; but in case his daughter should have only one child, then he devised the estate to such one child in fee; but in case his daughter should die without leaving any issue of her body, then he devised the estate to all such children of his body as he should leave or have living at the decease of his daughter, in fee. The testator's daughter had two children, both of whom died during her life :—Held, that the two children of the testator's daughter took absolute and devisable estates in remainder under the will, and their devisees were consequently entitled.

This was a petition presented under the following circumstances.—

A piece of land had been taken by the Bucks Railway Company, but a question having been raised as to the title, under the construction of the will of Thomas Prentice, the last owner by purchase of the property, the railway company paid the amount of the purchase-money into court, under the 76th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and the present petition asked for payment of the money out of court to certain persons claiming to be entitled under the will. The petitioners were the Rev. J. Hooper and Frances his wife, and the petition stated that Thomas Prentice, by his will, dated the 26th of September 1775, gave and devised unto his daughter Henrietta Prentice all his copyhold messuage, tenement, or farm-house in the parish of Little Horwood, in the following terms :—"To hold the same unto and to the use of my said daughter Henrietta Prentice and her assigns, for and during the term of her natural life; and from and immediately after her decease I give and devise the said messuage, tenement, or farmhouse, closea, pieces or parcels of arable, meadow and pasture ground, with their and every of their rights, members and appurtenances, unto and to the use of all and every the children of the body of my daughter Henrietta Prentice lawfully begotten (in case she shall leave more than one child), their heirs and assigns for ever, as tenants in common and not as joint tenants. But in case my said daughter Henrietta Prentice shall have only one child of her body lawfully begotten, then I give and devise the said messuage, tenement or farmhouse, closes, pieces or parcels of arable, meadow, and pasture ground, with their and every of their appurtenances, unto and to the use of such one child, his or her heirs and assigns for ever. But in case my said daughter Henrietta Prentice shall happen to die without leaving any issue of her body lawfully begotten, then I give and devise the said messuage, tenement or farmhouse, closes, pieces or parcels of arable, meadow, and pasture-ground with their and every of their appurtenances unto and to the use of all and every such child or children of my body lawfully begotten as I shall leave or have living at the time of the decease of my said daughter Henrietta Prentice, and to their heirs and assigns for ever as tenants in common;" and the will contained specific devises, in similar terms, of other parts of the said testator's copyhold estates and his freehold estates, to his son Thomas Eagles Prentice and his daughter Mary Ann Prentice, but there was no residuary or general devise of his estates contained in the testator's will.

The testator died in November 1779, leaving three children: first, Thomas Eagles Prentice, his only son, who was his customary heir, and who died in December 1836, having made his will and thereby devised all his real estates whatsoever, in reversion, remainder, or expectancy, to his wife Ann Prentice; second, Mary Ann Prentice who died on the 4th of January 1847, without having been married, and, third, Henrietta Prentice.

The petition also stated that in September 1796 the said Henrietta Prentice, the daughter of the testator, married John Tookey, who died in 1818, leaving his widow surviving, and there was issue of the marriage two children, John Tookey and Henrietta Tookey; that the said J. Tookey, the son, married the petitioner Frances Hooper, and there was issue of that marriage one child, Joseph Tookey, who was still living and under twenty-one years of age; that J. Tookey, the son, by his will dated in February 1828, gave and devised all his copyhold estates whatsoever and wheresoever to hold the same unto the petitioner Frances Hooper, her heirs and assigns for ever; that the petitioner Frances Hooper intermarried with the petitioner J. Hooper; that Henrietta Tookey, the daughter, died in the lifetime of her mother, having devised her estates to her mother; that the said Henrietta Tookey the widow died in March 1847, having by her will devised all her copyhold estates to the petitioner J. Hooper and W. B. Eagles upon certain trusts therein mentioned.

The question raised upon the petition was, whether J. Tookey the son, and Henrietta Tookey the daughter of Henrietta Prentice, afterwards Tookey, took absolute and devisable estates in remainder in this property, under the will of Thomas Prentice, they having died in the lifetime of their mother Henrietta Tookey. The petitioners submitted that this was the true construction of the will, and that the petitioner J. Hooper was entitled to one moiety of the property in right of his wife, the said Frances Hooper, the devisee of J. Tookey the son, and that the petitioner, J. Hooper, and W. B. Eagles were entitled to the other moiety as trustees under the will of Henrietta Tookey, the widow, who was the devisee of her daughter Henrietta Tookey.

On the other hand, it was contended that J. Tookey the son and Henrietta Tookey the daughter did not take absolute and devisable estates in remainder, and that the property descended to the customary heir of the testator, Thomas Prentice, there having been no child of his living at the death of Henrietta Tookey his daughter.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. — This case came before me upon a petition, and the order to be made must depend upon the construction of the will of Thomas Prentice, who devised certain copyhold property for the benefit of his daughter Henrietta Prentice and her children; and the question is, whether two children which she had took vested interests in the property. The words of the devise are these.—[His Honour here read the clause in the will already set forth in the statement of the case.]—Besides the devise in favour of Henrietta Prentice, the will contains two devises of other portions of the real estate, one in favour of another of the testator's daughters, Mary Ann Prentice, and the other in favour of his son Thomas Eagles Prentice; therefore, in all there are three devises—to Henrietta, to Mary Ann, and to Thomas Eagles Prentice, the three children of the testator, which devises are precisely in the same language, with one single exception of one word in one of the devises. Now that variation, although not conclusive, is not without its significance.

I will first consider the devise to Henrietta. It begins by a devise which, beyond all doubt, gave her an estate for life; and from and after her decease, then the devise is unto and to the use of all and every the children of her body in fee. Now, if it had stopped there, there would have been no doubt, and every child would have taken a vested interest in equal shares of the property; but these words are added in a parenthesis "in case she shall leave more than one child." Then comes a direction that, in case she shall have only one child then the whole shall go to that one child, his or her heirs and assigns for ever. Passing on to the limitation over, which follows that devise, I have no doubt that in the limitation over the testator used the words "in case my said daughter Henrietta shall happen to die without leaving any issue of her body lawfully begotten," meaning at her death, because the limitation in that event is, "to all and every such child or children of my body lawfully begotten as I shall leave or have living at the time of the decease of my said daughter Henrietta Prentice"; that is, in case she shall die without leaving any issue, not children only, living at the time of her death; and not that in the event of his leaving a grandchild only it should not take effect. Now what happened? Why Henrietta Prentice had two children, which both pre-deceased her; both were married, and one grandchild has survived her. It appears to me that the testator in that part of the devise has used the word "leave" in the sense of "have," and the meaning of the word "leave" has been applied to it in other cases, and I have not the least doubt that that was the meaning of the testator here, and he had regard to the natural course of events that the children might survive the parent, but not a condition that they should do so. At all events, it gives a reasonable construction to the will; for if that were not the construction, the testator would have died intestate from and after the death of Henrietta Prentice. I do not mean to say that is a conclusive reason for a forced construction of the words, but it is one which helps the construction, and has weight in confirming the view I take of the devise itself.

Then, as to the two other devises to two other children. In the devise to the son Thomas Eagles Prentice, instead of saying "unto and to the use of all the children which he shall leave," as are the words of the other devises, he uses the word "have,"—in other respects the two subsequent devises are precisely in the same words. Now, that change in the word, though it might have been inadvertent, may be used to shew the meaning of the testator, as pointing out that the condition was not as to there being children living at the death, but as to her having more than one child. I think, therefore, that the two children of Henrietta Prentice took vested interests as tenants in common in fee. One of them, it appears, made a will devising his residuary share; and the order must be in accordance with the devise. I have only to declare who are the persons entitled. The costs must be paid by the railway company.

GUNDRY v. FINNIGER.

Will—Construction—Legacy to Next-of-Kin ex parte Maternâ.

A testatrix bequeathed a fund to trustees in trust for A. B. for life, with remainder to her children at twenty-one; but in case she died without issue, then to pay or assign and transfer the fund to C. D, if then living, but if then dead, then unto his next-of-kin in a legal course of distribution ex parte maternâ. C. D. died in the lifetime of A. B. A. B. died without issue. At the death of C. D, A. B. was his sole next-of-kin ex parte paternâ, and also his sole next-of-kin ex parte maternâ; at the death of A. B, the then next-of-kin ex parte maternâ of C. D. claimed the fund:—Held, affirming the decision of the Court below, that the next-of-kin were to be ascertained at the death of C. D, and not at that of A. B, and that A. B, as next-of-kin ex parte maternâ, was not excluded because she also filled the character of next-of-kin ex parte paternâ; and, therefore, her representatives were entitled to the fund.

"Next-of-kin" means next-of-kin at the death of the party whose next-of-kin are spoken of.

The testatrix in this cause, by her will, dated in the year 1808, gave the residue of her stock in the Consolidated Bank Annuities to trustees, for the benefit of her grandniece, Mary Lucy Ponting, with a bequest over to Nicholas T. S. Ponting, in case Mary Lucy Ponting died before she should attain the age of twenty-six or should marry. In June 1810 the testatrix made a codicil to her will, whereby, after reciting that Mary Lucy Ponting had since married John Tuckey, upon which event no separate provision had been made for her or her issue, she revoked the bequest of her stock, then consisting of 4,316*l.* 3*l.* per cent. consols, and gave the same to trustees in trust for her grandniece, Mary Lucy Tuckey, for life, with remainder in trust for her children who should attain the age of twenty-one; but in case she should die without issue, or they should all die before their shares became payable, then upon trust, after the decease of the said Mary Lucy Tuckey, to pay or assign and transfer the said stock unto her the testatrix's grand-nephew Nicholas T. S. Ponting, if he should be then living; but if he should be then dead, then unto the next-of-kin of her said grand-nephew, in a legal course of distribution, ex parte maternâ. The testatrix died in 1836, and Nicholas T. S. Ponting died in the same year, leaving his sister Mary Lucy Tuckey, and some first cousins once removed, ex parte maternâ, of the name of Ashe, surviving. Mary Lucy Tuckey died without issue in 1849, at which period the Ashes were the next-of-kin of Nicholas T. S. Ponting. Upon the death of Mary Lucy Tuckey, the Ashes claimed the fund, and the representatives of Mary Lucy Tuckey also claimed it; whereupon the trustees and executors of the will instituted this suit, with a view to take the opinion of the Court whether the persons to take under the will as next-of-kin of Nicholas T. S. Ponting were to be ascertained at the period of his death in 1836, or at the death of the tenant for life, Mary Lucy Tuckey, in 1849, that being the period for the distribution of the fund; and, secondly, whether, supposing the next-of-kin were to be ascertained at the death of Nicholas T. S. Ponting, Mary Lucy Tuckey was, and her representatives in her right were, entitled to take under the description of next-of-kin ex parte maternâ, notwithstanding she was next-of-kin ex parte paternâ, or whether the Ashes were exclusively entitled as coming within the description of next-of-kin ex parte maternâ alone.

At the hearing, before the present Master of the Rolls, he held that Mary Lucy Tuckey became entitled to the fund as next-of-kin ex parte maternâ of Nicholas T. S. Ponting, notwithstanding she was also his next-of-kin ex parte paternâ—20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 635.

(2) 1 Hudson & Brooke's Irish Q.B. Rep. 648. The passage is as follows:—"I apprehend it is a rule in the construction of statutes, that in the first instance the grammatical sense of the words is to be adhered to. If that is contrary to, or inconsistent with any expressed intention, or any declared purpose of the statute; or if it would involve any absurdity, repugnance, or inconsistency in its different provisions, the grammatical sense must then be modified, extended, or abridged so far as to avoid such an inconvenience, but no further."

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—Neither of us entertains any doubt—that is, any judicial doubt—that the Master of the Rolls has come to a right conclusion on the construction of this will. It is very difficult, as has been observed in the course of the argument, if not impossible, to reconcile all the cases on the subject; but the view that I take is, that with all this difference there is a great cardinal rule to be observed in the construction of instruments, as laid down by Mr. Justice Burton in Warburton v. Loveland, with regard to the construction of statutes, namely, to adhere as closely as possible to the literal meaning of the words used. If we depart from this, we launch into a sea of difficulties which it is not easy to fathom. In the course of the argument I have been putting to myself various combinations of circumstances, as to which, if we could ask the testatrix in her grave what she intended, she would probably say that she had not contemplated them, but would, nevertheless, wish the words she had used to be adhered to. It is, however, useless to speculate on these matters. The conclusion at which I arrive is, that the words "next-of-kin" mean next-of-kin at the death of the party whose next-of-kin are spoken of, and there is nothing in the will to make this construction absurd.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I cannot go so far as to say that I entertain no doubt, but I think that the decision of the Master of the Rolls is correct.

Charitable Bequest—"Education and Learning"—Mortmain Act—Colony of New South Wales.

A testator possessed of lands in New South Wales, of leasehold property in Scotland, and of pure personality, devised and bequeathed all to trustees, upon trust, for absolute conversion, and after various bequests gave the residue to trustees to apply the same at their absolute and uncontrolled discretion for the benefit and advancement and propagation of education and learning in every part of the world, so far as circumstances would permit:—Held, that the words "education and learning" were to be read "education in learning," and that there was a good charitable bequest.

Held, also, that the statute 9 Geo. 4. c. 83, which provides, that all laws and statutes of the realm shall be enforced in the administration of justice so far as the same can be applied, means "reasonably applied," and that the statute 9 Geo. 2. c. 36. is inapplicable to lands in New South Wales.

Dr. John Borthwick Gilchrist, by his will, dated the 8th of December 1840, gave, devised and bequeathed all his residuary real and personal estate to certain trustees upon trust for sale, and to invest the residue of the produce after payment of the expense of sale in their names in the parliamentary stocks or public funds, stocks and securities of the colonies or of any foreign state, or on mortgage of land in Scotland or Ireland, or in the colonies, or in the stock of any commercial company, but so that no investment should be made which could not by law be disposed of by will to a charity. The testator then directed the trustees to stand possessed of such stocks and securities and monies upon trust to pay certain annuities; and as to the residue, upon such trusts as he should declare by his codicil. On the same day the testator executed the following codicil:—

"This is a codicil to the last will and testament of me, John Borthwick Gilchrist, which will bears even date with, but was executed previously to this codicil. I hereby direct and appoint that the trustees or trustee for the time being of my said will do and shall stand possessed of and interested in the residue or surplus of the trust monies and securities thereby to them bequeathed, in trust to appropriate the same in such manner as they, my said trustees or trustee, shall in their absolute and uncontrolled discretion think proper and expedient for the benefit and advancement and propagation of education and learning in every part of the world, so far as circumstances will permit."

From the Master's report it appeared that the estate of the testator at the time of his death consisted of pure personalty, and of real estate in New South Wales, and of a leasehold house in Scotland.

At the hearing of the cause, before the present Master of the Rolls, questions were raised whether the bequest was not void for uncertainty, and if not, whether, so far as regarded the proceeds of real estate in New South Wales, the same was not void as being obnoxious to the provisions of the statute 9 Geo. 2. c. 36. (the Mortmain Act). His Honour held, that there was a good and valid charitable bequest, and that the Mortmain Act did not apply. The next-of-kin now appealed.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Rolfe and Mr. Springall Thompson, for the appeal.—The words of the bequest of this testator are sufficiently large to admit of the property being applied to purposes other than charitable, in the sense in which that word is understood by this Court. There is nothing in them to controul the application of the fund to the distribution of works upon scientific and literary subjects among the learned and wealthy members of the community; nothing to prevent the establishment of circulating libraries, or even for the fitting out of ships for voyages of discovery. No words are used which would controul the application of the funds to purposes of religion, or for the education of youth, or for the benefit of the poor. The only difficulty is to fix a limit beyond which the words could not be carried, so as to apply the fund in a way not charitable, as that expression is understood by this Court. It is plain, therefore, that the trust is too vague and too indefinite to be supported—Browne v. Yeall (1), Morice v. the Bishop of Durham (2), James v. Allen (3), Ommanney v. Butcher (4), Williams v. Kershaw (5), Ellis v. Selby (6) and

Kendall v. Granger (7). If for no other reason, this bequest must be void, because there is no class to whom the benefits can be confined. It is not like the case of Nightingale v. Goulburn (8), where the class was of all the inhabitants of Great Britain, and the trust was upheld. Here the whole world are included, and the Court cannot devise a scheme for the execution of the trust. But even supposing the Court should hold that a valid charitable trust were otherwise created, it is obnoxious to the provisions of the statute relating to mortmain (9 Geo. 2. c. 36). That that statute extends to the colonies is abundantly clear from the wording of the statute 9 Geo. 4. c. 83 (9), by the 24th section of which the law of England is constituted the law of the colonies, the 11th section of the same act having conferred on the supreme court the same jurisdiction both at common law and in equity as is exercised by the Lord Chancellor in this country. The case of The Attorney General v. Stewart (10), where the colony of Grenada was held to be exempt from the operation of the Mortmain Act, does not govern this, for there the French law was held and recognized as the law in civil matters, on the ground that that law prevailed at the time the island was acquired by conquest for the crown of England.

[Lord Justice Knight Bruce.—According to the construction contended for, any quantity of land in New South Wales may be given to Eton, Winchester or Westminster, while a single acre cannot be given for the benefit of similar institutions in the colony.]

That objection is met by the provisions of the 9 Geo. 4. c. 83, the latter part of the 24th section of which enables the governor of the colony for the time being by ordinance to modify the law introduced into the colony as he shall deem expedient, and as no such modification has taken place regarding the Mortmain Act, it is clear that that statute is in full operation in New South Wales. The same policy, namely, that land shall not be withdrawn from circulation, as much applies there as here. In the Mortmain Act, land in Scotland is excepted; and had the legislature intended to exclude lands acquired by colonization from the operation of that statute, some expression to the same effect as is found relating to Scotland would have appeared. The absence of any such expression is another argument in favour of the position that the Mortmain Act does apply to this colony.

(9) The material sections of this statute are the 11th and 24th which are as follows:—

Section 11. enacts, "That the said supreme courts respectively shall be courts of equity in New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land, and the dependencies thereof respectively, and shall have power and authority to administer justice, and to do, exercise, and perform, all such acts, matters, and things necessary for the due execution of such equitable jurisdiction, as the Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain can or lawfully may within the realm of England, and all such acts, matters, and things as can or may be done by the said Lord High Chancellor within the realm of England, in the exercise of the common law jurisdiction to him belonging."

Section 24. enacts, "That all laws and statutes in force within the realm of England at the time of the passing of this act, (not being inconsistent herewith, or with any charter or letters patent or order in council which may be issued in pursuance hereof,) shall be applied in the administration of justice in the courts of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land respectively, so far as the same can be applied within the said colonies; and as often as any doubt shall arise as to the application of any such laws or statutes in the said colonies respectively, it shall be lawful for the governors of the said colonies respectively, by and with the advice of the legislative councils of the said colonies respectively, by ordinances to be by them for that purpose made, to declare whether such laws or statutes shall be deemed to extend to such colonies, and to be in force within the same, or to make and establish such limitations and modifications of any such laws and statutes within the said colonies respectively as may be deemed expedient in that behalf: Provided always, that in the mean time and before any such ordinances shall be actually made, it shall be the duty of the said supreme courts, as often as any such doubts shall arise upon

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The appeal in this case raises three questions: the first of which, namely, that the bequest is too indefinite to be performed, is involved in the second, and which need not therefore be considered separately from it. The second question is whether, independently of the statute 9 Geo. 2. c. 36, called the Mortmain Act, and on the assumption that the gift does not affect property obnoxious to that statute, there is a good trust for what this Court considers as charitable purposes, created by these words in the codicil disposing of the residue,—"I hereby direct and appoint that the trustees or trustee for the time being of my said will, do and shall stand possessed of and interested in the residue or surplus of the trust monies and securities to them bequeathed, in trust to appropriate the same in such manner as they my said trustees or trustee shall in their absolute and uncontrouled discretion think proper and expedient for the benefit and advancement and propagation of education and learning in every part of the world, so far as circumstances will admit." I apprehend that the only difficulty in the way of the Court on this part of the case has been created by the introduction of two words, "and learning," coming after the word "education," because a trust for education would be good notwithstanding what this testator has said, effectually or ineffectually, of the uncontrouled discretion of the trustees. This is clear, and is not doubted; indeed, it has not been so even in the argument. The argument was confined to what was the force and effect of the words "and learning" added to the words "of education." Now, my impression of the true construction is this, that either the words "and learning" add nothing whatever to the idea represented by the term "education," or if they do, that the phrase "learning" is only to be considered as explanatory of the word "education"; and that it is the same as if the testator had said "education in learning" as distinguished from education in other subjects or matters, to which the term education might have been applied. I repeat, therefore, that in my judgment those words either do not add to the meaning of the sentence or add only the explanation of that to which I have referred. I apprehend, then, that the introduction of the expression does not render that a bad and ineffectual gift to a charity which would, in my judgment, have been good and effectual without it.

The next question is as to the property comprised in the bequest, and it has been said that the real property in New South Wales is ineffectually given, as it falls within the provisions of 9 Geo. 2. c. 36, by reason that the 24th section of 9 Geo. 4. c. 83. provides, "that all laws and statutes in force within the realm of England at the time of the passing of this act (not being inconsistent herewith, or with any charter or letters patent or order in council, which may be issued in pursuance hereof,) shall be applied in the administration of justice in the courts of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land respectively, so far as the same can be applied within the said colonies." Taking, however, the whole of the section together, I am of opinion that the words "can be applied" have reference only to those statutes which "can be reasonably applied." This lets in all those considerations which presented themselves to Sir William Grant's mind in the case of The Attorney General v. Stewart, and which are there discussed by him. This case, indeed, differs in respect to the colony; but it is impossible to read that case without seeing that the opinion expressed by Sir William Grant applies to a case of the present description. He there supposes various reasons against the application of such a statute as that of 9 Geo. 2. c. 36. to a colony, unless the legislature has expressly extended it to the colony of New South Wales, with or without modification. My opinion is against holding the statute applicable in the present case. In the first place, it is to my mind doubtful, or more than doubtful, whether there could be an enrolment, such as is required by the act. Jurisdiction is, indeed, conferred upon the supreme court analogous to the equitable and common law jurisdiction exercised by the Court of Chancery here; but with regard to the particular enrolment which the statute requires, I doubt very much, to say the least, whether enrolments in the courts in the colonies could satisfy the words of the act 9 Geo. 2. In the second place, in addition to all this, the exceptional privileges granted to certain institutions and places of education in this country would not apply to a colony where, similar establishments not existing, people cannot be thought to have any particular attachment to those institutions. For these particular reasons, and the reasons given by Sir William Grant, as well as for the general reason arising out of the construction of the 9 Geo. 4. c. 83, I am of opinion that it ought to be held that the statute of 9 Geo. 2. is inapplicable to the colony, within the sense and meaning of the act of Geo. 4. There can be no objection to that declaration being made here, but whether it will be binding upon the colonial court where the land is situated I know not. That is quite a different question. But as we have jurisdiction, it will be binding in personam upon the parties within the jurisdiction. We may and do declare the law on the subject according to the best interpretation we can put upon it. The decree, therefore, of the Master of the Rolls is right, and the appeal must be dismissed, without costs.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. }
Jan. 19. } NELSON v. HOPKINS.

Devise — Construction — Leaseholds — Misdescription.

A testator gave and devised all his freehold and copyhold messuages, farms, lands, tenements, hereditaments, and real estate situate at Market Rasen, to his wife for life, and then to his son, his heirs and assigns for ever. The testator had no property at Market Rasen except a leasehold estate held for 1,000 years:—Held, that the leasehold estate passed under the above clause.

George Nelson, by his will, dated the 9th of April 1842, after directing the payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and bequeathing divers legacies to a considerable amount, proceeded in the terms following, that is to say—

“ I give and devise all and every my freehold and copyhold messuages, cottages, closes, farms, lands, tenements, hereditaments, and real estate situate at Market Rasen, in the county of Lincoln, and also all my messuage or dwelling-house, with the garden, outbuildings, and appurtenances thereto belonging, situate in Albion Street, in the parish of Sculcoates, unto my dear wife, Elizabeth Nelson, and her assigns, for and during the term of her natural life, and I also give to her the rents which may be due for the same at my decease; and from and immediately after her decease, I give and devise the same last-mentioned real estates, hereditaments, and premises, unto and to the use of my son, Thomas Sherlock Nelson, his heirs and assigns for ever.”

The testator's wife died in his lifetime, and he died in November 1848. By an indenture of mortgage, dated the 23rd of March 1827, certain messuages, closes, farms and lands situate in Market Rasen aforesaid, were demised to the testator, for the term of 1,000 years. Subsequently to the date of the mortgage, J. J. Clark became a bankrupt, and the mortgage money being unpaid, the testator filed a bill in this court against his assignees to foreclose the equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises, and on the 5th of June 1834 he obtained an order absolute for foreclosure of the equity of redemption. The testator, up to the day of his death, continued to be entitled to all the said messuages, lands, and premises in Market Rasen, comprised in the said mortgage; but he had not, at the date of his will, or at any time thenceforward up to the day of his death, any freehold or copyhold messuages, cottages, closes, farms, lands, tenements, hereditaments, or real estate whatsoever situate at Market Rasen, or near or adjoining thereto, nor any other property at Market Rasen besides the messuages and premises comprised in the mortgage to which the description contained in the clause of his will could apply.

The bill was filed by Thomas Sherlock Nelson, the son of the testator, against his executors, and it prayed that it might be declared that, according to the proper construction of the said will, the plaintiff was entitled to all the said messuages, hereditaments and premises situate at Market Rasen aforesaid, for the residue of the said term of 1,000 years, and for all such other estate and interest therein as the testator was entitled to.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Follett appeared in support of the bill, and cited Rose v. Bartlett (1), Day v. Trig (2), and Doe d. Dunning v. Lord Cranstoun (3), in which leaseholds had been held to pass under the word "freehold," &c.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Prior, for the executors, said they were not desirous of raising any objection to the plaintiff's demand, but submitted the question to the Court, and contended that as by the 24th section of the Wills Act, which was passed previously to the date of the testator's will, a will was to speak from the death of a testator, the reason for the former decisions had ceased; and the reason having ceased to exist, the question was, whether the Court would now carry out the principle laid down in the cases cited. The Courts had always declined to follow the rule whenever there was any property, however small, to which the devise could apply. No intention ought to be carried out except what the testator had plainly expressed by his will.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The rule is clearly laid down in the authorities which have been cited. It is evident from the words of this will that the testator intended to pass to the plaintiff the property which he possessed at Market Rasen. The effect is, that the plaintiff is specific legatee of these leaseholds. The declaration must, therefore, be, that the property at Market Rasen passed to the plaintiff under and by virtue of the devise contained in the will.

Lease—Restrictive Covenants—Contract—Previous Lease.

In carrying an informal contract for a lease into effect, the Master will be directed to regard previous leases containing special covenants.

(1) Cro. Car. 292.

(2) 1 P. Wms. 286.

(3) 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 294.

A landlord, by memorandum, agreed to cancel a lease for fourteen years containing special covenants, and to grant a new lease for twenty-eight years at a reduced rent. After the decease of the landlord, the solicitors of the devisee and tenant, to avoid a suit, agreed that the term should be reduced to twenty-one years; but upon the draft being sent, the lessor refused to forego a covenant not to assign the lease without consent. Upon a claim by the tenant,—Held, that he was entitled to a specific performance, and though the letter of proposed arrangement by the tenant said, "the lease to contain all covenants usual and ordinary in farming leases," it was referred to the Master, who, in settling the lease, was to have regard to the lease previously held by the tenant.

William Hilton, by a lease, dated the 13th of November 1840, demised a messuage and farm called Dunningford Wood House, consisting of about 100 acres of land, to George Martin Bell, for fourteen years, at the rent of 212*l.* a year.

W. Hilton, on the 15th of September 1846, agreed to cancel the lease, and he thereby agreed to grant to G. M. Bell a new lease for the term of twenty-eight years from Michaelmas next, at the reduced rent of 100*l.* per annum; he also authorized Mr. Bell to build a house and cartshed, and deduct the amount from the rent, the outlay not to be more than 400*l.*, and he said, "I do this as a reward for the great improvement he has made in the estate, and as an encouragement for his general industry." Under his will and codicil these hereditaments were devised to his sister E. Barchard, the wife of Joseph Henry Barchard, in fee.

The testator died about the 25th of December 1849. After his decease G. M. Bell filed his bill against Mr. and Mrs. Barchard, praying that they might grant the lease according to the agreement entered into, but at the request of Messrs. Currie, Woodgate & Williams, the solicitors of Mr. and Mrs. Barchard, all proceedings were stayed, and they afterwards made a proposition stating that if the term could be shortened, a lease would be granted at the reduced rent of 100*l.* per annum, and the 400*l.* laid out in the improvement of the premises.

Mr. W. H. Clifton, the solicitor of Mr. Bell, after an interview with Mr. Woodgate, wrote to him, "I believe the following are the terms to which you assent on behalf of your client, viz., a lease for twenty-one years to be granted to Mr. Bell from Michaelmas next at the reduced rent of 100*l.* per annum, 'the lease to contain all covenants usual and ordinary in farming leases,' 400*l.* to be laid out by your client, say within six months, in the erection of a farm house upon the estate; Mr. Bell to erect at his own expense the cart-shed, and such other outbuildings as he may require, and keep the same, together with the house, in proper repair, and so deliver up at the expiration of the lease."

On the 27th of January 1851 Mr. Woodgate wrote, "As regards the length of lease, the proposal was that the term of twenty-eight years mentioned in the agreement should be shortened to twenty-one: this will make the term of twenty-one years run from Michaelmas 1846, and I thought we so understood each other. This point being arranged, I give an assent to the other terms."

On the 28th of January 1851, Mr. Clifton wrote to Mr. Woodgate, "I fully thought the term agreed on was to run from the present year, and so informed Mr. Bell, and it was upon this understanding he instructed me to arrange the suit. In the hope of carrying out the arrangement, I will take upon myself to propose that the term should commence from Michaelmas 1850, but less than this I feel sure Mr. Bell will not accept. I trust the negotiation for an amicable settlement may not be broken off upon a difference of four years only in the term."

In answer, Mr. Woodgate wrote, "I certainly concluded, as expressed in my former note, that the term was to run from Michaelmas 1846: however, let it be as you propose, that is, from Michaelmas 1850."

Mr. Woodgate afterwards wrote to Mr. Clifton, and also to Mr. Bell, stating that as the terms of the lease had been agreed on, he was ready to receive the rent.

On the 2nd of August 1851, Messrs. Currie, Woodgate & Williams sent the draft lease of the farm to be executed, in pursuance of the agreement, containing a covenant not to assign the term to be granted, or to underlet or part with the possession of the farm without the consent of the defendants, all which were expunged from the draft by Mr. Clifton, on behalf of Mr. Bell, as being contrary to the express and plain terms of the agreement.

On the 8th of January 1852, Messrs. Currie returned the draft, stating that they had found it necessary to restore it to its original state corresponding with the former leases, and according to the agreement.

On the 12th of January 1852, Mr. Clifton proposed a reference to a conveyancer to settle the draft, having reference to the agreement under which the suit was to be compromised.

No reply was returned, upon which the plaintiff filed this claim, asking a specific performance of the agreement for the compromise of the suit which had been instituted, and for the costs of the claim.

Mr. Woodgate by his affidavit said, that the farm had been let in 1826 for 200*l.* a year, and again in 1840 to the plaintiff at 212*l.*, upon each of which occasions the lease contained covenants restricting the lessee from assigning or under-letting the farm without the consent of the lessor; that in the correspondence entered into, the idea of altering the covenants in the old lease was never entertained, except such farming covenants as the present improved state of husbandry might render desirable, and that his desire only was to get the term shortened. That at the interviews between himself and Mr. Clifton no mention was made respecting any covenant to under-let or assign; and that it was understood that farming covenants, having reference to the lease and to the present improved mode of husbandry, should be inserted, and that upon inquiry a covenant against assigning or sub-letting was usual in leases in the county of Essex.

Mr. Kenyon Parker and Mr. Jolliffe, in support of the claim. — The agreement made by the testator entirely destroyed the existing lease, and created a new contract, certain as to term and rent, but inconclusive as to the covenants. This contract the plaintiff had filed a bill to enforce, and the plaintiff had consented to shorten the term upon having a lease with the usual covenants; a restriction, however, upon dealing with the property was an unusual covenant, and one which the Court would not sanction, unless specially contracted for. Now, in the dealing with Mr. Woodgate he never pretended that the lease was existing, or had any reference to the agreement; the contract was the basis of the letting. The plaintiff agreed to forego a portion of the benefit secured to him upon having an immediate settlement upon the terms specified in these letters. These letters contained the terms, which had no reference to any restriction upon the alienation of the term, and this Court would not insert it in their absence, it being specially contracted for.

Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 208.

Henderson v. Hay, 3 Bro. C.C. 632.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Burdon, contra.

—Nothing would be more unfair than to suppose that the defendants intended to deprive themselves of controul over the tenancy of their own estate. The bill filed by Mr. Bell was to obtain performance of the agreement with reference to the covenants contained in his previous lease; and if the contract subsequently entered into was a surprise upon the lessor, the Court will be satisfied if it is carried into effect strictly, and it will not enforce a specific performance merely, without the general covenants for the protection of the lessors being inserted in the lease, and parol evidence will be admitted to explain the transaction in cases of mistake and surprise, the same as in cases of fraud—The Marquis of Townshend v. Stangroom (1). A binding contract might be entered into by letters, but it could only be considered with reference to a more formal document—Thomas v. Dering (2). If the plaintiff is entitled to a specific performance of the contract entered into by the letters, the Master ought to settle the lease, and in making such an order he ought to have regard to the agreement of the 15th of September 1846; that was the question raised by the bill, and nothing passed between the solicitors to shew that the covenants in the former lease were to be varied. Mr. Woodgate was not dealing for a new agreement, but merely to shorten the term. The owner of the estate was a married woman, and if any compromise was made, it was the act of the husband alone, and ought not to be enforced to her detriment.

Mr. Kenyon Parker, in reply, cited Neale v. Mackenzie (3).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—These letters form a contract, and I must declare that the plaintiff is entitled to a specific performance, and must also refer it to the Master to settle the terms of the lease, but with respect to them I think it necessary to make a special direction. The construction of this agreement turns upon the circumstances which existed between these parties before the first of these letters was written, and differs materially from what it would have been had there been no previous dealings. Had the transaction begun with the first of these letters, it would have been for the Master to say what covenants should be inserted in the lease. But the testator had granted a lease of the farm to the plaintiff in 1840, which, amongst others, contained a clause against assignment. In 1846 he agreed to cancel this lease, and grant a new lease for twenty-one years at a lower rent, and in addition he authorized the lessee to lay out 400*l.* in farm buildings, which was to be deducted from the rent, and he said that he did it as a reward for the improvements he had made on the estate, and as an encouragement for his general industry. Had there been nothing further, I should have had little hesitation in saying that the testator, if it was a binding contract, or a contract sought to be enforced, intended to have a covenant inserted in the lease to confine the possession of the farm to the lessee. Why should he give him this beneficial lease, and allow him to under-let the farm to persons who might not keep it in that repair and state of improvement which the testator evidently considered valuable, and as a reward for which the lease was given, as well as for encouragement to his general industry? These expressions must have had relation not only to the estate, but the improvements upon it. I think, therefore, it would have been quite inconsistent with the contract that the lessee should have had so beneficial a lease with a power of under-letting it to other persons.

About three years afterwards the testator died, without having executed the lease, and then, after some transactions with the defendants, who both at law and in equity represent the testator, the plaintiff filed a bill for the specific performance of the contract made with the testator. Proposals for a compromise were entertained, in which the defendants said, "If you will reduce the lease to a reasonable term of years, we will not resist your having such a lease." That is agreed to, and the last two letters alone refer to a variation of the terms; but Mr. Woodgate gives way, and they agree that the lease shall be for twenty-one years, to contain "all covenants usual and ordinary in farming leases." Now, I am called upon to say that the true construction of these words is, that the lease to be granted is not to contain the provisions in the lease under which the lessee held; but I cannot consider that a proper construction of the contract; on the contrary, the agreement is cumulative, and is to contain all the covenants usual and ordinary in farming leases if they were not there. But having relation to the lease under which the lessee held, or now holds, the farm, and the contract between the parties, it required an express agreement to say that any of those covenants which were beneficial to the lessor were to be omitted; and as that is not the case, I am of opinion that he is bound by it. But while expressing that opinion, I do not wish to fetter the Master further than to refer it to him to settle the lease, having regard to the covenants contained in the lease of 1840. The farm is situate at Romford, in Essex, and there may be an ordinary custom with respect to farming leases in that county; if so, the Master will probably and properly have regard to that on the terms contained in the letter.

With respect to the lease itself, I shall say nothing further than that this is a contract simply by the husband which binds him only for twenty-one years. The case of Neale v. Mackenzie was not similar; there, a man having a life interest in an estate contracted that his trustee, who had a power to lease, should grant a lease of the property, and became insolvent, so that the contract could not be enforced against him; but it was sought to be enforced against the trustee; and the Court, thinking that the trustee had authorized the insolvent to enter into the contract, and made him his agent, compelled the trustee to convey as much as he could without committing a breach of trust: but that is different from the equities that there would be against the husband himself. So, in the case of Thomas v. Dering, it was a distinct case, and Lord Langdale said, "You are endeavouring to enforce a different contract altogether." It was, in fact, a contract by the husband that the trustees, who had a power of sale, should convey to the plaintiff; and the plaintiff sought to enforce the contract against the trustees, and the trustees, in their discretion, did not choose to execute any such contract, as they had never entered into it, and had never authorized the defendant as their agent to enter into any such contract, and therefore the Court said that the contract could not be entered into, and it would not allow you to substitute a fresh contract in the place of that which could not be specifically performed. I am of opinion that the Master must settle the lease, and have regard to the covenants contained in the lease of 1840; but further than that I shall only declare that the agreement is to be specifically performed.

Attachment—Irregularity.

An attachment for want of an answer, returnable immediately, against a defendant resident out of the jurisdiction, is irregular.

The defendant, Antonio Vinent, who resided in Cuba, had made default in putting in his answer to the amended bill, and on the 17th of April the plaintiff sued out a writ of attachment, directed to the sheriff of London, and made returnable immediately.

Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Willcock, and Mr. Babington now appeared in support of a motion that the writ of attachment might be set aside for irregularity, the practice of the Court not allowing a writ of attachment returnable immediately to be issued against a defendant resident abroad—Boschetti v. Power (1).

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Shadwell, for the plaintiff.—The writ of attachment has been regularly obtained. An order has been made for substituting service of the subpoena upon the defendant's solicitors in London: the attachment, therefore, was properly directed to the place at which the substituted service of process was to be made. This case differs altogether from that cited, which was not to restrain an action at law. In that case, also, no order had been made for the substitution of service—Yearsley v. Budgett (2).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I can only decide this case according to the strict practice. The case of Boschetti v. Power is clearly applicable to the present case, and determines that when a party out of the jurisdiction makes default in putting in his answer, you cannot issue an attachment returnable immediately to a place where it is known he cannot be found. The case of Boschetti v. Power was decided after inquiries into the practice had been made. My opinion therefore is, that the attachment must be discharged, and with costs.

Bill—Pro confesso—78th General Order of the 8th of May 1845.

The defendant had never been in this country, and there was doubt as to the information given him:—Held, that he could not be deemed to have absconded to avoid answering, or to have refused to obey the order of the Court: and an application to take the bill pro confesso, as against him, was refused.

This was a motion on behalf of the plaintiff, under the 77th and 78th General Orders of the Court of the 8th of May 1845 (1), that the bill might be taken pro confesso.

The defendant resided in Cuba, and upon the amended bill being filed, the plaintiff applied to this Court for an injunction, but the application was refused. From this decision the plaintiff appealed, and while the appeal was pending he did not press for an answer.

After the appeal had been disposed of, the defendant obtained time to answer, but when the last application for further time was made, it was refused, and the defendant was now in default for want of an answer.

In opposition to this application, an affidavit was made by the defendant's solicitor that the defendant had always been ready and willing to put in his answer, but that he could not do so until the same was prepared and forwarded to Cuba, in March; and that the delay was attributable to him, as solicitor, who had refrained from preparing and forwarding the answer under the impression that if the plaintiff failed in obtaining an injunction restraining the action at law, the plaintiff would not require an answer, and from a bond fide desire to save unnecessary expense.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Shadwell, for the plaintiff.

Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Willcock, and Mr. Babington, for the defendant, were not heard.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—It is clear that the 78th General Order gives the Court a large discretion; and if it thought proper, it might order the bill to be taken pro confesso against the defendant; but then the Court must be satisfied that the defendant has really absconded to evade the service of process, or has refused to obey the process of the Court. It is manifest that the defendant in the present case has not absconded, since he has never been in this country, and so far from desiring to evade the process of the Court, he appeares anxious to come to this country to meet the case. He has apparently been misled as to the time allowed for putting in his answer, and, had correct information been given to him, he probably would have put in his answer six or seven months back. Under the circumstances, therefore, it is impossible to grant the application, and the motion must be refused, but without costs.

B.'s wife, on the 7th, asked that the shares might be reserved a few days longer. A. B., on the 9th, wrote saying, "I should wish to have 100 shares reserved for me." On the 21st of November, the secretary required payment of the deposit on the 100 shares "accepted" by A. B. On the 27th, A. B. wrote, saying, "Inform me whether a sufficient amount of deposits has been paid up to enable the company to go to parliament this session, and if all the provisional committee have paid their deposits; should that be the case, I shall not hesitate to pay also, that is, upon being clearly satisfied on these points." The Master placed the name of A. B. on the list of contributories, as having accepted shares, and that decision was affirmed by the Vice Chancellor, but upon appeal to the Lords Justices, it was held that there had been no absolute and unqualified, but only a conditional, acceptance, and as the condition had not been, and could not be, performed, A. B.'s name must be removed from the list.

This case came before the Court, on an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Parker, made on the 10th of February last. The motion on that occasion was made on behalf of Mr. John Manwaring, that the certificate of Sir William Horne, dated the 9th of July 1851, whereby it was ordered or directed that the name of the said John Manwaring should be placed or retained on the list of contributories of the above-named company, might be discharged or varied, and that the name of the said John Manwaring might be struck out from the list of contributories to the said company, and that the costs of the said John Manwaring might be paid by the official manager either personally or out of the funds of the said company.

The facts were as follows:—The Eastern Counties Junction and Southend Railway Company was provisionally registered in May 1845, "to make a railway, commencing at the Romford Station of the Eastern Counties Railway, with branches to Southend, Essex." In September 1845, a prospectus was issued, in which Mr. Manwaring's name appeared as one of the provisional committee. On the 6th of October 1845 the following letter was sent by the secretary to Mr. Manwaring:—
 "Eastern Counties Junction and Southend Railway Company Office, 33, Broad Street Buildings, London.

"October 6, 1845.

"Sir,—I am instructed by the committee of management to inform you that by a resolution passed by them, you are, as a member of the provisional committee, entitled to 100 shares in this company or any less number you may wish, provided you signify, in writing, on or before the 9th inst., the number you are desirous of taking.

"(Signed) R. H. Causton,

"Secretary.

"John Manwaring, Esq."

Mr. Manwaring being from home, Mrs. Manwaring wrote a letter on the 7th, in which she stated that as he was from home, she could not state whether he would accept the shares or not, but that he would write when he returned, and added an expression of a wish that the shares should be reserved for a few days longer.

* Besides the point reported, there was, both in the court below and in this court, a point as to the variation of the scheme originally proposed, by the formation of branch lines. The judgment, however, turns on "acceptance" or "non-acceptance," and, therefore, the report is confined to that question.

Two days later, the following letter was sent to the secretary :—

“Eagle Hall, October 9, 1845.

“Sir,—My absence from home prevented me sooner replying to yours of the 6th inst. I should wish to have 100 shares reserved for me.—Yours obediently, “John Manwaring.

“R. H. Causton, Esq.”

No further correspondence appeared to have taken place until the following month, when Mr. Manwaring was by the secretary addressed thus, (the letter of allotment mentioned in the postscript, however, not being produced) :—

“November 21, 1845.

“Sir,—The plans and sections of the Eastern Counties Junction and Southend Railway being nearly ready for deposit on the 29th inst., agreeably to the standing orders of the House of Commons, the committee of management are of opinion that the payment of the deposit money should be no longer delayed. They, therefore, request you will be so good as to pay forthwith the deposit on the 100 shares accepted by you as a member of the provisional committee, agreeably to your letter of the 9th ultimo.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant, “R. H. Causton, Secretary.

“John Manwaring, Esq.”

“P.S.—Your letter of allotment has already been forwarded, and the bankers of the company are directed to receive the amount.”

In reply to this application, Mr. Manwaring wrote as follows :—

“Eagle Hall, Ripon, November 27, 1845.

“Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 21st inst., calling upon me to pay the deposit on 100 shares in the Eastern Counties Junction and Southend Railway, I must beg that you will have the goodness to inform me whether a sufficient amount of deposits has been paid up to enable the company to go to parliament this session, and if all the other members of the provisional committee have paid their deposits; should that be the case, I shall not hesitate to pay also, that is, upon being clearly satisfied on these points.—I am, Sir, your most obedient servant, John Manwaring.

Upon these materials, the Vice Chancellor affirmed the decision of Sir William Horne, and dismissed the appeal, but said he did not consider it a case for costs (1). On that occasion the cases of Hutton v. Upfill (2), Onions' case (3), and Conway's case (4) were cited, in addition to which on

(1) In delivering judgment, his Honour observed that “he did not think the present case was distinguishable from Upfill's case. The point decided in that case was, that a person whose name was on the list of provisional committeemen, and to whom shares had been allotted, was a contributory. The first question, then, was whether Mr. Manwaring's name was on the provisional committee. It was in the printed list, but it was suggested that there was nothing to shew that it was there with his consent. However, there were two letters written to him in the character of a provisional committeeman, and his answers to them, and in those answers he did not repudiate the character in which the letters were addressed to him. Then the next question was, did he accept shares in the concern? In his answer to the letter offering him shares, he says, ‘I should wish to have 100 shares reserved for me.’ If it had stopped there, the circumstances would have been the same as in Onions' case, in which Lord Cranworth said, that his acquaintance with mercantile language was not sufficient to enable him to decide that Mr. Onions had accepted the shares, by requesting that they might be ‘reserved’ for him; and that he should direct an issue, in order that the question might be determined by a jury. In this case, that was followed up by a letter from the secretary, referring to the letter from Mr. Manwaring, and saying, ‘You will be so good as to pay forthwith the deposit on the 100 shares accepted by you as a member of the provisional committee.’ The answer of Mr. Manwaring to that letter did not say ‘You have mistaken my letter,’ but it was put on quite different grounds. Whatever doubt there might be upon the mere word ‘reserved,’ there was this further fact, that both parties had treated that letter in which it occurred as an acceptance of shares. Conway's case has been referred to; in that case there was an offer and an acceptance of shares, and nothing more was done, and he (Sir J. Parker) had considered that those facts did not bring it within the law of Upfill's case. Here there had been an offer of shares and an acceptance, and then a communication to Mr. Manwaring that shares had been allotted to him, and calling upon him to pay a deposit, thus supplying what was wanted in Conway's case. This case was, therefore, clearly distinguishable from Conway's, because the acceptance of the shares was followed up by what was tantamount to an allotment.”

the present appeal Ex parte Cooke (5) was relied on.

Mr. Lee and Mr. F. S. Williams, for the appellant, argued that there had not been any unconditional acceptance of shares, and therefore Upfill's case did not govern the present: nor was there any evidence that there had been an allotment of shares, for the alleged letter of allotment alluded to in the postscript to the letter of the 21st of November was not forthcoming; nor could it be proved to have been sent; besides this, it was tolerably clear that there were no means of allotment, the directors having nothing to allot. The argument then proceeded on the second point, namely, that there had been a variation of the scheme.

Mr. W. T. S. Daniel and Mr. Wordsworth appeared for the official manager.

Mr. Lee was not called upon to reply.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—We think this does not come within Upfill's case, as we are of opinion that there has been no acceptance of shares. Assuming that there has been no substantial variation of the scheme, that is, of the line as originally proposed, the way the case stands is this:—Mr. Manwaring's name is put on the provisional committee on the 30th of September 1845 for the first time. On the 6th of October the first meeting of the committee of management took place, and on that day Mr. Causton, one of the promoters of the scheme, was appointed secretary; and on the same day, but I suppose after that appointment, he writes a letter to Mr. Manwaring, telling him that he was, as a member of the provisional committee, entitled to 100 shares or any less number, provided he signified in writing on or before the 9th inst. the number he was desirous of taking. In answer to that letter Mrs. Manwaring wrote on the 7th of October, saying that her husband was from home and that she could not say whether he would take the shares, but that he would write when he returned home; but she asks that 100 shares might be "reserved" for a few days longer. When Mr. Manwaring returned home on the 9th of October he thus writes: "My absence from home prevented me sooner replying to yours of the 6th inst. I should wish to have the 100 shares reserved for me." I expressed an opinion in Onions' case, to which I still adhere, that I was not satisfied that that mode of expression was tantamount to an acceptance; and I am borne out in that here, where in the other letters acceptance and reservation seem to be spoken of as different acts. If that be so, there is no evidence of acceptance of shares on the 9th of October, and the Vice Chancellor seems to have been of the same opinion. Of that opinion are both my learned Brother and myself. We both think that the expression used does not mean "I accept the shares," because the acceptance and the reservation of the shares were considered by the writer, as I have before said, as different things.

Then, there being no evidence of acceptance on the 9th of October, matters go to sleep for a long time. On the 21st of November a letter was written by Mr. Causton to Mr. Manwaring, in which he says, "The plans and sections of the Eastern Counties Junction and Southend Railway being nearly ready for deposit on the 29th inst., agreeably to the standing orders of the House of Commons, the committee of management are of opinion that the payment of the deposit money should be no longer delayed; they therefore request you will be so good as to pay forthwith the deposit on the 100 shares accepted by you as a member of the provisional committee, agreeably to your letter of the 9th ult." Thus he admits that there was no acceptance unless he considered the direction to reserve shares in the letter of the 9th of October to be one, but which we do not consider to be an acceptance. The postscript of the letter adds, "Your letter of allotment has already been forwarded, and the bankers of the company are directed to receive the amount." On the 27th, Mr. Manwaring writes in answer, "I must beg that you will have the goodness to inform me whether a sufficient amount of deposits has been paid up to enable the company to go to parliament this session, and if all the other members of the provisional committee have paid their deposits; should that be the case, I shall not hesitate to pay also, that is, upon being clearly satisfied upon these points."

Now, what we think is the fair inference from that, is no more than this, "I do not accede to your interpretation of my conduct, and to pay upon what I have before accepted," but "I accept subject to those qualifications;" and there is no evidence that those qualifications have been complied with; on the contrary, the evidence clearly shews that they had not been complied with and never could be complied with. Therefore, it amounts to no more than this: the secretary writes, saying: "You did accept on the 9th of October, and we call on you to pay the deposit." Upon which Mr. Manwaring, in substance, says, "I do not trouble myself as to what may be the legal effect of what I have already done; satisfy me that sufficient deposits have been paid to carry the concern into effect, and I will accept the shares and pay my deposits." So that there was not an absolute and unqualified acceptance. This case does not seem to me to come within Upfill's case. I give no opinion upon the other point, whether there has been a substantial variation between the scheme originally proposed and that subsequently engaged in by the company. For the reasons I have stated, I am of opinion that this gentleman's name should be removed from the list of contributories.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE. — Considering the case as it would stand if the letters of the 21st and 27th of November were out of it, there is not only, in my opinion, a total absence of evidence of allotment, but strong reason to believe affirmatively the contrary; but whether arising from the fact suggested at the bar, namely, that they had not wherewithal to allot, or otherwise, that is my view independently of those letters. Then, upon those letters, how is this case varied on this point by them? It was argued by the counsel for the respondents that the postscript of the letter of the 21st of November, speaking of the letter of allotment, refers to nothing or to a letter not produced; the consequence, therefore, must be, that, in substance, that letter of the 21st of November must be considered rather in the nature of a proposal than of anything else, as I view it; and if that proposal had been unconditionally accepted the case might have stood more favourably for the respondents. But the letter of the 27th is a conditional acceptance only of the proposal made by the letter of the 21st, and the condition was one which was never fulfilled. I come, therefore, to the same conclusion as Lord Cranworth, and substantially on the same ground, namely, that sufficient evidence is not produced to justify putting this gentleman's name upon the list of contributories. We are glad to think the Vice Chancellor had not this matter brought so fully before him as it has been presented to us, or probably he would have taken the same course as we have. What we now do is to be without prejudice to the production of additional evidence by the official manager, in order that Mr. Manwaring's name may, if right, be placed on the list of contributories. The costs of all parties will be paid out of the estate.

DAVIES v. DAVIES.
In re DAVIES.

Lunacy—Person of unsound Mind—Application of Capital for Maintenance.

A person of unsound mind, not found lunatic by inquisition, was entitled to sums of stock in court, the income of which was not sufficient for her maintenance. The Court directed that a part of one of the funds should be invested in the purchase of a Government annuity, in the name of the lunatic and for her life, to be paid to her brother until the further order of the Court, he undertaking to apply the same towards her maintenance.

One of the defendants in the suit of Davies v. Davies, namely, Sophia Frances D'Arly Davies, spinster, was a person of unsound mind, not so found by inquisition. Mary Davies, her mother, was appointed her guardian ad litem. Her income being insufficient for her support, a petition was presented by her, by her mother, and by another defendant Henry Philip Davies, her brother, intituled in the cause and in the above-mentioned matter, for the purpose of obtaining an order by which it might be augmented. The petition contained the following statements. — That the said petitioner S. F. D'Arly Davies will be forty-seven years of age in December 1852; that for the whole of the period of seventeen years and upwards last past, she has been and she still is of unsound mind and incapable of taking care of her affairs; that during the whole of that period (with the exception of four days) she has been and still is under the care of Dr. Edward Thomas Monro, at Brooke House, Clapton; that the expenses of maintaining and keeping her there have amounted, and still amount, to 50*l.* per annum, or thereabouts, and the same, besides 10*l.* for clothing, have been defrayed and paid for some time partly, and so far as the same would extend, out of the dividends of the sum of 600*l.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced Bank annuities hereinafter mentioned, the deficiency of such dividends to meet the said expenses being defrayed and paid by her said mother and her brothers and sisters, but that of late the deficiency had been made up by her mother alone; that upon the death of one Timothy Davies, the son, in April 1850, and under an order made in the above-mentioned causes, dated the 6th of December 1850, the said petitioner S. F. D'Arly Davies has become and is absolutely entitled to the sum of 762*l.* 16*s.* 3*l.* per cent. consolidated Bank annuities, which, under the said order, has been carried over in trust and to the credit of the said first-mentioned cause to an account intitled "The account of the petitioner S. F. D'Arly Davies;" and that she is also entitled to the sum of 41*l.* 19*s.* 5*d.* cash, standing to the same account; that she is also absolutely entitled to one equal seventh part of 3,600*l.* 3*l.* per cent. consolidated Bank annuities, which, under the said order of the 6th of December 1850, has been carried over and is now standing to the credit of the said first-mentioned cause to an account intitled "The life account of Sarah Davies, widow," subject to an interest for life therein of the said Sarah Davies, who is now of the age of forty-two years, or thereabouts; that she is also entitled for her life to the dividends of 600*l.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced Bank annuities, standing in the names, &c., and is also absolutely entitled to an equal seventh part of the reversion of the same sum; that except as herein stated she is not possessed of or entitled to any estate, property or effects whatsoever; that her said mother is now seventy-nine years old, or thereabouts, and of infirm health; that the income of her said mother is derived solely from a life estate which will expire at her death, and she has not the power nor the means of making provision for her said daughter after her decease, and that it will be expedient and for her benefit that some permanent provision should be made for her maintenance out of her estate and effects; that the yearly income of her property does not exceed the sum of 40*l.* 17*s.* 8*d.*, and the sum is greatly insufficient for her suitable maintenance; that the sum of 762*l.* 16*s.* 3*l.* per cent. consols at the present value thereof, would purchase a Government annuity for her life of 43*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.*, or thereabouts, and that it is desirable and will be for her benefit, that the same should be so applied, and such Government annuity be applied in or towards her maintenance.

The petition then prayed that such sum of 762*l.* 16*s.* 3*l.* per cent. consols. might be applied to the purchase of an annuity for her life, pursuant to the statute 48 Geo. 3. c. 142, in the joint names of the said petitioners Mary Davies and H. P. Davies, to be by them, or the survivor of them, applied to her maintenance, or otherwise that the said dividends already accrued, and from time to time to accrue due on the said sum of 762*l.* 16*s.* 3*l.* per cent. consols. might be paid, after the payment of the costs, charges, and expenses therein mentioned, to the other petitioners, or the survivor of them, for her maintenance.

Mr. T. Stevens appeared in support of the petition, which was entirely unopposed. He stated that the matter had been mentioned to one of the Vice Chancellors, who thought it had better be brought before this Court.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—As the petition is in a cause, the Vice Chancellors have as much jurisdiction as we have, but it having been set down before us, in order to save expense, we will hear it. We require in the outset to know whether anything so strong has been done as to deal with capital? The circumstances stated in the petition make the compliance with its prayer reasonable, and the only question is, whether the Court ought to deal with the principal money.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—It would in such a case be a very wholesome jurisdiction to exercise. I, for my part, wish very much to do what is asked; but I do not recollect anything so strong being done. It is true it would only be carrying one step further what this Court is continually in the habit of doing with reference to applying part of the capital of an infant for payment of an apprenticeship fee when the fund is small. I think 600*l.* of this particular fund might be applied, leaving a small balance in case of necessity.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Of course the name of a lady of seventy-nine cannot be used, nor would that of the broker be correct, who would be most probably the survivor, and he moreover appearing to be in trade. The annuity, at any rate, must be bought in the name of the lunatic, or perhaps it may be purchased in the name of the Accountant General. The case can be mentioned again.

March 29.—Mr. Leach, the Registrar, stated to the Court that the Accountant General did not consider himself authorized to become the purchaser of the annuity, or to allow it to be purchased in his name. There were many difficulties of form, and also some serious objections to that course under the statute authorizing the purchase of life annuities. It was not clear that penalties might not be incurred. He also stated that he was informed by the solicitor of the petitioner, that he (the solicitor) had shewn the minutes of the order to the officer of the Commissioners, and was informed that they would act upon it (1).

(1) The order made was dated the 29th of March 1852, and was as follows:—"Let the petitioner Henry Philip Davies be at liberty to enter into a contract with the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, for the purchase, in the name and on the life of the petitioner Sophia Frances D'Arly Davies, spinster, a person of unsound mind, of such a Government annuity as can be purchased by a transfer to the said Commissioners of 600*l.* Bank 3*l.* per cent. annuities. And let 600*l.* Bank, &c. part of 762*l.* 16*s.* like annuities standing, &c. in trust in the cause "Davies v. Timothy Davies," the account of the Petitioner S. F. D'Arly Davies, be transferred to the Commissioners, &c. as the consideration for the purchase of such annuity. And let the said

New Trustees — Appointment — Settlement.

A settlement contained a proviso that in case either of the trustees should die or become unwilling to act, the acting trustees or trustee, or the executors or administrators of any surviving trustee, might nominate a fit person or persons in his or their place. On the death of one trustee, the survivor executed a deed, by which, after reciting that he was desirous of retiring from the trust, and that he had appointed another person to be a trustee in his place, he conveyed the estate to the new trustee upon the trusts:—Held, that the surviving trustee had power to nominate a sole trustee to act in his place, and that the appointment by recital was good.

Held, also, that a receipt signed by more persons than one, that one having power to give receipts, was a valid receipt by that one.

This case and the particular facts of it are fully stated in 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 226. The appeal to this Court was made by the plaintiffs, for whom

Mr. Malins and Mr. Borton appeared.

Mr. Stuart and Mr. Shapter were for the principal respondent.

Mr. Roll, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. J. Bailly, Mr. Freeling, Mr. Selwyn, and Mr. Vesey Dawson appeared for other parties.

Their LORDSHIPS were of opinion that the decision of the Vice Chancellor was correct, —LORD CRANWORTH, who delivered the Commissioners pay the said annuity to the petitioner H. P. Davies until the further order of this Court, he undertaking duly to apply the same towards the maintenance of the said petitioner S. F. D'Arly Davies. And let the interest to accrue due on 162*l.* 16*s.* Bank, &c., residue of the said 762*l.* 16*s.* like annuities after the transfer hereby directed, be from time to time as the same shall become due paid to the said petitioner H. P. Davies during the life of the said S. F. D'Arly Davies, or until the further order of this Court, upon the like undertaking." The costs of and relating to this application and consequent thereon were then directed to be taxed and be paid out of a sum of cash in court, and the rest be paid to H. P. Davies upon the like undertaking. But if the cash should not be sufficient, then the whole was to be paid to the solicitor for his costs, he consenting to receive the same in full discharge of the same costs. Liberty to apply.

judgment of the Court, observing, that if the appointment of Cooke alone was valid, the subsequent appointment of Holmes with him was equally so ; and even if the appointment of Cooke alone was not valid, then the subsequent appointment would be good, because the latter came within the very letter of the power of appointment. The receipt of the purchase-money being given by the two, must, quæcunque viâ, be good also. The appeal must be dismissed.

Feme Covert — Consent — Petition for Re-hearing.

A testator, by his will, devised his real estate for the benefit of the children of his heiress-at-law, a married woman. A bill was filed, on behalf of the children, to have the trusts of the will executed. The heiress-at-law entered a caveat against probate, but did not proceed. She and her husband, who were defendants to the suit, admitted, in their joint answer, the due execution of the will. She and her husband, in her right as heiress, brought an action of ejectment against the trustees of the will, but afterwards discontinued it, and were ordered to pay the costs. At the hearing of the cause in Chancery, an issue devisavit vel non was, on her application, granted, her adult children being directed to be plaintiffs. The record was withdrawn by them just before the time of the trial, and the trustees were then directed to be plaintiffs. The heiress and her husband appealed from this order unsuccessfully, their petition being dismissed. Just before the time for the trial of the issue, the heiress-at-law and her husband petitioned, alleging that the testator was unduly influenced against them in making his will, and that they had not tried the issue at the earnest solicitation of their adult children, and praying that the orders relating to the proceeding to the trial of the issue might be discharged, the petitioners undertaking to admit the validity of the will, and submitting to the execution of the trusts of the same, and praying that all the costs of and relating to such orders might be costs in the cause. The cause and this petition came on for hearing together, and on the 14th of February 1833 a decree establishing the will was made, and on the petition an order was made, "the heiress-at-law, by her counsel, consenting," in conformity with the prayer of the petition. Further proceedings were afterwards taken by her and her husband, both in the ecclesiastical court and at common law, which failed, and she was enjoined by this Court from taking any further proceedings for the recovery of the real estate. On the 13th of January 1851 she obtained leave to present a petition of re-hearing of the decree or order of the 14th of February 1833, and on the 29th of January she obtained an order for setting it down. On the 29th of May the order of the 13th of January for a re-hearing was discharged, on the ground of the acquiescence of the heiress in the former proceedings, and the petition was ordered to be taken off the file. From this last order she appealed. Held, that the heiress-at-law being a married woman could not contract not to have the cause re-heard, nor could she by her conduct be in any way bound, nor could her consent inserted in the order of the 14th of February 1833 in any way prejudice her right.

Held, also, that the petition of re-hearing must be restored to the file.

Held, further (on the re-hearing), that the decree of the 14th of February 1833 must be varied by striking out the consent of the heiress-at-law, and adding words reserving to her, if she should survive her husband, and to her heirs if she should die in his lifetime, the right to dispute the will ; but

Held, also, that although the decree was inoperative against the heiress-at-law to bind her inheritance, it was conclusive as against the husband as tenant by the courtesy to the extent of his estate ; the decree being, in fact, a bargain that all his and his wife's costs, to which he was alone liable, should be costs in the cause, he agreeing that they would no longer dispute the will.

The suit in this case was instituted, on the 3rd of October 1829, by the children of Mrs. Mary Ann Meryweather, all of whom were then infants, by their next friend, against the trustees of the will of Mr. William Turner, that lady's father, and against that lady and Mr. William S. Meryweather her husband, which, after alleging her to be heiress-at-law and customary heiress, prayed that the same will might be established and the trusts carried into execution under the decree of the Court. During the litigation a great variety of proceedings were taken in different jurisdictions, but the facts chronologically arranged may be stated in a moderate compass. The testator's will was dated on the 19th of September 1829, and by it he devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate to certain trustees for the benefit of the children of Mrs. Meryweather, his daughter and only child. He bequeathed to her a sum of 500*l.* and an annuity of 500*l.* a year during the joint lives of herself and her husband, and an annuity of 1,000*l.* in lieu of it if she should survive him. The testator also affected to deal with the guardianship of his daughter's children, by directing their removal from the care of their father and mother, and he gave peculiar directions as to the mode of payment of the annuity to her. He appointed the trustees his executors.

A caveat was immediately entered on behalf of Mrs. Meryweather; but no further proceedings being taken, probate passed of the will and a codicil on the same day as the original bill was filed. Mr. and Mrs. Meryweather appeared and answered jointly, admitting the due execution of the will and codicil. The trustees, on her application, paid the legacy of 500*l.* She and her husband presented a petition in the cause for payment of the annuity of 500*l.* a year, and the same was ordered accordingly and paid. With a view to dispute the validity of the will on the ground of the testator's insanity, Mr. and Mrs. Meryweather, in her right as heiress-at-law, in Michaelmas term, 1829, brought an action of ejectment against the trustees, and after appearance and notice of trial, and countermand of it, the action was discontinued and the plaintiffs were ordered to pay the costs.

The cause came on for hearing on the 25th of January 1832, when, on the application of Mrs. Meryweather, an issue devisavit vel non was directed, the adult plaintiffs to be plaintiffs at law, and the heiress-at-law and her husband to be defendants. Leave was also given to the trustees to attend by counsel and examine witnesses in support of the will, although they were not directed to be parties on the record. The plaintiffs withdrew the record just on the eve of the trial, and the trustees applied to the Court, and on the 27th of November 1832 an order was made substituting them as plaintiffs in the action, and the trial was appointed for the 19th of February 1833. The next important step taken by the heiress-at-law and her husband was a petition of appeal from this order, presented in December 1832, praying that the adult plaintiffs might be continued plaintiffs at law, and that the petitioners might have leave to examine them, but the petition was dismissed. Before the trial, and on the 5th of February 1833, a petition (the groundwork of the present application) was presented in the cause by Mr. and Mrs. Meryweather, which alleged that the testator was at the time of the execution of his will and codicil under the influence of persons hostile to his daughter and her husband, who, taking advantage of his impaired state of mind, compelled him to make such will and codicil, and "that your petitioners have been guided throughout the before-mentioned proceedings in opposing the said will and codicil from a deep sense of injury, and from the conviction of the necessity for your petitioners to clear their characters from the imputations conveyed by the said will and codicil, more particularly as the said testator has therein directed that the guardianship of your petitioners' children shall be removed from them; that your petitioners' said children have always lived on terms of the greatest affection; that the said testator has directed the payment of the said annuity of 500*l.* to your petitioner Mary Ann Meryweather in a way degrading to the feelings of herself and her said husband; that your petitioners have at the urgent request of the said (the three adult children and plaintiffs) consented and agreed to withdraw all further opposition to the said will and codicil, the said (adult children and plaintiffs) being willing and desirous that the expenses hitherto incurred by your petitioners in preparing for the said trial should be allowed to your petitioners as costs in the cause." This petition then prayed that the order of the 25th of January 1832, directing the issue devisavit vel non, and the order of the 27th of November 1832, substituting the trustees as plaintiffs in the issue might be discharged, and that the costs of and relating to the issue, and of the said application, and consequent thereupon, might be costs in the cause as between solicitor and client, the "petitioners hereby undertaking to admit the validity of the said will and codicil of the said testator, and submitting to have the trusts thereof performed and carried into effect under the direction of this honourable Court."

This petition came on for hearing, together with the cause, upon further directions, on the 14th of February 1833, when a decree or order was made in the cause and on the petition, which was prefaced by the words "the said Mary Ann Meryweather, the heiress-at-law and customary heiress of the said testator, by counsel, consenting that the said orders of the 25th of January and the 27th of November 1832 be discharged," the same were ordered to be discharged accordingly; and it was declared that the will and codicil were well proved, and it was declared that they be established, and the trusts thereof be performed and carried into execution. The costs were then ordered, as prayed by the petition, to be taxed, and when taxed to be paid in the manner therein mentioned. Matters remained in this state for ten years; when, in March 1843, Mr. and Mrs. Meryweather cited the executors to prove the will in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, but the executors were dismissed from further attendance, that Court being of opinion that the conduct of the heiress-at-law and her husband in the proceedings in Chancery had barred them from such proceeding, but the costs were ordered to be paid out of the estate. The executors were again cited in the same court by one of the daughters of Mrs. Meryweather in April 1844, and subsequently the will and codicil were, on the 10th of March 1846, pronounced duly proved, all proceedings against the executors having been abandoned. An act of parliament was, in 1845, applied for to enable the granting of building leases, the petition for which was signed by Mrs. Meryweather, and the same was passed with a saving clause extending to the rights of that lady and her heirs. In 1846 and in 1849 she and her husband brought other actions of ejectment against the trustees, and in March 1850 an injunction was granted by the Vice Chancellor of England to restrain them from proceeding with any action already commenced or prosecuting any other action of ejectment for the recovery of any part of the real estate of the testator devised to the trustees, or from in any manner litigating or disputing the validity of the will and codicil. The late Master of the Rolls, Lord Langdale, on the 13th of January 1851 (reported 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 112), gave Mrs. Meryweather leave to present by her next friend a petition of re-hearing of the decree or order of the 14th of February 1833, and on the 29th of the same month of January she obtained an order for setting the same down. The trustees on the 29th of May following moved, before the present Master of the Rolls, Sir John Romilly, to discharge the order of the 13th of January 1851, and that the petition of re-hearing might be taken off the file. His Honour (1) granted the

(1) The judgment of the Master of the Rolls was partly as follows:—"This is a motion made by the trustees of the will of Mr. Turner, deceased, to discharge an order made by Lord Langdale on the 13th of January 1851, permitting a petition of re-hearing to be presented, to re-hear an order pronounced on the 14th of February 1833; and the motion also asks that the petition presented in consequence of that permission should be taken off the file, and that the costs of the motion should be paid by the petitioner or her next friend. * * Although there are a great number of cases in which undoubtedly the wife is not bound by the proceedings that take place by her husband, yet I think upon the present occasion there is no such state of affairs, and she is not at liberty to make use of that argument. She might have proceeded, as she now proceeds, as soon as she had notice of the order, to seek to re-hear that order, if she said she was not bound by it. She does not dispute that she had notice of the order from the time when it was made; she says she did not understand the effect of it; but the effect of it was express, the order stating that the heiress-at-law admits the will and that the will is to be carried into effect, and the trusts of it duly executed. There is no technical or legal language difficult of comprehension there, nothing which is not obvious to any person's understanding. Any person endowed with ordinary common sense must know, that admitting a will, submitting to perform its trusts, and to have the trusts of it carried into execution, is inconsistent with the contestmotion on the ground of the acquiescence of Mrs. Meryweather in the decree or order of the 14th of February 1833, and the petition was accordingly taken off the file.

Mrs. Meryweather now appealed from this last order, and on the hearing of that appeal the Lords Justices offered, in order to save expense, that if they should be of opinion that the petition of re-hearing should be restored to the file, they would themselves hear and dispose of it, instead of the same being sent again to some other branch of the Court,—an offer which was at ing or setting aside that will. I think it must be taken as if she had knowledge of the proceeding. If she was not bound by the petition, she might have taken the step which she now proposes to take. * * Now, considering the lapse of time that has occurred, and the loss of evidence that may possibly arise in so great a length of time, particularly on a subject of so much difficulty as the sanity of a testator, it would be under very peculiar circumstances that I should think myself justified in allowing an heiress-at-law, who had not acted upon a permission to contest first given so long since as twenty years ago, to obtain the assistance of the Court for doing that which ought to have been done so long before; especially, when I find an order expressly made directing the will to be established, and declaring that the costs of all parties by a species of arrangement should be paid at that time upon the footing and upon the apparent understanding that there was to be no further litigation on the subject. That has been acted upon ever since. This lady must have been aware of the effect of that order, and of the consequences of it, and any steps that were proper to be taken ought to have been taken long ago. Taking all these things into consideration I am satisfied I could not do a worse act than allow the matter to be re-heard on the present occasion. It is said that the matter for re-hearing is for error patent on the face of the decree. I do not think that makes any substantial variation with respect to the particular matter alleged; nor am I satisfied that it is so, for the error, if any, is, that counsel appeared and consented that the order should be discharged, when, in fact, no such counsel did appear; at least that is the most favourable way for the petitioner to state that matter. I am not satisfied, nor is there anything to shew me, what actually took place on the occasion. It is possible, that upon that occasion the Court might have said that it was necessary that counsel should appear, and consent that the order should be discharged, and that thereupon one of the counsel might have been instructed, and might have given such consent. I think in that case it would have been sufficient. I am of opinion that I ought not to permit the petition to be re-heard. I think that the motion must be granted to the extent of ordering the order made by Lord Langdale to be discharged, and taking the petition off the file."

once accepted. As this report is confined to the important question whether a married woman, heiress-at-law, can by contract, or conduct, or consent, bind herself and her heirs in a suit relating to her inheritance, it may be as well here to mention that at the hearing of the appeal to discharge the order of the 29th of May 1851, several objections were taken to the petition, and among them that it was not properly entitled; but an offer being made to reform it in that respect, and it being shewn that the objection was not taken at the Rolls, it was held to be immaterial. It was also objected that the petition stated too much; but it being shewn that no relief was grounded on that fact, the Court overruled the objection, considering that the only way it could be material would be on the question of costs if the petition should be heard; and it was further objected that the petition in referring to the act of parliament as to the building leases did not state enough, but both their Lordships concurred in thinking that the title of the statute being stated was sufficient to give the Court cognizance of its contents, and all parties were agreed that, whatever might be the decision on the appeal, what had been done under the act of parliament was to stand. Upon these several points the case of Wood v. Griffith (2) was cited, and commented on.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Villiers appeared for Mrs. Meryweather.

Mr. Rolt, Mr. Roundell Palmer, Mr. Wright, Mr. Hardy, and Mr. J. V. Prior, for the other parties.

Davenport v. Stafford (3) and several of the cases there collected, Hargrave v. Hargrave (4), and Gwynne v. Edwards (5) were cited and relied on in opposition.

Upon the hearing of the motion to discharge the order of the Master of the Rolls removing the petition of re-hearing from the file, their Lordships delivered judgment, which was, save only as to the points before adverted to, as follows:—

(2) 1 Mer. 35.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—A bill was filed in this case, among other purposes, to establish a will, against the heiress-at-law, who was a married woman. It came on to be heard, and then the only decree, if it was a decree, was to direct an issue. An order was subsequently made, upon the application of the trustees of the will, that they should be made parties to the issue, as I understand, in the place of some children of the lady who were to have been parties. That I understand to have been the nature of the order. Before that was tried, a petition was presented by the husband of the lady, in the names of himself and his wife, which is, in some respects, very remarkable, for it does not state the conviction either of the husband or of the wife that the will was a good one; it states that they had been induced to abandon the opposition to a bad will at the request of the children, and for a pecuniary consideration, namely, the payment of certain costs, in which alone the husband could be interested, and not the wife. This was in effect a money payment to him. That petition having been filed came on with the cause, and thereupon a decree, or decretal order, was made in conformity with that application, and which, I suppose, provides that the costs may be paid in the same way—the way I have mentioned—that is, that the bargain may be performed. If that is not a sale by the husband of the wife's right I do not know what it is. With regard to this lady's consent by counsel, it may be said that the consent of a married woman by her counsel, distinct from her husband, she having been defended with him and by him, and not separately, is matter of mere nonsense, and perhaps it is. Perhaps it is utterly without meaning; but if it has any meaning, it is wrong, because she could not so consent; she is entitled, therefore, to have the matter set right, because it is contrary to the law of the country. She has a right, whether the words inserted in the decree are mere nonsense or not, to have them struck out, as being contrary to the known and established law of the country. The words intimating her consent by counsel were inserted in the order, I am convinced, without the knowledge of the learned Judge whose order it purports to be, and without having his attention called to it. This is not the first instance in my experience in which parties have drawn down great mischief on themselves by altering the order according to their own fashion and views without the knowledge of the Court. But assume the order to be all that it seems, then the case comes to this, that the husband abandons the right to have an issue to try the validity of the will as to the freehold estates in fee simple of his wife's ancestors. It has been said that the husband is dominus litis; that he has the entire conduct of the cause; and that the wife is bound effectually, and for ever, by what the husband has done. Now that undoubtedly is a most serious proposition, considering the guard with which the law in this country in general surrounds a married woman as to her real estate. It is not, however, for me to deny that there may be cases in which the husband, by his manner of conducting a cause, may so bind the right of his wife as to her real estate. There may be such cases; but is this one? It is not one in which the husband has said, "I conduct this cause for myself, I feel that I have no defence, and I give it up." He says, "There is no will at all; my children, or some of them, wish me to give up the suit; I am offered certain money terms for the purpose, and, therefore, I give it up." What is that more or less than a sale? It is so in other words, and in mere words; but, substantially, I do not observe the difference. Then, if all these considerations were otherwise, is this a kind of point to be decided, not on a re-hearing—not in the ordinary way in which important questions are decided by the Court—but on an application to prevent a petition of re-hearing from being heard,—the closing of the doors of the court against the wife because something has been done which the Court decides is an answer to her claim? There may be cases in which it is right to do so. There have been, indeed, cases in which Judges of the highest authority have directed petitions of re-hearing to be taken off the file. Undoubtedly such cases may occur. The case ought to be very clear for that purpose, and not, as I think, with great deference, in a case of this description, where there is so much to be argued. Without, therefore, giving any opinion whether the issue will, if directed, succeed; or whether the issue will be directed at all; whether there is any foundation, or a total absence of foundation, for the petition of re-hearing, my impression is, that everything that is to be said against the petition of re-hearing ought to be said when it shall come on as a cause, either on the materials existing in the cause and on the petition of re-hearing alone, or upon that proceeding, coupled with such other proceeding, if any, as those opposed to it may think fit to institute. Although, therefore, the Master of the Rolls, in stopping the proceeding in limine, has done that which is substantially the best thing in the world for all parties concerned, I am of opinion, with great deference to him, that the matter must be discussed at a later stage; and, therefore, I think the petition of re-hearing should be restored to the file.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH. — I am of the same opinion. I give no opinion as to what will be the result of the re-hearing of the petition, either with reference to the particular facts of this case or the general question, as to how far the husband, conducting his wife's defence, by his act has bound her inheritance, which is a very important question, and upon which, I repeat, I express no opinion at all. What his Honour the Master of the Rolls seems to have done, and I think, with all respect for him, erroneously done, is, that he considered this as a point to be discussed on the preliminary question whether the parties should be allowed to re-hear or not. The authorities which it would seem his Honour mainly relied upon were two or three cases before Lord Langdale, which I think proceeded on totally different principles. I allude particularly to Davenport v. Stafford, Hargrave v. Hargrave, and Gwynne v. Edwards; all which cases proceeded on this ground:—"Assume," it was said, "that the re-hearing is a matter of right upon the certificate of counsel, or so much a matter of right that, prima facie, the right is admitted; yet a party, after a decree, may so conduct himself that this Court will say, 'It is inequitable to let you present a petition of re-hearing at all.'" For instance, suppose a decree were made that gave benefits to each party, and that after that decree was made, one of those parties, A, says to B, the other party, "Let me have no more disputes about it, I will execute a release to you of all claims whatsoever." It is done for valuable consideration. And if afterwards that party giving that release were to ask to have the matters re-heard, the principles on which Lord Langdale proceeded would apply. They went to this extent: "There is injustice, and you have precluded yourself from any right of re-hearing; just as if you had done that before the original hearing, you would have afforded ground of defence, and it is not just that you should now be allowed to re-hear." I have put the case of a party to a release, or by contract, which would be the same thing, actually debarring himself. This extends that doctrine somewhat further, but not further than principle requires and renders just. Lord Langdale said, "If, by your conduct, you have so dealt that the parties might infer that you never meant to question that decree, you shall not afterwards be allowed to have it re-heard." That was the principle on which his Lordship went in those cases. Now, suppose that doctrine to be most correct, that a party may by his conduct prevent himself from the right to re-hear, how does that apply to the case of a married woman, who cannot contract, and, therefore, cannot by contract conduct herself in such a way as that? Is she to be dealt with as if she had contracted? In my opinion, it is impossible for a married woman by contract to prevent herself from having the right to have her cause re-heard; so neither can she do so by her conduct. It appears to me that the distinction was not sufficiently directed to the attention of his Honour in dealing with this case. From the very short note that was handed up, it appears that his Honour relied upon those cases, and dwelt very much upon the knowledge that must have been in the mind of Mrs. Meryweather as to what had been done, and that therefore she ought to be bound. Assume her knowledge to have been as perfect as possible—assume that she had had a copy of the decree, and released all further demands, in my opinion it would have been an act perfectly inoperative; and I do not think that her conduct could have put her in a different situation. It appears to me that the cases relied upon did not warrant the judgment of his Honour, and that as there is nothing to take this case out of the ordinary rule that a party to a cause has a right to have the same re-heard, this petition must be restored to the file. The order of the Master of the Rolls will be reversed, but all costs will be reserved until after the re-hearing or until further order, and all parties will have liberty to apply.

The petition of re-hearing having been argued, by the same counsel, for Mrs. Meryweather, the following opinion was stated by—

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—This case comes before the Court under very peculiar, indeed, under very extraordinary, circumstances. It is not necessary to say whether, where there is an adjudication of the validity of a will of freehold estate in a case where the heiress is a married woman, that adjudication can be questioned by her on the ground that she was a married woman at the time, or by her heir on that ground, after the coverture shall have determined, where there has been or where there has not been a trial at law. Cases of that description we desire to leave totally untouched, considering that this is not one of them. Subject to any observation upon that point which those who oppose the present application are desirous of making, we consider at present that this is a case in which there has not been substantially an adjudication of the will, inasmuch as that point was retired from by the husband when he had charge of the case. He, for himself and his wife, retired, not on the ground that the will was good—not on the ground that if the contest proceeded the result would be favourable to the will—but on the ground that, though the will was a bad one, there were reasons and inducements which led him, the husband, having the conduct of the cause, to think it was better that the will, though a bad will, should be established. We are at present, therefore, disposed to think, subject to what we may hear, that it ought to be left open to the wife or her heirs, hereafter to make what she can of that point, but that, during the life of the husband, the estate is effectually bound; so that during his life, he being tenant by the courtesy, there cannot be a trial; and, therefore, subject to dealing with this case more unfavourably to those who support the application, after hearing those who oppose it, if they still desire to be heard, what we at present purpose to do is, to vary the decree or order of the 14th of February 1833 by striking out “and the consent of Mary Ann Meryweather,” and inserting at the end of it the following words—“That this decree or order is to be without prejudice to any suit or question which may be instituted or raised as to the validity of the said will, and accordingly the said Mary Ann Meryweather, her heirs and assigns, are to be at liberty to institute, prosecute, or make any suit, proceeding, or application which they may be advised after the death of the said William Stevens Meryweather, for the purpose of recovering the real estate of the said testator, on the ground that he left the said Mary Ann Meryweather his heiress-at-law, and of disputing the validity, as to the real estate devised, of the said will.”

Mr. Roundell Palmer, Mr. Rolt, Mr. J. V. Prior, and Mr. Hardy, were then heard in opposition, and cited Jackson v. Barry (6).

Mr. Villiers was heard in reply.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—This is a case which though we believe practically to be of no importance at all, opens a number of very difficult and somewhat curious questions, namely, as to the rights of a husband as dominus liti in a suit in which his wife's inheritance is interested. There seems to be very great authority for saying (and all convenience and all analogy to the old proceeding in respect of real actions would seem to shew, by reasoning à priori, that this is the state of the law) that if there is a suit against the husband and wife in respect of the wife's inheritance, and the wife does not, or the husband and wife do not, at the time desire to have an issue, the Court may declare the will to be proved just as if she was not a married woman. All convenience, I say, seems to require it. I cannot remember any case having come under my own experience, but if I had been asked the question I should have said it was just the same with a married woman as with any one else, and that if she does not claim she must be bound by it. Mr. Walker, who is a Registrar of very great experience, states it as his impression, that it is very frequently done. He has brought us a note of two cases, and one was distinctly a case (7) in which that has been done; but on looking at the Registrar's book, singularly enough, the decree does not seem to have been entered; but, although the decree was not entered, there was an order made afterwards reciting it, and some directions given upon some interlocutory order about costs. If it had been absolutely necessary to decide that, for myself I should probably have wished more time to make some further search. But even assuming it to be the law that if the wife, or the husband acting for the wife, does not claim an issue at the time the cause comes to a hearing, the wife is bound, in this case an issue was directed.

Then arises the dry question—an issue having under these circumstances been directed, the husband afterwards presents a petition to vary that order and to get rid of the issue—can he do that? Now, in my opinion, he cannot; that is a different proceeding altogether. He did not think fit to claim an issue; and the wife having obtained the benefit of an issue, he thinks fit afterwards, on her behalf, to compromise the suit. The result of this matter appears to me to be that the husband could not by his petition get rid of the right that the wife had acquired in 1832. If the husband could not do it by his own petition alone, he could not make it at all better by joining the wife as co-petitioner, still less can it be entered on the decree that she had consented. It is merely a superfluity of words that mean nothing. It is in truth the husband's petition. What is the effect of the order that was made on that petition of the husband joining the wife with him? I believe we both are of opinion that although inoperative in binding the inheritance as against the wife, it must be conclusive as against the husband. Indeed, it is hardly necessary to determine that, because he was a party afterwards to an order which expressly proceeded on that footing, and the consequence of that is, that he is for ever bound. He being tenant by the courtesy, and therefore entitled sub modo during his own life, he has bound that inheritance, whether there was or was not a good will. He is bound to act on the footing of its being a valid will so long as he lives. Then the question arises whether we ought not to provide that the wife, or those who come after her, shall not be precluded from disputing that will after the husband's death. We think that we ought to make such a provision, that if, upon his death, Mrs. Meryweather, if she should then be alive, or her heir if she should be then dead, should be minded to dispute this will, they should not be prejudiced by the act of the husband in having got rid of the order that was made in 1832 for the trial of an issue as to the validity of that will, but that they ought to have the same right as if the order of 1833 had never been made. I think the course we ought to pursue is that proposed originally by my learned Brother, namely, to vary the order of 1833 by striking out that it was by the consent of Mary Ann Meryweather, and inserting a provision that it is to be without prejudice to any suit or proceeding by her after the death of her husband, if she should survive him, and if she should not survive him, then her heir-at-law, if he should think fit to dispute the validity of the will (8).

(8) March 20.—The order finally made was as follows:—"Vary the decree or order of the 14th of February 1833 by striking out the consent of Mary Ann Meryweather, and inserting at the end of it the following words—"That the decree or order is to be without prejudice to any suit or question which, after the death of the said William Stevens Meryweather, may be instituted or raised by the said Mary Ann Meryweather, her heirs or assigns, as to the validity of the will and codicil, or either of them: and accordingly the said Mary Ann Meryweather, her heirs and assigns, are to be at liberty to institute, prosecute, or make any suit, proceeding, or application that they may be advised after the death of the said William Stevens Meryweather, for the purpose of recovering the real Taxation—Order of Course—Practice—What Statements necessary—Order at Law on Terms, Non-compliance with—Action on Bills—Judgment.

The non-compliance with an order, made upon terms at law, to tax a solicitor's bill of costs, and the failure of other proceedings at law to obtain renewed orders, are facts which ought to have been stated when applying for an order of course to tax a solicitor's bills of costs in equity; and the omission to state those facts is a ground for discharging the order, though the party might be entitled to an order upon a special application.

How far a judgment signed at law for default will prevent the obtaining an order of course in this court: and whether such order, if granted, will not stay execution on such judgment—quære.

This was a motion, by Mr. Gedye, to discharge an order of course, dated the 24th of January 1852, for the taxation of five bills of costs, on the ground that the question had already been adjudicated upon by a Court of competent jurisdiction, and because the order had been obtained upon a suppression of facts.

The governors and guardians of the poor of St. Mary, Newington, in the county of Surrey, had employed Mr. Gedye as their solicitor in several matters, and in getting an act of parliament relating to Walworth Common, 14 & 15 Vict. c. vii. The facts stated upon the affidavit were, that on the 13th of January 1852, Mr. Gedye brought an action against the governors and guardians of the poor of St. Mary, Newington, to recover 1,017*l.* 19*s.* 7*d.* the balance due upon five bills delivered, and which was indorsed upon the writ of summons.

On the 14th of June 1851 Mr. Gedye delivered his bill of costs for parliamentary estates of the said testator, on the ground that he left the said Mary Ann Meryweather his heiress-at-law, and of disputing the validity, as to real estate, of the said will and codicil or either of them. The costs of all parties consequent upon the petition of re-hearing, including the costs of the trustees' motion at the Rolls, to take the petition off the file &c. and of the appeal to discharge the order of the Master of the Rolls thereon, to be costs in the cause."

business, which was sent to the taxing officer of the House of Commons, who certified such bill at the sum of 1,185*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* That the bill, including the parliamentary agent's costs, and adding thereto the costs allowed for taxing the same, was less only by 12*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*

On the 19th of November 1851 Mr. Gedye delivered five other bills of costs, amounting to 755*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, with a cash account giving credit for sums received, which shewed the balance of 1,017*l.* 19*s.* 7*d.*

On the 27th of November 1851 the board passed a resolution to tax the bills.

On the 16th of December 1851 a summons was taken out in the Court of Queen's Bench, and served on Mr. Gedye to tax the whole of his bills of costs.

On the 18th of December 1851 this summons was attended before Mr. Justice Coleridge, who ordered that on payment, without prejudice, of 500*l.* to Mr. Gedye in a fortnight, his bills of fees and disbursements in the causes and matters delivered to the governors and guardians be referred to the Master to be taxed, and that Mr. Gedye give credit for all sums of money by him received from or on account of the governors and guardians, and that Mr. Gedye do refund what, if anything, he might on such taxation appear to have been over-paid; the Master to be at liberty to adopt the taxation of the officer of the House of Commons to the bill of 1,185*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.*, and the taxation not to extend to any bill paid. And he further ordered the Master to tax the costs of the reference, and certify what should be found due to or from either party in respect of such bill and demand, and the costs of such reference to be paid according to the event of such taxation, pursuant to the statute; and that Mr. Gedye be restrained from commencing or prosecuting any action or suit touching such demand pending such reference. And he further ordered that upon payment by the governors and guardians of what (if anything) might appear to be due, Mr. Gedye should deliver to the governors and guardians, or their attorney, all deeds, books, papers and writings in his possession, custody, or power belonging to them.

One of the bills ordered to be taxed was indorsed "General Bill," and was the bill mentioned in the summons taken out in the Court of Exchequer, and served upon Mr. Gedye on the 9th of January 1852.

The 500*l.* was not paid in compliance with the order, and on the 3rd of January 1852 Mr. Gedye wrote requesting payment of his bill.

On the 9th of January 1852 a summons was taken out in the Court of Exchequer to tax the bill of costs indorsed "General Bill"; but, on the 12th of January 1852, it was dismissed, by Mr. Baron Platt, with costs, upon the ground of the existence of the previous order of Mr. Justice Coleridge.

On the 13th of January 1852 Mr. Gedye issued a writ of summons, and served it on the clerk of the guardians.

On the 16th of January 1852 the governors and guardians caused a summons for particulars of demand to be issued and served upon Mr. Gedye, which, on the 19th of January 1852, was dismissed, by Mr. Justice Talfourd, with 6*s.* 8*d.* costs.

On the 27th of January 1852 no pleas having been filed to the declaration in the action, final judgment was signed by Mr. Gedye for the amount of his demand in the action of debt. At that time the order obtained on the 24th of January 1852 in this court to tax the several bills had not been served.

On the 27th of January 1852 the governors and guardians obtained a rule to plead several matters.

The judgment signed by Mr. Gedye recovered a sum of 262*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* beyond the amount of the several bills of costs set out in the order of the 24th of January, the aggregate amount of which bills was 755*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*

Holland v. Gwynne, 8 Beav. 124.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Hardy, for the respondents.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. — The grounds stated for this application are two-fold: first, that there had been in fact a judgment obtained at law for the amount of the bill at the time when the order to tax was obtained; and, second, that the omission to state that three several applications had been made to the courts of common law for the purpose, one of which had been granted upon terms and the other two refused: the one granted upon terms abandoned, and two subsequent ones applied for afterwards, or rather I may say, one applied for since and refused, was a reason why the order of course should not have been obtained. The rules and principles on which orders of course are obtained, originally appear to have been a little unsettled, but were finally settled by Lord Langdale; and I have adopted the rule he laid down, that in applying for an order of course it is incumbent on the party who applies to adopt the same rule that would be acted upon if he were asking the Court to grant an injunction ex parte; that he must state every fact to the officer to whom he applies, which can be material to the matter, in order to enable the officer to judge whether it really is a proper case for an order of course: if he do not do so, and there are special matters affecting the question whether he ought to have an order of course or not, and those are not mentioned, the Court will not stay to inquire whether, in fact, if a special application had been made, he would have been allowed to have an order to tax the bill; but if it be a matter of sufficient moment and sufficient importance to require grave consideration or discussion, then the officer would not have granted the order of course; it would have been necessary to have made a special application, and the Court would then have decided on the propriety of taxing the bill. And where there is a matter of that description not stated, and by reason of the non-statement of it, the applicant has obtained an order of course, which he could not have obtained except by the non-statement—I do not use the word "suppression" in any harsh sense, but by the suppression—of that fact, in all those cases, even though on a special application he might be entitled to the order, the Court will not allow the order of course to stand. I have so decided on more than one occasion, and I am satisfied it is the rule that ought to prevail. I have, therefore, now to consider whether the facts suppressed were of sufficient moment and importance to warrant the Court in saying that they ought to have been gravely discussed.

The first which I shall mention is the fact of a judgment having been obtained. I am of opinion that the judgment having been obtained in the manner it was obtained here, was not a matter to make it necessary. It might be proper to mention it, but I have no doubt that the officer would have granted the order of course, although there had been the judgment, for this reason, the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. is precise on this point; it says, there shall be an order of course to tax within twelve months after the delivery of the bill. The order is different within one month and within the remaining eleven months, but still it is an order of course to tax within twelve months after the delivery of the bill; and then it states "provided always that no such reference shall be directed after a verdict shall have been obtained, or a writ of inquiry executed in any action for the recovery of the demand of such attorney or solicitor." Consequently, the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. provides that this order of course shall go in every case where there has either not been a verdict or not been a writ of inquiry, but the verdict of course is in those cases where there is a contested action; but when the judgment goes by default, in every case there is a writ of inquiry to assess the amount of damages; consequently it is, I apprehend, perfectly clear that the words "writ of inquiry executed" were put in for the purpose of shewing that a mere judgment obtained by the party was not to prevent the party obtaining the order of course.

Mr. Roupell.—The judgment was after the date of the order.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I understand that; but I have decided in your favour on this part of the case. The date of the order was on Saturday, the 24th of January, and the judgment was, in fact, signed on Tuesday, the 27th of January; but I am of opinion, that even if the judgment had previously been obtained, it was not a matter of moment. The order was served on the day, a short time after the judgment had been signed, but it was a judgment by default for want of a plea; and I am of opinion that as there was no writ of inquiry executed, nor could there have been, which must take place in every case of judgment by default, the mere circumstance of the judgment, if the other circumstances are the same, is not a sufficient reason for withholding the order of course. I explain this rather the more fully because the word "judgment" appears in some of the cases, where it is evident that the word "judgment" is used as the judgment obtained subsequent to a verdict. The verdict for an amount of damages on a solicitor's bill of costs precedes the judgment; the judgment is only obtained in consequence of that.

Mr. Collier.—Will your Honour allow me to say that the judgment in an action of debt is final: there is no writ of inquiry in the case.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—There may be no writ of inquiry at all.

Mr. Collier.—Not in an action of debt; the judgment is final at once.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I certainly have considered that in every case where judgment went by default (having made inquiries on the subject), there would have been a writ of inquiry executed. Still I should not, on that ground, have considered that the fact of judgment having gone by default would have rendered the order of course that was obtained improper, the fact being that there had been no inquiry into the amount of the debt at this time, as there would have been in the case of a verdict or in the case of a writ of inquiry executed, which, I think, is what the clause meant to refer to.

With respect to the other part of the case, I am of opinion that it is a material circumstance, which ought to have been stated. I do not, at this moment, understand why the application was made to a court of common law which does not grant orders of course to tax, instead of coming to this court: nor do I exactly understand upon what grounds Mr. Justice Coleridge made an order that the taxation should only be allowed on payment of the sum of 500*l.*; undoubtedly, if there were nothing else in the matter prior to obtaining that order, the clients might have come here and obtained a taxation of Mr. Gedy's bill.

Now, the subsequent proceedings, before Mr. Baron Platt, proceeded solely upon the ground that an order had been made by Mr. Justice Coleridge, which had not been acted upon. I do not now inquire into whether that would be sufficient to induce this Court not to tax the bill. Upon that I particularly wish not only not to express an opinion, but to give no impression that I think would prevent the bill from being taxed; but I am satisfied that this was a matter of sufficient importance to have it mentioned to the officer that there had been an application made to a Court of competent jurisdiction to tax the bill, which taxation had been refused; and if that had been so named, the officer would not have given the ordinary order of course to tax the bill, but that it would have been necessary to come to the Court to make a special application for that purpose; and, therefore, on that, which in fact was the principal ground set forth, without, in the slightest degree, prejudicing any special application that may be made to tax this bill, I am of opinion that this order of course cannot stand, and that it must be discharged, with costs.

Fire Insurance — Remainder-man — Tenant in tail.

In a suit to administer the trusts of a will, the receiver was directed to pay all insurance monies and other outgoings in respect of a particular estate. Certain stables attached to the mansion-house were burned down, and as it was not thought desirable to rebuild them, the money received from the insurance office was paid into court:—Held, that the petitioner, who was afterwards declared by the Court to be tenant in tail of the estate, was entitled to the insurance money, and that it was not to be applied for the benefit of the estate generally.

This petition stated that under the will of Lord Harcourt, W. B. Harcourt was the first tenant in tail of a certain estate called St. Leonard's Hill; that the said W. B. Harcourt during his life insured the mansion-house and out-buildings; that upon his death, which happened in 1849, a suit was instituted to administer the trusts of the will of Lord Harcourt, and by a decree in the cause, dated in April 1849, it was directed that the receiver of the estate should pay out of the rents and profits all rates, taxes, insurance monies, and other outgoings due from time to time in respect of the mansion-house at St. Leonard's Hill; that under this order the receiver continued the insurance and paid the premiums; that in February 1850 the stables and an archway attached to the house were burned down, and the sum of 800*l.* as the value of such stables had been received from the insurance company and paid into court; that by a decree made on the hearing of the suit, it was declared that the St. Leonard's Hill estate was vested in the petitioner L. B. Harcourt, now an infant, as tenant in tail male; and that it had been decided that the stables so burned down should not be rebuilt.

The petition, therefore, prayed that the sum of 800*l.* so paid by the insurance company might be paid over to the account of L. B. Harcourt, the tenant in tail in possession.

Mr. Leach appeared in support of the petition, and contended that the first tenant in tail in possession was entitled to the money paid by the insurance company. The receiver was directed to keep up the insurance, and to pay the premiums out of the rents and profits. It had since been decided that the petitioner was entitled to these rents and profits. A tenant in tail was not bound to insure and was not liable for damage by fire. This insurance was for the benefit of the tenant in tail, and no one else. The premiums were paid out of his income, and he alone was entitled to receive the money.

Mr. Selwyn and Mr. Messiter opposed the petition, on behalf of the remainder-man, and submitted that the insurance money was paid for the benefit of the estate generally. If the stables had been rebuilt the estate would have been benefited by it, and not the tenant in tail. This sum ought, therefore, to be laid out for the improvement of the estate if it were not thought desirable to rebuild the stables.

The case of Norris v. Harrison (1) was cited in support of this argument.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—It appears that by a decree of the Court the receiver was directed to pay the insurances and other outgoings out of the rents and profits of the estate. It is evident that this was done for the convenience of all parties. I think, also, that it must have been intended for the benefit of those parties who should turn out to be interested. The result of the decision of the Court has been, that the petitioner is declared entitled as tenant in tail male in possession. It appears to me that the fair construction to be put upon the transaction is, that the party for whose benefit the insurance was made is the tenant in tail; and the premiums being paid out of the income to which he was entitled, I think he ought to have this fund, and that the petition must be granted.

Will—"And" to be read "or"—Felled Timber—Apportionment of Rent.

A testator bequeathed all the rents and arrears of rent, with timber felled, and other annual profits due to him at the time of his decease, from his Berwick Hill estate, unto the person or persons who should be entitled to the freehold "and" inheritance of the same estate in possession at his decease. On the death of the testator, his brother became tenant for life of this estate:—Held, that the words "freehold and inheritance" must be read "freehold or inheritance," and that the tenant for life was entitled to the rents, &c. specified in the above clause.

Held, also, that the tenant for life was entitled under this bequest to the rents payable from the last quarter day up to the day of the testator's death, and also to certain bricks, tiles, and brick-earth being upon the estate at the death of the testator.

This was a special case, stated for the opinion of the Court, under Vice Chancellor Turner's Act.

(1) 2 Madd. 268.

It stated that by an indenture of release and settlement, dated the 7th of June 1826, a certain estate, called the Berwick Hill estate, was limited after the death of Thomas Stapleton the elder to the use of Thomas Stapleton the younger, for life, with remainder to his sons in tail male, with remainder to the plaintiff, Gilbert Stapleton, for life, with remainder to his sons in tail male, with divers remainders over. That Thomas Stapleton the elder died, and Thomas Stapleton the younger became entitled to the said Berwick Hill estate, and he entered into possession of the rents and profits thereof, and continued in such possession and receipt until his death. That the said Thomas Stapleton the younger, by his will, dated the 30th of January 1841, gave and bequeathed to his executor all his plate marked with the family arms, and all his books, manuscripts, and library, and all other his property of a like nature, in trust, to permit and suffer the same to be held, used, and enjoyed by the person or persons who, for the time being, should be entitled to the freehold or inheritance of the family estate of Stapleton in the county of York, as and in the nature of heir-looms; and the testator declared that no person or persons who should be tenant in tail or in tail male of the said family estate should be entitled to an absolute vested interest in the said legacy, unless he should live to attain the age of twenty-one, or die under that age, leaving issue, but so nevertheless that such tenant in tail should be entitled to the use and enjoyment of the said legacy during his or her minority. The testator then bequeathed his household furniture at his house called "The Grove," at Richmond, to his brother Gilbert Stapleton, absolutely, and other articles particularly specified to his brother John Stapleton, absolutely, and he directed the sum of 1,000*l.*, secured upon mortgage of the Berwick Hill and other estates, to sink into the freehold and inheritance of the said estates, so that they might be absolutely freed and discharged from the said mortgage debt and interest thereon, and the same mortgage and interest might merge in the freehold and inheritance of the said estates. The will then continued—"I bequeath all the rents and arrears of rent, with timber felled and other annual profits due to me at the time of my decease from my Berwick Hill estate, unto the person or persons who shall be entitled to the freehold and inheritance of the same estate in possession on my decease. And as to all the rest, residue, and remainder of my personal estate, whatsoever and where-soever, I bequeath the same unto my brother Henry Stapleton, and the said John Stapleton, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for their absolute use and benefit. And, lastly, I do hereby appoint my brother, the said Gilbert Stapleton, sole executor of this my will."

The testator died a bachelor, in December 1849, and the said Gilbert Stapleton was his next brother, and was unmarried at the date of the will.

At the death of the testator, there was about 1,050*l.* due and owing to him for rent and arrears of rent from the Berwick Hill estate, and there was upon the said estate at the time of his decease a considerable quantity of tiles and bricks, which had been burnt in a kiln upon the estate about a year previously, and had been made of clay taken out of the estate; and also a certain quantity of prepared brick-earth, for the purpose of making bricks, dug out of the estate. The said Henry Stapleton died in the lifetime of the testator, and his will was proved by the plaintiff, Gilbert Stapleton.

The opinion of the Court was required, whether the plaintiff, Gilbert Stapleton, or the defendant, John Stapleton, was entitled to the said rents and arrears of rent of the said Berwick Hill estate, due and owing to the testator at his death, and to the rents from the quarter-day previous to the death of the testator, until his decease, and whether the plaintiff or defendant was entitled to the said bricks and tiles, and the brick-earth and clay.

Mr. Rolé and Mr. Fleming appeared for the plaintiff, and contended that he was entitled to the arrears of rent due from the Berwick Hill estate, under the words "I bequeath all the rents and arrears of rent with timber felled, and other annual profits due to me at the time of my decease from my Berwick Hill estate, unto the person or persons who shall be entitled to the freehold and inheritance of the same estate in possession on my decease." It was true that the plaintiff was only tenant for life, but the words "freehold and inheritance" ought to be read "freehold or inheritance," because if the words were taken as they stood, the word "freehold" would lose its effect, and would be mere surplusage, as the person entitled to the inheritance in possession would be entitled to the freehold—Bell v. Phyn (1). The bequest was to the person or persons who should be entitled to the freehold, which intimated no uncertainty in the testator's mind as to whether there might be any such person or not, which must have been the case if the bequest was to take effect only in favour of a person entitled to an estate of inheritance. It was also contended, that the plaintiff was entitled to an apportionable part of the rents due at the death of the testator from the previous rent-day, and that the plaintiff was entitled to the tiles, bricks, and brick-earth upon the estate at the death of the testator, as they ought to be considered as forming part of the annual profit. The tiles and bricks were only made in small quantities, sufficient for the use of the estate, and had never been sold by the testator. The following cases were also cited for the plaintiff—

Jackson v. Jackson, 1 Ves. sen. 217.

Maberly v. Strode, 3 Ves. 450.

Stubbs v. Sargon, 2 Keen, 255; s. c. 3 M. & C. 507; 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 254.

Wilson v. Bayly, 3 Bro. P.C. 195.

Hepworth v. Taylor, 1 Cox, 112.

Parkin v. Knight, 15 Sim. 83; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 209.

Prebble v. Boghurst, 1 Swanst. 309.

Mr. Bates, for the defendant, contended that the gift of the rent and arrears of rent was void for uncertainty, the uncertainty consisting in this, that there was no person answering the description used by the testator, who was entitled to the freehold and inheritance in possession; the plaintiff, Gilbert Stapleton, being only tenant for life of the estate, and that consequently the legacy lapsed: and that the accruing rents from the last rent-day on which they fell due up to the death of the testator were not apportionable, and if apportionable, then that they could not be considered as rents due at the time of the death of the testator, and therefore did not pass under the bequest.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The first question is, as to the meaning of the description of "person or persons entitled to the freehold and inheritance in possession of my Berwick Hill estate." Looking at the whole will, the testator seems to have intended portions of his property to go in different ways. He contemplated his own dying without issue, though no doubt he might have married and had issue. He made his will with reference to the existing state of circumstances at the date of the will. It appears that all his heirs were brothers, but there were also sisters; each of those persons would take a life estate, after which comes the ultimate limitation. First, as to the plate marked with the family arms; that he desires should go to the person or persons who for the time being should be entitled to the freehold or inheritance of the family estate: he states "for the time being," shewing that he meant the property to go in succession, but about that there is no question. Then, as to the furniture and all other effects; these he gives to his brother Gilbert, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and he gives other chattels to his brother John. Then he gives all his plate and plated articles to his brother John, who was the second in seniority. Then it appears there was a mortgage, which he directs to sink into the estate, in order that it might merge in the freehold and inheritance of the estate. Immediately after that follows the clause upon which the question arises, "I bequeath all the rents and arrears of rent, with timber felled and other annual profits due to me at the time of my decease from my Berwick Hill estate, unto the person or persons who shall be entitled to the freehold and inheritance of the same estate in possession on my decease." If the words "freehold and inheritance" are to receive their natural interpretation, no one could take the rents and arrears of rent except some person who on the death of the testator became entitled in possession to the freehold and inheritance. The only instance in which a person in the singular number could, on the death of the testator, become entitled to the freehold and inheritance would be the case of a brother having died in the lifetime of the testator, leaving a son who would be first tenant in tail; such a person would be entitled to the freehold and inheritance. The only way in which persons in the plural number could be entitled to the freehold and inheritance would be in the event of all the brothers dying in the lifetime of the testator, not leaving issue, and the sisters under the ultimate limitation becoming entitled as tenants in common to the estate. That he might have contemplated either of these events is certainly within the limits of possibility, but it is impossible to say what he meant. The first event involves the fact of Gilbert's being dead at the death of the testator. Now, that is an event which he did not contemplate the possibility of, because he not only gives certain specific articles to him absolutely, but he appoints him his sole executor; and so, though I do not say he might not have made his will on the assumption of the possibility that he should survive Gilbert, still it is improbable that he should have contemplated Gilbert's not taking. It seems to me clear that he meant when he died that the rents which might probably remain due should go to the person who should succeed to the estate; and I am not going beyond the cases which have been cited in holding, that the word "and" should be read "or." It appears to me the error arises in this way; that in the passages preceding this, the words "freehold and inheritance" occurred, and were used correctly, and then continuing that expression to the sentence in question, he used the words by mere inadvertency, instead of using the more accurate language "freehold or inheritance." I think, therefore, that Gilbert Stapleton having survived the testator, is entitled to whatever ought to be held to pass under the description of "all the rents and arrears of rent, with timber felled and other annual profits due to me at the time of my decease from my Berwick Hill estate."

The next question is, what passed under the description "rents and arrears of rent." Now, it appears there was not only some of the half-yearly rents due, but there was also rent on some of the demises accruing due for the current half-year in which the testator died. It is clear, under the Apportionment Act, that where rent is to be apportioned there the legal personal representatives of the testator are entitled to so much of the rent as accrued due from the last half-year; but the question is, whether it did not pass under this particular bequest. In one sense, undoubtedly, this portion of the rent was not due at the time of the testator's decease, but the act says that the executor shall be entitled to it as part of the testator's assets. I do not think, in this case, that it would be reasonable to adhere strictly to the words "due to me;" but I think it may fairly be considered to have been due to the testator when it constitutes part of his assets, and is applicable to his debts, &c. I think, therefore, that the apportioned part of the rent received, on the written instrument, not by parol, did pass under the bequest to the plaintiff.

The only remaining question is, as to the tiles and bricks laid on the soil of the estate and a certain quantity of brick-earth prepared for making bricks at the time of the testator's death. The question is, whether they come under the description of "annual profits." Now, the testator has given a key to the meaning he attributes to the words "annual profits," for he gives all rent and arrears of rent, with timber felled, and other annual profits. The felled timber is not necessarily a yearly profit, but the testator shews that he considers the felled timber was to pass as an annual profit. It appears to me, that there is a close analogy between the timber and the tiles and bricks, and that the plaintiff, who is tenant for life, is entitled to receive the rents annually accruing every year, and is also entitled in succeeding the testator to the bricks, tiles, and earth for making bricks now lying upon the estate.

Whether, under the 7th section of the Trustee Act, 1850, real estate can be ordered to go to uses to bar dower in favour of the cestui que trust—quære.

An estate had been conveyed to uses to bar dower in favour of a purchaser, the legal estate, however, being outstanding in an infant trustee. This was a petition presented under the Trustee Act, 1850, praying for a vesting order under the 7th section, for the purpose of vesting the legal estate in the purchaser.

Mr. Bigg, for the petitioner.

PARKER, V.C. said that he had no objection to make the order so that the legal estate should go to the purchaser in fee. He would not decide that under the section in question an estate could not be directed to go to uses to bar dower in favour of the purchaser, but he would not decide that it could without further consideration.

Trustee Act, 1850—Vesting Order.

A mortgage in fee was made of real estate. The mortgagor died, having devised the estate to an infant. A claim of foreclosure was filed by the mortgagee against the infant, and an order for sale was made therein. A petition for a vesting order, under the 7th section of the Trustee Act, 1850, was dismissed, on the ground of its being unnecessary.

A mortgage in fee was made of real estate. The mortgagor died, having by his will devised the mortgaged property to an infant in tail, with divers remainders over. The mortgagee filed a claim of foreclosure against the infant devisee, and an order for the sale of the property was made in the claim, and the property was sold accordingly.

A petition was now presented, under the Trustee Act, 1850, praying that the infant's estate might be vested in the purchaser, under the 7th section.

Mr. Eddis, for the petitioner, referred to Radcliffe v. Eccles (1).

PARKER, V.C. said that he thought that, as the mortgagee had the legal estate, and as all the equitable interests were provided for by the order made in the claim, nothing further was required. He thought that the order prayed for would make the purchaser's title worse, instead of better. As the order was unnecessary, and, if granted, might throw a doubt on titles where, in similar cases, no such order had been made, he should refuse the prayer of the petition.

 1852. } KENT v. JACKSON.
 Mar. 19, 20, 22. }

Foreign Railway—English Directors—Return of Deposits—Managing Committee—Purchase back of allotted Shares—Discharge.

A railway company in Belgium was established as a "société anonyme." There were English and foreign directors. Deposits on allotted shares were paid into the bankers. Disputes took place between the English and Belgian directors, in consequence of which all the former resigned. In the following month J. and G, two of the English directors, to whose account the deposits had been paid, returned the deposits to all the allottees who were willing to take them, and they also purchased back some shares, which had been allotted, for the benefit of the company. Accounts of all this were laid before the committee of management, and the balance remaining in the hands of the English directors was paid over, and the transactions were approved by a general meeting. A shareholder filed a bill on behalf of himself and all the other shareholders not defendants, against J, the assignees of G, and the committee of management, praying the repayment of the money returned to the allottees, and for an account, but the bill was dismissed at the Rolls, and on appeal, the decree was affirmed; the Court holding that by the law of Belgium the plaintiff was not competent to sue for such a purpose, and by the law of England he had shewn no case for the suit against the English directors.

This was an appeal from a decree of the present Master of the Rolls, dismissing the bill. The plaintiff, Mr. John King Kent, the owner of ten shares in the Charleroi and Erquelines Railway Company (purchased very early in June 1848), filed his bill on the 24th of that month on behalf of himself and all other the shareholders of the above-named company (except such thereafter-named defendants as were shareholders of the same company), against Mr. Jackson and the assignees of Mr. Graham, and against the committee of management of the company who were out of the jurisdiction of the Court.

The bill stated that on the 28th of May 1845, by the Royal Commission of the King of the Belgians, a railway company was established as a société anonyme, for the formation of a line of railway in that country, and the same was formed under certain articles and rules subsequently duly confirmed by a royal ordinance; that the articles were (inter alia) as follows:—

"Article 3. The company takes the title of the Charleroi and Erquelines Railway Company; its seat is Brussels. Art. 15. At the meetings constituted according to the terms of Art. 31, the general meeting takes cognizance of the accounts and balances, and determines on them finally: the approval of the balances completely discharges the board of directors. Art. 39. The deliberations of the general meeting, taken in conformity with the above dispositions, bind the company. Art. 43. Every six months, at the half-yearly general meeting, the active and passive situation of the company shall be presented to the meeting, the accounts and balances shall be settled and approved. Art. 47. All disputes between members of the company, concerning the affairs of the company, shall be judged by arbitrators: the tribunal shall be composed of three arbitrators, in the choice of whom the parties shall be bound to agree within eight days: in default of which, the said arbitrators will be named by the president of the Tribunal of Commerce of Brussels, at the request of the first requirer: the arbitrators shall decide absolutely, as amicable compounders, without appeal, and without being bound by the forms and delays of legal proceedings: their decision cannot be reversed by appeal, civil petition, nor by recourse to cassation."

By a subsequent article, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Graham, and others in this country, were appointed the English board of directors, there being also a board formed in Belgium of directors called the Conseil d'Administration. Mr. Jackson and Mr. Graham were the acting directors in England. Shares were allotted in England, and deposits upon them to the amount of 12,680*l.* were paid to the joint account of Messrs. Jackson and Graham, into the bank of Messrs. Smith, Payne & Smith.

Differences of opinion arose as to the conduct of the undertaking between the English board and the Conseil d'Administration in Belgium, in consequence of which Mr. Jackson and Mr. Graham sent in their resignations, as directors, on the 26th of October 1848, which were soon afterwards accepted, and subsequently the other English directors resigned. In the following month Messrs. Jackson and Graham issued a circular, which was addressed and sent to the English allottees of shares, giving them the option either of taking scrip in exchange for the bankers' receipts or of having the amount of the deposits paid by them returned without interest. A great number of the allottees availed themselves of the former part of the offer, and received back their money to the amount of 8,280*l.*, which money they received by cheques, drawn by Messrs. Jackson and Graham on the bankers, and which were honoured out of the 12,628*l.* so paid in.

After setting forth these facts, the bill proceeded to allege that "the company, ever since it was established, carried on, and still continues to carry on and conduct their affairs on the footing of and in conformity with the said rules and regulations, and such rules and regulations have ever since constituted, and now constitute, the existing laws of the said company, and are binding on all persons who are or who have been at any time members or shareholders of or in the same, to the full extent of all their respective property or interest therein." It also alleged that Jackson and Graham determined to avail themselves of the legal controul they had over the English deposits for the purpose of indemnifying themselves against all liabilities which they had incurred as directors; and it charged and insisted that the return of the deposits amounted to a breach of trust and fraud on the shareholders, and that it had taken place against the protest of the committee of management or Conseil d'Administration, and that that body had no power to authorize the return of the deposits: and it charged that Mr. Graham had become bankrupt, and that other defendants were his assignees, and also that the shareholders were very numerous; and, lastly, that it would be impracticable to make them parties, and it then prayed that it might be declared that Jackson and the assignees of Graham were liable to make good the 8,280*l.*, and that an account might be taken, and that the sum found due might be paid and secured in court for the benefit of the Charleroi and Erquelines Railway Company and all persons entitled to or interested in the funds thereof.

The defendant, Mr. Jackson, by his answer, said that the English directors had retired in consequence of the apparent impossibility of the company carrying its plans into effect, and that they had declined, after their retirement, to pay the English deposits to the committee of management or Conseil d'Administration in Belgium, and that they returned them to the English allottees with the sanction of Mr. Augustus Walter Arnold, the duly authorized solicitor of the committee of management or Conseil d'Administration, considering that such allottees were entitled to them on the failure of the undertaking; that after their retirement various negotiations took place between the defendants and the Conseil d'Administration in Belgium, and that finally, an account was rendered by them, the English directors, to the committee and settled, and the balance, after deducting the sum of 8,280*l.* and certain other payments, among which was a sum of 1,284*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* for the purchase by Messrs. Jackson and Graham, with the like sanction of Mr. Arnold, of 300 shares from English allottees for the benefit of the company, was, on the 2nd of June 1846, paid over to such Conseil d'Administration, or committee of management, by means of a payment into the bank of Messrs. Snow, Strahan & Co. to their account. This account subsequently was, as appeared, although not very clearly, from the evidence, affirmed by the general meeting, or assemblée générale of the company.

On the part of the defendants, the evidence of two Belgian advocates was given upon the law of Belgium; one of those gentlemen stated in effect as follows:—“I say that a société anonyme, &c. can, in its own name, sue any other person or société anonyme in any of the tribunals of Belgium, in respect of the common rights or liabilities of such société anonyme. No individual member of a société anonyme can institute, conduct or maintain, in or before the courts or tribunals of Belgium, any suit, claim, or demand, on behalf of such société, or the members thereof, otherwise than in the name of such société, for any right of such société, or any right common to the members thereof, against any other person or société anonyme, or other party, or against any other members or member of the same société. In a word, and according to the Belgian common law and statute law, sociétés anonymes are administered by directors and committees of administration. Directors alone can begin or maintain any suit in the name of sociétés anonymes. If shareholders individually had a like right, complications and great difficulties would be the natural consequence, as I think. I say that any differences between shareholders must be decided by arbitration, in virtue of the Article 47. of the statutes, which is in accordance with the terms of Article 1134 of the Civil Code, which makes the said Article 47. binding between shareholders. The Article 47. of the statutes is binding between shareholders, so that all differences arising between shareholders and relating to the société, must be judged by arbitration, and consequently, in my opinion, the courts and tribunals of Belgium would declare themselves incompetent in such cases.”

The case was argued before the Master of the Rolls, in July 1851, when he held that the transaction was one which could be sanctioned by a general meeting, and having been so sanctioned, could not be made the subject of a suit in this country against the retired English directors. His Honour was also of opinion that a bill on behalf of all the shareholders of the company, including those persons who were present at the general meetings, and sanctioned those proceedings, could not be supported, and he, therefore, dismissed the bill, with costs, without any reference to the foreign contract, which he did not consider it necessary to deal with. From this decree the plaintiff now appealed.

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. Shée, for the plaintiff.—The English directors were the agents or trustees of the company, and they were not justified in returning the deposits, or in buying up the 300 shares on behalf of the company. They had no authority to do either of those acts, and having committed a breach of trust in so doing, they are answerable to the company for the amount so improperly applied—Natusch v. Irving (1), Salomons v. Laing (2), Bagshaw v. the Eastern Union Railway Company (3), and The Society for the Illustration of Practical Knowledge v. Abbott (4). From these authorities it is clear that where corporate funds are applied in a manner contrary to the terms of the common contract, all parties concerned in such misappropriation are bound to refund. Then, particularly as to the purchase of the 300 shares, the case of Ex parte Morgan (5) decides that shares can only be purchased upon the terms of the deed of settlement. The plaintiff is perfectly right in suing in England; for it has long been settled that in point of remedy the parties are bound by the law of the country in which proceedings are taken. In this case, therefore, the law of England and not the law of Belgium must apply—The British Linen Company v. Drummond (6), De la Vega v. Vianna (7), Huber v. Steiner (8) Don v. Lippmann (9), Wynne v. Jackson (10). The form adopted by the plaintiff, of suing on behalf of himself and the other shareholders not defendants, is correct, as his object is to secure the refunding of property improperly applied, as appears from the cases of Bromley v. Smith (11) and Gray v. Chaplin (12), and no valid objection arises that some of the parties have acquiesced—Preston v. the Grand Collier

Dock Company (13) and Colman v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (14).
